A NEW INVENTION!

LEWIS'S

Self-Acting Wagon Brake!

By means of this invention, the wheels of a wagon are made to lock themselves when going down hill, certainly and effectively, and are released the moment there is any strain on the horses, without attention on the part of the driver.

It is already in use in many parts of the East, and has everywhere given satisfaction.

It will lock a wheel so that it CANNOT REVOLVE, the efforts of the wheel to turn making the lock tighter.

It operates in an instant, locking or unlocking as necessary.

It needs no care and requires no exertion.

It cannot fail to work, and is easier on the team than the common brake.

Simple in its construction, and costing no more than the common lock, it gives perfect security, and a child may drive the heaviest wagon over the steepest roads.

It can be used in the same way as the common hand or foot brake: A touch on the lever will effectually lock the wheels, and

RUNAWAYS ARE IMPOSSIBLE.

JUPITER AND SQUARZA.

[AFTER BON GAULTIER.]

"TAKE away this clammy nectar!"
Said the king of gods and men;
"Never at Olympus' table
Let that trash be served again.
Ho, Lyæus, thou, the beery!
Quick—invent some other drink;
Or, in a brace of shakes, thou standest
On Cocytus' sulphury brink!"

Terror shook the limbs of Bacchus,
Palely grew his pimpled nose,
And already in his rearward
Felt he Jove's tremendous toes;
When a bright idea struck him—
"Dash my thyrsus in the lunch!"
For you never were in Frisco,
And you know not Squarza's Punch!"

"Bring it!" quoth the Cloud-compeller;
And the wine-god brought the liquor—
"Campagne and nectar are nought to it!
Bring me more, Bac.! come, be quicker!"
And Saturnius drank and nodded,
Winking with his lightning eyes;
And amidst the constellations
Did the star of SQUARZA rise!

INTERIOR ITEMS.

On Saturday evening, September 9th, a man was stopped on the grade between Gold Hill and American City by a "road agent," who relieved him of about $30. On the same evening Mr. Burke, of this city, was stopped on the Geiger Grade by a foot-pad disguised with a mask. Mr. Burke happened to have but $4 75 about him, which the "road agent" concluded not to take. Later the same night three Gould & Curry workmen were stopped and searched by a foot-pad, who succeeded in obtaining but four bits. Night before last Charles R. Marble was stopped and relieved of about $20. On South E street, the same evening, a man who was too much intoxicated to be able to navigate was stripped of his coat, vest, boots and some four or five dollars in coin.—Territorial Enterprise.

The Woodland News of September 9th has the following: "On Monday evening last, at the residence of Doctor Case, in this place, while several small girls were enjoying themselves at swinging, Nettie V. Askins, aged thirteen years, daughter of T. J. Askins, fell to the ground with great force, producing concussion of the brain. She was insensible from the time of the accident, but was able, with some assistance, to walk home. She spoke but a few words after her injury, and died at 12 o'clock at night.

The Stockton Independent says that the report that Mr. Leitch, of Leitch & Cottle's Ferry, was accidentally shot on election day turns out to be erroneous. The man who brought the report, it appears, had about two hundred dollars of other men's money in his pocket; came to Stockton, got a gentleman to go with him to the residence of Samuel Fisher, told the latter the story of the shooting, and borrowed ten dollars to pay, as he said, his expenses, as he had come in a hurry for a doctor.

News items appear to be rather scarce in the mountains. We clip the following from the Grass Valley National: "We are informed, says the Nevada Gazette, that a runaway, a smash-up, a tip-over or something else, happened to the San Juan stage yesterday: but we couldn't learn any particulars, and we doubt whether anything of the kind occurred. However, as we are hard up for items, "everything goes."

A difficulty took place in Mariposa, between Cal. McCarty of Bear Valley, and Thos. West. Blows were struck, and the party clinched, West drawing a knife and McCarty a pistol. In the fight McCarty was dangerously stabbed in the side, and West severely injured on the head. McCarty is slowly improving, although his wound is painful. The trouble originated about politics.

A boy, hunting about ten miles from Stockton on the Upper Sacramento road, found the body of Wm. Dorner. The alarm was immediately given, when it was found that the unfortunate man was burned to death. He was lying about 150 feet from his stable, where he was in the habit of cooking his meals, his house some time since having been burned down.

From a private letter, says the Dalles Mountaineer, we learn that great excitement prevailed at Idaho City, on the 27th ult. A vigilance committee had been formed for the purpose of hanging Ferd Patterson and others confined in the county jail. Another party had armed for the purpose of maintaining order. Three thousand citizens were under arms, and a collision was momentarily expected.

The President has appointed Henry W. Briggs to be Register of the Land Office at Visalia, California.

The St. Louis grain elevator will soon be completed and in operation. This building is 250 feet long, 85 wide, 128 high on the land side and 172 on the river, and contains 103 bins, with a capacity of 1,200,000 bushels. It is expected that 100,000 bushels of grain per day can be handled easily. In addition to the ordinary uses of an elevator, arrangements are in progress by which 10 000 bushels of grain can be daily sacked for shipment or other purposes.

Ford's Theatre is cleared of all theatrical furniture, scenery, etc., and the floors are being torn up. The entire interior of the building is to be remodelled, under the direction of the Secretary of War, preparatory to the uses of the Bureau of Rebel Archives and Relics.

The reports of the gratuitous services of Mrs. Surratt's counsel are contradicted by a statement to the effect that, previous to her execution, she submitted to a demand from her counsel for $3,500, secured upon her real estate, as the price of their efforts in her behalf.

Joseph Crockett, of Danville, Maine, has a hen which recently laid a very large egg. On breaking it open another small egg was found within, fully formed, and enclosed in a shell. On breaking this small egg still another was found, and so on, till it appeared that in laying this one egg Biddy had laid five eggs of retreating dimensions.

A bronze statue of President Lincoln is to be erected in Jefferson Square, Philadelphia. About $20,000 have been contributed for that purpose.

A GIRL SHOW.

THE "Girl Show" in London, described below, outdoes anything of which Barnum ever conceived. Reading the account, one can almost fancy himself revelling amongst the houris that people a Mohamedan heaven.

We all remember Barnum's baby show, don't we? and also some grave reproof received therefor from our decorous Mamma-land here. Yet Barnum's idea seems to have taken root in this country, and on Saturday last bore its fruit in an exhibition which I dare say is unique in the history of the human race. It was nothing less than a prize exhibition of young girls—a little over the age that Barnum's babies might be, if living at this time. It occurred in the gardens of the Kensington Horticultural Society: a most aristocratic place and institution It was at the close of a grand flower show. The splendid band of her Majesty's First Regiment of Life Guards discoursed the sweet music, to which the hundreds of throbbing and expectant hearts beat time. Looking down from some high terrace, the exquisitely dressed girls seemed so intermingled with japonicas, roses, lilies, and so on, that one was at some loss to know whether the girls were flowers just liberated from stems, or the flowers were folded and spell-bound maidens: and one feared to speak or cough, lest suddenly the fairy troupe should hide back in the thousand buds and calyxes from which they seemed to have emerged at the mystic invocation of the music. Among these palpitating plateaus of human hues there walked, unrecognized as an official personage, a man with iron-gray hair, and cold, discriminating air—one who, to borrow a phrase, had "an appearance of being as thoroughly married as any man in England." He glanced without seeming to glance; he feasted his eyes, invincible dog! He was not at all in a hurry to make his decisions. At last, at a wave of his terrible hand, the music ceased; the crowd of eager mammas and aunts approached his throne, each with her darling. A graceful bow, a distant hint of the existence of Mrs. ———, (a pretty woman I'll warrant.) and the judge lays before him the three first prizes to be awarded. The first prize was an exquisite bracelet encrusted with diamonds and opals, value $925. Oh! how many diamond eyes and opalescent flushes there were! Alas! only one could get it. "Mary C———," calmly calls the judge, born June, 1847; exhibited by Lady C———, of O——— Manor, Hants." Glowing, blushing, snow-pure complexion; chestnut locks, all flushed by a tint of sunrise beaming from the cheek; eyes that might mislead the day: of a height that would just bring her forehead up to the lips of a fellow standing six feet in his shoes. Such was Mary C———, on whose fair arm the judge clasped the bracelet, with a feeling which made one wonder if Mrs. ——— were present. The second present is a very fine white lace shawl, valued at $525, to receive which the judge calls forth, "Lady Harriet D———, born August, 1854; exhibited by the Marchioness of ———." Stately, queenly, as if bodied forth from one of Tennyson's Idylls, came forth this young lady. Worthy she was of the Ohio poet Howell's (?) delicate line:

"The carved stock of the lily hath not her slender grace."

The third prize was a jewelled bouquet-holder, valued at $315, which was awarded to Laura M———, "born May, 1848, exhibited by Mrs. M———, of Windsor," a brunette, with great luxuriance of tresses, exquisite tournure, and, as to her eyes,

"Sweeter eyes were never seen,
Eyes so fiery and serene."

It was not in human nature that there should not be a few moist eyes and pouting lips; and there was a general regret that there was not more prizes; but the judge's decrees were universally approved. When all were about to disperse, the judge called a fourth young girl to him, and taking a small morocco case from his pocket, spoke as follows:

"It was my duty, as you are aware, to consider not only the beauty, but the taste, of our fair young friends as shown in their attire. I have discharged that duty to the best of my judgment; but I must now remark that I have been more struck by the cost than the taste of the display. Not that most, nay, all of the competitors are dressed elegantly, but I beg you to look around, and see what a uniform you are all in! Where is any sign of individual, original taste? Certain elementary laws of complexion and color being satisfied, the rest is left to one of a half dozen milliners. Of that, however, I will not treat now—only to hint that if you did exercise your own taste a little more the taste of Mesdames Rogers, Elise, and the rest, would be less of a monopoly, and its prodigious price would come down. I say prodigious, for, thinking my duty would be less imperfectly performed if I did not take the cost as well as the beauty of the dress into consideration, I made inquiry on that point in some cases. The answer astonishes me. To indicate the exact nature of my astonishment I have resolved to add another prize for the lady whose dress is least costly in proportion to its richness and elegance; and I consider myself most fortunate in finding one altogether worthy of the distinction. The lady is as well dressed as all but three or four persons in this assembly, and yet, I am assured, that the whole of her attire—I need hardly say exclusive of her jewelry—cost no more than forty guineas, a sum which barely equals the income of her gallant father for a fortnight."

Upon which the blushing lady received a thimble of gold. And the exhibition of taste and beauty was over.—English Paper.

MY GOLD FISHES.

I WILL candidly confess, to begin with, that fishes are not things to be sentimental about. In general they are cold, damp, clammy, shy, uncompanionable, save among mermaids, and, on the whole, not a little repulsive—except when properly cooked and served up hot. If I am at all sentimental about my gold fishes, therefore, you will understand that it is because they were not like ordinary fishes. They were not fishes in general. They were intelligent, affectionate, and educated to that degree that they could do almost anything but speak. Verily, I believe that they would have learned to do that, also; but, alas! they died before they could be taught. Why they died I know not. They had a beautiful place to live in: A clean glass globe, suspended amid twining vines and evergreen mosses, and the whole affair placed at the window, where sunshine and fresh air were plentiful. A prettier sight than the two little fellows, swimming gracefully about their handsome home, and reflecting the light from their golden scales, nobody can imagine. And they seemed to know their beauty and enjoy it. They knew a wonderful deal more, did these little fishes. They would come to the top of the water to be fed and take their food from my fingers. When they wanted fresh water they could call for it by making an odd, clicking noise. They would remain perfectly still while being talked to, and wink with evident satisfaction at the compliments lavished upon them. When, after a prolonged absence, their lawful owners returned to them, these little fishes would wriggle about and indulge in wonderful demonstrations of joy and welcome. O, the learned seal was nothing in comparison to them! Thus, in a brief paragraph, I have condensed their virtues; but when you consider what fishes are, and how seldom they exhibit any intelligence whatever, you will acknowledge that these virtues amount to a great deal.

But my gold fishes died. Waking up of a morning, I found one of the poor little fellows floating upon his side The other lingered until afternoon, and then he swam no more. I can't tell you how sad a thing it was to see him die. Languid and sick, he sailed slowly about his little domain. His bright golden color gradually changed to a feverish white. He swam up to my finger, but refused his food, as if he would have said: "I know you, but I cannot eat." That touched me. We gave him fresh water, and he revived for a moment. There happened to be a Doctor in the house, and we called him in. The Doctor ordered more fresh water, and we brought it. All in vain! Spite our care—spite of the professional skill of our medical adviser—our gold fish was no more. After death the feverish white disappeared, and the bright gold returned. The fishes looked more beautiful than ever. One of the boys in the house made us a little coffin out of a box. We lined it with soft cotton and placed the little fishes in. Then we had a sort of funeral. A grave was dug beneath the old pear tree in the yard. There the gold fishes rest, safe from all disturbance. You would hardly credit me if I were to tell you how I miss those fish, and how lonely the glass globe looks as it hangs empty amid the vines. Of course I can get others. I know that. But others will not do. I should never be able to find two other such fishes as those.—New York Leader.

Fair Premiums.—Some of the recipients of the Premiums and Medals awarded by the Mechanics' Institute at the Fair lately held in this city, have made their success known to the public. The agent of the Grover & Baker Sewing Machines announces that a silver medal was awarded for work done on those machines. Goodwin & Co., Furniture Dealers, obtained a silver medal for articles of their manufacture on exhibition. J. Peirce was the recipient of the first premium for Furniture and Upholstery work. Kerby, Byrne & Co. obtained the first premium for Cloaks. It will probably be some time before the official list of premiums will be published.

A Lady at the Fair.—We always find a crowd gathered about the show-case of Mrs. Read, whose Skirt Supporters and Chest Expanders are in extensive use wherever fashion reigns or health is an object to be desired. Specimens of her work in this branch of art, remarkable for perfection and finish, are exhibited by her, and also supporters for Hernia and Rupture, which, it seems, are extensively in demand. All these are more or less appliances for the preservation of health; but the cynosure of all eyes is the "Bust," an article indispensable to a lady's toilet. These and other objects and curiosities, it is generally conceded, richly entitle Mrs. Read to a premium.—San Francisco Sunday Mercury.

Many of the Diseases which hitherto baffled and defied the highest medical skill, are now speedily cured by Dr. H. A. Benton, whose processes of applying electricity receive the approbation of all prominent physicians. The nerves are directly reached, and patients suffering from chronic complaints find almost immediate relief, and rapidly recover their former healthy condition. Dr. Benton is a physician of excellent reputation, and as a Medical Electrician occupies the front rank in his profession.—Golden Era.

A TRUE STORY.

DEDICATED TO THE SICK.

THERE dwelt in Sacramento a pale, bilious mechanic,
His muscles were strengthless, his blood it was chill;
And the wife of his bosom believed, in her panic,
The husband she worshipped was hopelessly ill.
Seeking daily for help, in her wifely devotion,
All vainly she tried pill, powder and potion—
Till at last, when a prey to grief's wildest emotion,
Of HOSTETTER'S BITTERS she heard from a friend.

She purchased the cordial, half hoping, half fearing,
A prayer on her lip and a tear in her eye;
And taking his hand, with words kindly and cheering,
Besought him the tonic for her sake to try.
As he drank, a new life through his system seemed stealing,
Each following draft did its mission of healing,
Until, strong in health and most grateful in feeling,
He told the "true story" here twined into song.

It is also proper to state that the Bitters are sold exclusively in glass, and never, under any circumstances, by the gallon or barrel. Imposters and imitators are abroad, and the only safeguard the public have against them is to see that the Bitters they buy have the engraved label and note of hand of Messrs. Hostetter & Smith, and our proprietary stamp over the cork of the bottle.

THE CONNECTICUT LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY orgauized in 1847, with a guaranteed capital of $50,000; Eliphalet A. Bulkley was its first President, and Guy R. Phelps, Secretary. This company has been successful from the first, and has grown to be, in the number of its policy-holders, the largest company in the world, and its business for the past year was greater than that of any other Life Insurance Company in the world. The whole number of policies issued is 43,386, of which 24,054 are now in force, covering an aggregate risk of over $60,000,000. It has paid in losses, on 1,729 lives, the sum of $3,952,762; and in dividends, $2,812,904. Its capital and assets, February 1st, were $7,918,896, nearly eight millions. During the year ending February 1st, 8,115 policies were issued, $482,387 were paid in losses, on 201 lives, and $343,767 in dividends; its receipts for premiums were $2,381,954, and for interest on investments $556,608, making total receipts for the year, $2,938,562, nearly three millions. During the past four years, its interest on investments has been more than sufficient to pay the losses. The present officers of the Connecticut Mutual Life are, James Goodwin, President; Guy R. Phelps, Secretary.

HOME MANUFACTURES.—It is the duty of every Californian to give encouragement to the productions of our own State, and, all other things being equal, preference should be shown to our manufactures. Now, in the matter of cloth, things are at least equal, and when we examine the fine suits of fashionable clothing for sale at Quincy Hall, we incline to the idea that our productions have the advantage. This is the pioneer establishment in manufacturing clothing from California cloth, having commenced it in April last. Their work gives general satisfaction, and we are pleased to learn that their business in this line is steadily increasing. Our advice to our readers is, to call and examine for themselves at Nos. 545, 557 and 549 Washington street.—Call.

DR. C. W. MOORE'S MEDICAL AND SURGICAL INSTITUTE.—In speaking of this Institution, the Sunday Mercury says: "Aside from the most skilful treatment and nursing, the large, airy and elegantly-furnished rooms, will enable the patients to enjoy all the comforts and luxuries of a home. All in all, we regard Dr. Moore and his Institute a most valuable acquisition to the Pacific Coast—the need of which we have long since felt." See advertisement.

FLOWERS! FLOWERS!!

The attention of the Public is invited to

The Floral Repository,

Of C. B. MILLER, Bush street, opposite Cosmopolitan Hotel.

Mr. MILLER keeps constantly on hand the rarest and choicest flowers that the season or the market affords, and will furnish parties or private houses with floral decorations at the shortest notice. Bouquets made to order, and sent to their destination with promptness. Mr. Miller would invite attention to some curious specimens of the Orchis family which his collection affords, and he would he pleased to have a call from all lovers of Flowers, whether they wish to purchase or not.

"HOME, SWEET HOME!"

No home of taste is complete without Aquaria, Gold Fish, Birds, Fern Cases, new and rare Plants, Bulbs and Seeds, Cut Flowers and Bouquets for Weddings, Hanging Baskets, Rustic Stands, Shells, Minerals, etc.

A long experience at the East justifies Mr. Miller in promising to please the patrons who may favor him with a trial. He will also he happy at all times to furnish those who take an interest in flowers with any information relative to their care and culture that may be desired.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important considerationparticularly where fuel is scarce The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!

RARE CHANCE

TO SECURE

DESIRABLE HOMESTEADS.

THE CALIFORNIA HOMESTEAD ASSOCIATION HAS been formed to enable its members, by paying a few dollars monthly, to obtain desirable Homesteads in the city of San Francisco. In order to secure a beautiful location, as well as cheap property, they have selected Block 540, bounded by Benderick, Pine, Baker and California streets, and Block 541, bounded by Broderick, California, Baker and Sacramento streets, all of the Western Addition. The property is within three blocks of the Central Railroad, and can be reached in a few minutes from the centre of the city. It is covered with fine trees and shrubbery, is sheltered from the winds, and is in every way most eligibly located for homestead purposes.

The lots are, nearly all, 27 1-2 feet front by 137 1-2 feet deep. The Capital Stock is divided into 69 shares, of $250 each. Shareholders will pay $10 per month on each share taken for the term of 25 months. When six monthly payments been made, the property will be divided among the members, and they will receive contracts for deeds to the lots to which they will be entitled, that will enable them to take possession of the same, and erect buildings thereon. In no other way can Homestead Lots in this city be thus easily obtained, and for so small an outlay.

Parties who may wish to subscribe to the Capital Stock, can see a map of the property and obtain full particulars, by calling at the office of the Secretary, 305 Montgomery street, corner of Pine. The title to the property is perfect.

READ WHAT THE PRESS SAYS OF THE CALIFORNIAN.

The style is that of charming repose, easy address, and delicacy of perception. There are many original thoughts scattered throughout its columns; but the chief merit of the paper lies not so much in this as the thoroughly graceful style in which they are conveyed to the reader.—Call.

It will be found a welcome visitor in every house, and we wish it success. It is readable and interesting, and cannot fail making friends.—Alta.

The paper contains sixteen pages, is conducted with marked ability, grace and dignity, and presents a remarkably handsome appearance. It promises to become one of the best literary journals in the country.—Monitor.

In size and general appearance it resembles the New York Round Table. The contents, original and selected, establish the presence of editorial taste and the command of intellectual resources to insure a literary success, at least.—Sacramento Daily Union.

From what we have seen of its contents, we believe it will be a welcome visitor to the fireside. It is not of the wishy-washy, sentimental, sickly order of publications, but one which we hope Californians will be proud to recognize as one of the productions of our coast.—Marysville Express.

It presents a beautiful typographical appearance, and we may safely say is the neatest printed paper printed in California. It promises to be a popular and successful publication, and we add our quota of recommendation most cheerfully to this end.—Marysville Appeal.

The Californian is the best-looking paper ever printed in the State, and is well-filled with good reading matter.—Sacramento Daily Bee.

It is by far the handsomest journal of its character on the Pacific coast. The people of California are in need of just such a paper as the Californian. Napa County Reporter.

It is in convenient form for binding, and we conclude the editor will make its contents sufficiently valuable for preservation.—Territorial Enterprise.

We have read its contents with considerable pleasure, for its originality and versatility are alike commendable. It will supply a void in literary circles, which has long been felt in the community.—Police Gazette.

The Californian seems to be receiving golden opinions from the press in all parts of the State, and from the specimen before us we are satisfied they are well deserved. It is evidently destined to fill a high place in the ranks of journalism on the Pacific coast.—Sonoma County Democrat.

We find it well filled with reading matter, original and selected, of the highest order.—Mountain Messenger.

The Californian is a high-toned literary publication, and of such a character as should receive a liberal support from the people of the Pacific coast. Herald, Suisun.

We can assure our readers that the Californian is a first class literary and family journal, full of interesting matter and ably edited. It is established on a permanent basis, and Californians should take pride in extending its circulation.—Grass Valley National.

The Californian is a journal of high literary character, and will undoubtedly become popular. Nevada Transcript.

It is the best literary paper published on the Pacific coast The matter it contains is carefully prepared, well-digested, and worthy of perusal.—Nevada Gazette.

It is a handsome paper of sixteen pages, about the size of the Round Table before it was cut down, and not unlike that journal in character and scope. If such a journal can be sustained in California it is certainly a good token for the literary taste of the land of gold.—Boston Transcript.

It is enlivened with a vein of humor, that promises for it a position in the first rank of our native publications.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

A weekly journal, made up of editorial and selected matter indicating ability and excellent judgment.—Boston Post.

The paper is published in handsome quarto form, is very lively, and shows a disposition to redeem its promise to devote itself to the "best interests of California;" it deserves success.—N. Y. Eve. Post.

It contains an immense quantity of matter, selected with exquisite taste, varied, instructive, amusing, and always worthy of attention.—N. Y. Review.

Many of the above notices were given by our cotemporaries during the publication of our first volume. With pride and pleasure we remark evidences of continued good will and approval in the columns of home and Eastern journals. No literary paper in California is copied by first-class Atlantic publications to one-tenth the extent that honors the CALIFORNIAN. By a firm adherence to the course we have hitherto pursued—fearlessness in condemning what we believe to be wrong (especially in regard to literary pretension where no merit exists,) by always preferring a good "selection" to an indifferent "contribution," by encouraging talent where it unmistakably has a germ, and utterly refusing to foist upon our readers the namby-pamby productions of brainless "spnce-annihilators," we feel confident we shall consult the wishes of the better class of readers, and that a rapid increase in its circulation will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to demonstrate the good taste of the people of California.

THESE PLASTERS have the compactness of kid leather and the flexibility of a silk glove. They have restored the withered hand, removed the unsightly hump, cured varicose veins and external aneurisms. For all affections of the chest, weight about the diaphragm or upper portion of the bowels, in colds and coughs, for injuries of the back, for all strains or bruises, for a weak back, for nervous pains in the bowels, and other nervous affections and cramps, for heart affections—in all cases they have to be used to be properly appreciated.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM
—OF—
WILD CHERRY,

HAS BEEN USED FOR

NEARLY HALF A CENTURY,

With the most astonishing success in curing

Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of

The Throat, Lungs and Chest,

INCLUDING EVEN

CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last-named and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the "medicinal gum" of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaints is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great the popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry, there are commingled with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of

PULMONARY COMPLAINTS

has induced many physicians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

S. H. Finley, M. D., San Francisco, Cal.
E. Boyden, M. D., Exeter, Me.
Alexander Hatch, M. D., China, Me.
R. Fellows, M. D., Hill, N. H.
W. H. Webb, M. D., Cape Vincent, N. Y.
W. B. Lynch, M. D., Auburn, N. Y.
Abraham Skillman, M. D., Boundbrook, N. J.
H. D. Martin, M.D., Mansfield, Pa.

The proprietors have letters from all classes of our fellow-citizens, from the Halls of Congress to the humblest cottage, and even from beyond the seas; for the fame and virtues of WISTAR'S BALSAM have extended to the "uttermost bounds of the earth," without any attempt on our part to introduce it beyond the limits of our own country.

TO CALIFORNIANS AND OREGONIANS.

In future all genuine WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY for the Pacific Coast will be enclosed in a new wrapper which will bear the printed names of both SETH W. FOWLE & CO., Boston, Mass, and JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio, as well as fac-simile of the signatures of "I. BUTTS," "SANFORD & PARK," and "H. WISTAR, M. D."

NOTICE!

CERTAIN PARTIES, feeling aggrieved at not receiving the First Premium for their goods at the Mechanics' Fair, have thought fit to connect our name, in a public card, with assertions that we pronounce false in every particular.

We submitted our goods for competition, and were willing to abide by the decision of the Ladies comprising the Committee on Cloaks, whatever it might have been.

We would not notice the card of the aggrieved parties if it did not cast an undeserved reflection on the impartial decision of the Committee.

This is the only notice we will take of the matter, as we will positively enter into no controversy; and our goods from the Fair being now on exhibition at our Store, the public can see them and judge for themselves as to their superiority.

HAMLET—Act III., Scene 2.

SOMEBODY has said that a female punster is an even rarer animal than a crowing hen. That this is thus—to use an Artemus-Wardism—is a merciful provision of Providence. Suppose women, as a rule, were in the habit of torturing the English language on the rack of a diseased imagination. Think what would be the natural consequence. The world would, in course of time, become peopled with a monstrous race of punsters. The babies would make puns in their cradles. The anxious mother seeing her baby's face writhing as if with pain, would exclaim, instead of as now, "poor 'ittle thing! Is a pin hurting it?" "Bless his 'ittle heart, he's got a pun!" Babies always take after their mothers, and the language they learn is their mother tongue. Surely the man who deliberately makes an attempt to develop a genius for punning in women, and thus let loose an evil on the world more deadly than the most dire contained in Pandora's box, deserves the execrations of mankind! There is such a being in our midst. Mr. Thomas M. Blair on Tuesday evening next takes a benefit, and repays it with a curse. He offers a bouquet-holder as a prize to the lady who contributes the best original conundrum. Of course the ladies will not make conundrums—they will get their smart little brothers who go to the High School to make them—but this does not palliate Mr. Blair's conduct. He has made a deliberate and well-calculated attempt to induce women to make puns. The offence will bring its own punishment. If Mr. Blair reads all the conundrums which he receives, and attempts to discover a joke in each, the Insane Asylum at Stockton will receive another inmate. We disapprove of punning altogether, or else, to oblige the ladies, we might tell them of a certain male punster who would be willing to furnish any good-looking young lady with a conundrum which she could enter in competition for the bouquet holder and take no compensation, but, but—guess!

THE seals will probably be astonished to-morrow by Mr. Cooke's sending a line across to them, and then paying them a visit. There is really not much danger in this funambulating feat, provided the performer, as is the case with Mr. Cooke, has been taught from his infancy to walk a chalked line, and the rope is taut also. Blondin got over a fall at Niagara; it is doubtful whether, if Mr. Cooke were unlucky enough to meet with a water fall to-morrow, he would get over it. The fact of Mr. Cooke's performing this feat on Sunday would make the occurrence of an accident, we will not say acceptable to rigid Sabbatarians, but at least less painful to them, as it would serve admirably for material for a tract entitled, "Sabbath-breakers, Beware! The Evils of Walking The Tight Rope on Sunday." The moral would, of course, be: "Never attempt to walk on a rope stretched from the Cliff House to Seal Rock on Sunday." This would have a good effect, and probably many would be deterred from doing such a thing—on Sunday—by the fear of a judgment falling on them. For ourselves, we sincerely trust that Mr. Cooke will get safely over it; he is too excellent a performer for us to be willing to spare him, as a terrible example.

AN Employment Office advertised, a few days ago, in a morning paper: "Two coal mines wanted this morning." Coal mines must be plentiful in California, when a man requires two to be produced before breakfast.

IMPORTANT MEXICAN CORRESPONDENCE.

AN INTERCEPTED LETTER.

Dear Trem:

FROM "orange groves and fields of balm"
These loving lines I send,
But first you really ought to know
The feelings of your friend.

For when its winter where you live,
The weather here's like June;
The "Season's Choir" Thomson sings,
In fact, is out of tune.

All day at ninety-eight degrees
The mercury has stood,
Without a figure I may say,
I'm "in a melting mood."

The fields are parched and so's my lips—
I quaff at every spring;
So dry a "summer," Trem, my dear,
"Two swallows" could not bring.

You know "two swallows do not make
It summer"—but methinks
The summer in this latitude
Is made of many drinks.

The politics, I grieve to say,
I find in great confusion—
For like the earth the people have
A daily revolution.

Their manners to a stranger here,
Is stranger yet to see;
Last night in going to a ball
A ball went into me.

I'm fond of reading, as you know,
But then it was a sin
To be obliged, against my will,
To take a Bullet-in.

They cried, "DIOS Y LIBERTAD!"
And then pitched into me;
I hate to hear a sacred name
Used with such "liberty."

I should have sent to you before,
But every method fails,
For, since they have impressed the men,
Of course, they've stopped the males. H.

A VOLUME of poems has lately been published in London, under the title: "Waiting at Table; Poems and Songs by Robert Awde, a Servant." The poet in plush thus dedicates his work:

"To Robert Ryrie, Esq., My Good Master, this volume of Verses, composed in half-hours snatched from sleep, and in spare moments during Waiting at Table, is inscribed by his obedient Servant, R. A."

We fear Lord Dundreary will be much shocked by Robert Awde's audacious attempt. Let him continue, say we, to wear the livery of the muses and bring forth volumes of verse—provided that he does not allow his poetic talent to interfere with his waiting at table. We should like to see these poems which were composed under circumstances not favorable to the development of poetic genius. Does Robert Awde write pastoral poetry? Alas! how poor a training for a bucolic poet is waiting at table, where he who writes of innocent lambkins comes in contact with these animals only in fragmentary portions—in slices, deluged with mint sauce. The feathered warblers of the grove he meets in stews or broiled on toast. Fancy "the poet, his eye in a fine phrenzy rolling," standing transfixed, a poetic fire beaming in his eye, with a plate of boiled mutton and caper sauce growing cold in his hands. We are convinced that either Robert Awde's poems or his waiting at table must be of a very indifferent quality. He must often have fallen under unjust suspicion—been thought intoxicated when he was simply snatching a spare moment to round off a poetic image. Let Robert Awde, if he be a true son of the muses, possess his soul in patience. He may yet live to become Poet Laureate, and chronicle the births of royal babies. In the meantime it is good for him that he has learned to labor and to wait.

IN the "editorial gossip" of the Sunday Mercury we observe mentioned among the list of articles which are there stated to have received prizes at the Fair, "the original mouse-trap." The editor of the Mercury is mistaken, the "original "Mouse-Trap," although acknowledged to be an excellent CALIFORNIAN invention, did not receive a prize, in consequence of the opposition of "Dr. Monger," who was jealous of it as interfering with his special business.

A NUMBER of citizens resident in the vicinity of Dupont and and Pacific streets have petitioned the City Fathers to proceed to clean out the Chinese. This petition contains a most unkind fling at Chinese amusements. It sets forth that "the locality is made all day unendurable by the most offensive sights, including the Chinese Theatre, Globe Hotel, etc." This is not right. The Declaration of Independence sets forth, among the inalienable rights of which all men are born possessed, that of "the pursuit of happiness." Music and the drama are civilizing and refining influences of great power, and the Chinese residents of San Francisco ought not to have their amusements interfered with. The Caucasian ear is not yet sufficiently educated to appreciate the beauties of Chinese music, and, in consequence of the general ignorance of the language among Americans, the citizens resident in the vicinity of Dupont and Pacific streets cannot enjoy the magnificent dramas of the Chinese Shakspeares. We do not sympathize in the least with those who complain of the Chinese opera and drama, simply because they are unable to appreciate it. Our Celestial visitors have a perfect right to engage in the pursuit of liberty and rats, and enjoy both. Perhaps, however, it would be as well to induce them, if possible, to move just a little outside the city limits.

IN a volume entitled Songs for My Children, are seven verses entitled, "About Tobacco," in which it is related how little Tommy Carr offered the end of a cigar—an old sojer—first to a dog, and then to a pig, and both these animals refused to smoke. The moral is set forth in the concluding verse:

"If from tobacco senseless brutes
Away disgusted turn,
That 'tis not fit for human mouth
We cannot fail to learn."

Had little Tommy Carr offered an ice cream to the dog or the pig, neither of these animals would have accepted it, therefore, "we cannot fail to learn" that if pigs and dogs cannot appreciate ice creams, they are certainly not fit for little boys. The morals which "moral stories" for children and "religious tracts" attempt to teach are, generally speaking, very weakly supported by the distorted facts set forth for the purpose.

"In Massachusetts a law has just been passed, forbidding licensing of any 'exhibition intended or calculated to bring any person into ridicule or contempt on account of his color.' The intent of this law is to suppress minstrel performances."

We trust that a law will also be passed forbidding the licensing of any exhibition intended or calculated to bring any person into ridicule or contempt on account of his brogue. The darkeys ought not to be more sensitive than the Irish, and poor Pat is made quite as much fun of on the stage as Sambo. Massachusetts must be rather a nice State to live in, where people's feelings are so carefully considered.

HOW wonderfully scarce blue-eyed babies must be! For three weeks past, an advertisement has appeared in the Call, announcing that a responsible party wants to adopt a female infant with blue eyes, under two weeks of age. As the advertiser signs herself "Mother," we suppose she wishes to get it to match one of the same sort which she has already. At one time—only some six or seven months ago—babies were so plentiful that you could pick one up any day in the week; they were lying round in all parts of the city.

WE don't believe that Californians are gallant. We were inconceivably shocked on Thursday evening when on Franks, in the character of "Shaun the Post" in the Wicklow Rebel, exclaiming pettishly to "Arrah," "I wish Adam had died with all his ribs in his body," the whole audience roared with delight. We know they didn't mean it. Where would they be now if Adam had never married? Appalling thought!

A NEWSPAPER poet complains that he is—

"Weary of earth, weary of toil,
Weary of trouble, weary of broil."

We sympathize with him. We, too, are weary of broil—so much so, that we actually fry our beefsteaks.

A PARTY of scientific men have been engaged for a long time in trying to find the level of the Dead Sea, and have at length succeeded. This disproves the assertion that water always finds its own level.

SOME one says: "Funeral bells are the door bells of the other world." This is not true: when a man is at death's door he does not stop to ring the bell.

THE San Francisco letter of "John Paul" which appeared in last weeks Union, reminds us of nothing so much as the utterances of "Barnaby Rudge's" raven which continually shrieked "I'm a

TREM

MY SHADOWY PASSION.

I AM stating nothing but a simple truth, when I declare that, without any previous acquaintance with its owner, I fell in love with a shadow. Who that has seen Mademoiselle Cerito, in the beautiful vision of "Ondine," dancing in simulated moonlight, has not felt that if some capricious power had made the dancer invisible and left the shadow, he might easily have fallen in love with the graceful, flitting shade upon the ground? But mine was simply a shadow on a bliud. To worship a symbol, without any correct idea of the attributes of that which it symbolizes, is idolatry; und into this idolatry I fell. I knew my danger. If dissappointed, I should not be able to console myself by saying, "Ah, well! it was of Julia or Lonisa that I was thinking after all." I had begun with a shadow; and let the substance turu out what it might, I must be content.

I admit that it was my own fault. While those who fall in love with a substauce, do so unsuspectingly—entrapped by over confidence in themselves, or led into it, like Benedict, by the schemes of others—I deliberately resolved to cultivate my passion in the teeth of much discouragement. "Surely," I thought, (or something else within me thought without deigning, till long afterwards, to apprise me of its conclusions,) "in loviug a shadow, all else must be shadowy, even to the common dangers of love." An argument of which I might have found a hundred analogies to demonstrate the fallacy. But my mind was obstinately made up. I sat at the wiudow of my solitary room, as soon as the oil lamps hung across the narow straggling street were lighted, and watched the window nearly opposite—sitting in the dark, that I might not be observed. There was the shadow to be seen every evening, and just above it, the complete outline of a sleeping bird in a cage, hanging by a cord. Whether this object, whose form I watched so intently, was old or young, ugly or pretty, sour or good-tempered, I did not know. I saw only that it was a woman, and that it did not wear spectacles. My feeling for some time might have been one of mere curiosity; for never, in the day time, when the blind was up, could I see there the slightest trace of woman or bird-cage. Soon after dusk the curtaiu would drop suddenly, the light came, and there was the bird and my shadow, working, or sometimes (as I faucied) reading. At first I thought that I could smoke very well in the dark, and that I would sit and watch from mere lack of a more definite purpose. My first intimation that curiosity was changing into love, was my readiness to coustrue all indications to the advantage of the shadow. Blind to its defects—as when men are enamored of a substance—I persisted, when the outline was altered from some cause, in believing that the very fairest form that it ever assumed was its true one—an unreasonable belief; since, according to the position of the light, the ugliest features may be made to show well in a shadow, while the prettiest may become hideously distorted. But who but a man wilfully blinded would not have felt serious doubts when that face—sometimes of ordinary dimensions—became ridiculously elongated, when that bosom suddenly grew to matronly breadth; when a nose would sometimes flatten like a negro's and again grow out to unusual length—only once in a whole eveniug becoming an ordinary nose—at which time alone I capriciously believed that she was standing with mathematical exactness between the lamp and the blind. To see (when I indulgently supposed that she had taken the lamp in her hand, and stooped to pick up something) her form suddenly shoot up, till I could not see her head, and she stood there, looking like a decapitated giraffe; and sometimes to behold her, from some cause, as suddenly crushed down into a dowdy likeness of a caravan dwarf, was enough to provoke the laugh that is fatal to a wavering passion. But no; I might have been impatient at these distortions, but I was too far advanced for laughing.

I forgot to mention that the narrow, straggling street, of which I have spoken was the Rue d'Aimette, in the city of Rouen, since pulled down for the approaches to the great square of St. Onen, and re-built with houses very different from those old, overhanging, low-doored, and small-windowed tenements of beams and stone-gray plaster, in which we lived. I was a stranger, without a friend in Rouen. Mr. Guindé, the celebrated historian (whose acquaintance I had made in Paris,) had employed me to decypher ancient English and French manuscripts, in the library of Notre Dame, for his use in writing his well-known History of the Parliament of Normandy: a labor that occupied me many months. And thus my days were spent in straining my eyes over yellow parchments, and my evenings in watching the shadow on the blind.

I had felt lonely, very lonely; perhaps this contributed to my interest in the shadow. It was winter time, and my labors in the library ceasing at dusk, my evenings were proportionately long. One afternoon, a fog, of the old familiar color of the parchments I had been pouring over, came creeping up from the river, till I could not distinguish the opposite walls. That night, I betook myself gloomily to read beside a miserable fire. The next night was foggy again. No Platonism could be more abstract and self-sufficing than my passion; but if I were to be denied the very lightest food that ever love was nourished on, I felt that it must be starved into action. Therefore, the next afternoon, meeting the fog creeping up the street again a little after sunset, I went directly over to the porter's lodge of the house opposite; and, having remarked to the porter (whom I knew slightly) that it was very foggy, asked him who lived on the second floor on that side of the house.

The porter glanced at the hooks for hanging the lodgers' keys within the lodge, and answered: "M. La Roche."

"What is his business?"

"I never knew. I am not curious."

Now, it is a general maxim, that when the porter of a large house in France does not know the business of any one of the lodgers, that lodger must be engaged in concerns of a secret and extraordinary nature. This fact, therefore, I noted.

"Has he a wife?" I asked nervously.

"No; only a sister."

"Indeed! I never saw either him or his sister."

"Very likely; he seldom goes out except at night; and the young lady scarcely ever, unless she walks in the garden behind the house."

"And his name, you say, is —?"

"Hush!" said the porter, suddenly turning towards the door. I turned also, and saw there a tall man, with a stoop in the shoulders, long dark hair, and a face with such hideous features and such a repulsive expression, that I could scarcely refrain from uttering some exclamation.

"Any letters for me, M. Gregoire?" asked the stranger.

"None, sir," replied the porter; and, to my great relief, the hideous countenance disappeared.

"That was M. La Roche," said the porter, when he was gone.

"Indeed! is his sister then—" I was about to add "like him," but could not make up my mind to put a question so important: so I merely said, "older or younger than he?"

"Younger. But if you should—"

"What?"

"If you should wish—"

Without in the slightest degree divining the drift of his question, I interrupted him by saying, "Oh, no! not at all; I'm much obliged to you," and hastened out.

Shall I call it a proof of my infatuation; or shall I regard it (as I did then) as an indication of the high and etherial nature of my sentiment, that I shrunk, instinctively, from a personal knowledge of the owner of my shadow? I am inclined to take credit for it. The event of all this (as you are aware, if you are a philosopher) enters not into this question. I have a right, in defending my conduct at the time, to take my stand where I stood at that time. I might (some would say) at once have questioned the porter, and thus, perhaps, have saved myself the folly of wasting my time night after night. But I was not wasting my time. The emotional part of my nature, and the divinest faculty of imagination, must be nourished, if I am to become in all parts well proportioned; and for these, illusions are an excellent food. If the contemplation of a mere shadow will serve to lift me, and keep me for many days above the smoke and air of this dim spot, then, although I may suddenly drop down to earth again, I shall carry with me the benefit of that pure atmosphere that I have breathed; the quality of the spirit will be improved, which I take to be the aim of all education.

After this defence, I trust that no one will think contemptuously of me when I relate that, on the following afternoon, my old enemy, the fog, having missed his way, and wandered (as I heard afterwards) about the marshes behind the Faubourg d'Eauplet, I planted myself again at the window, and watched as before. But this time the bird-cage was there with the bird (still standiug upon one leg, and with his head sunk into his neck, motionless on his perch,) but my shadow was not. Afterwards, horrible substitute! the gigantic brother must have walked across the room towards the window; for I saw the shape of his hideous head appear at the top of the blind, and slowly sink (like the ghost of Banquo) till the whole dreadful spectre vanished. When, after an hour's watching, I saw at last my shadow approaching; saw it set a box (I think) on the table; saw it place a chair or something like it, beside; saw it stand a moment before sitting down, and, with arms upturned, arrange its back hair, and fix it again with a comb—did I have no misgivings? No thoughts of the possibility of a family likeness? I did; but I deliberately refused to entertain them, and inhospitably drove them out as soon they presented themselves.

But one day fate willed that (unlike the dog in the fable) I should drop my shadow for a substance. I was in the cathedral on Sunday afternoon, listeuing to the chaunting of the singers hidden in the choir, when suddenly catching the dull sound of the closing of the baize-covered door behind me, I looked round involuntarily, and saw such a pretty face, that I secretly felt it (in spite of my philosophy) to be worth all the shadows in the world. I will not describe it; first, because those romancists who delight to catalogue each separate item of beauty, with all the minuteness of a slave merchant haggling with the Sultan's eunuch, have never yet been able to present to my imagination the total of a human face: and next, because to describe it in detail would give a false impression of that sudden glance in which, without taking account of the character of her nose, or the color of her eyes, I saw that she was beautiful. Into the poor-box I saw her drop a coin, and, let the truth be told, without any apparent desire to conceal her charity from the world. Then she passed on; and taking one of the straw chairs in the middle of the nave, and balancing it on two legs, as is customary in French churches, leaned over the back of it, and in that devout posture, began (as I charitably hoped) to say her prayers. And now, as I sat behind her, a symmetrical figure, dressed in black, a lace veil flung back, as well as a pair of chocolate-colored boots, became deeply interesting. "The tyranny of material forms," as a German philosopher would say, "was re-established." How could a poor shadow, a mere negation of light: a nothing, owing its existence (if it could be called an existence) solely to the juxtaposition of a something, prevail against these attractions, which, in a bar of wintry sunlight, falling through the high-arched window, were each a reality, with a shadow into the bargain? Assuredly, if I had thought of my shadow in that moment, the probability of some resemblance, however small, existing between a brother and a sister, would have seemed to me to have increased ten-fold.

The attendant was lighting the candles, when she rose to go away, passing me again so closely that she brushed my foot with her dress, and by that wondrous touch rendered me entirely deaf to the singing in the choir. When the baize-covered door slammed to again, and the singing in the choir broke out afresh, the hymn that they were chaunting was such a worthless, old-fashioned, hackuied tune, sung with such preposterous energy and noise, that it was intolerable. Had not my thoughts been occupied with the chocolate boots, I had assuredly not endured it so long. "How jarring," thought I, as I walked on tip-toe towards the baize-covered door, "is this tasteless music; in a church more rich in workmanship than the bridal lace veil of a queen."

O daughters of the early world, whose ears and fingers yielded gold enough to make a monstrous idol! not less than you, the Norman woman worships gauds and trinkets. As I came out from the cathedral porch, behold! I saw a pair of chocolate boots standing quite still in the light from a shop front—the very first of a row of jewellers' windows, all glittering, shameless, in the Sabbath afternoon. It was but for a moment, but the pang that it caused me was the first penalty I paid for my interest in a substance. When the chocolate-colored boots walked away, I walked away, too; and, as it happened, by the same street. I was not following them. I merely took the way to my home; but, through street after street, the owner of the boots kept still before me, till she turned at last into the Rue D'Aimette. Drawing nearer to the house where I had so often seen the shadow on the blind, a hope that hardly dared declare itself made my heart throb like wine poured out of a narrow-necked bottle. Only a few yards from the door, she looked back for a moment and hesitated. Perhaps she thought that some one had followed her. A child watching a spinning teetotum dying out upon the line that separates a prize from a blank, knows something of the anxiety that I felt at that moment. But I was soon relieved. I saw her distinctly enter the very house, and in spite of all doubts which (considering the great number of families always living in a large house in France) I might reasonably have cherished still, I decided at once that this was the identical substance of the shadow I had worshipped.

With what anxiety did I watch the blind that night! fancying how, if by some transmigration I could become that bird, I would pretend to be asleep like him, and sometimes hear her talking secrets to herself, or humming tunes, or laughing suddenly at some recollection, and many other notions of the kind, none of which had ever come into my head till I fell away from the wiser form of shadow worship. But that time I think she sat behind the light, for I saw nothing but the bird-cage, and I went to bed in an ill-humor, having said bitter things against my landlady, because my candle, being loosely set up, fell out of its socket as I walked with it across the room.

Having now, as I believed, seen the original of the shadow, my passion began to ripen fast. No more fogs compelled me to visit the porter again; for which reason I determined to visit him without compulsion, and renew our conversation.

"Good morning, Mr. Grégoire."

"Good morning, sir."

"You were saying, 'that if I should wish—'"

"Yes; I remember. To see a really pretty girl, you should go the cathedral any Sunday afternoon"—

"I know," I interrupted. "A young lady of common height, black hair and eyes, small nose, clear skin, black shawl and dress, and a pair of chocolate boots."

"And wears a bonnet," he added; the latter article being extremely rare in Rouen at that time, and generally considered as a mark of great gentility.

"M. Grégoire," said I, "a place where I may see so beautiful a face, any Sunday afternoon, is worth knowing. It is no fault of yours that I accidentally discovered this before you had an opportunity of completing your information. I am not so mean as to take advantage of this fact. Do me the favor—if you are a loyal man—of accepting a portrait of his majesty King Louis Philippe."

Mr. Grégoire took a bright five-franc piece that I gave him; and, gently remonstrating, deposited it in a greasy leathern bag, which he drew from somewhere under his blonse: while I, having laid this foundation of our friendship, and judging it well to pretend to have at present no other feeling than curiosity towards the owner of the chocolate boots, said, "Ah, well! Beauty does not interest me. A mere shadow has been hitherto the object of my gallantry. I think I can dispense with anything more substantial at present."

This must have been quite unintelligible to Mr. Grégoire, but he was a quiet man and "nil admirari" (though he did not know how to say it in Latin) was his motto. This was all that passed between us at this interview.

For six days I saw the shadow on the blind; and on the seventh I met the substance in the cathedral; which seemed to me now like a very great deal of dry bread to a very small quantity of sack. On the eighth day I entered the porter's lodge again, with a nosegay and a letter, and another five-franc piece.

"Monsieur Grégoire," I said, with a little hesitation, "if you do me the favor to give this note and these flowers privately into the hands of the lady they are addressed to."

"Mademoiselle La Roche!" he exclaimed, with apparent surprise, the superscription catching his eye.

"I have know her long," I said, thinking to relieve him of responsibility in having previously given me information about her: "that is to say, her shadow."

"Her shadow?" said the porter, looking puzzled.

"Yes. Her window, you know, is opposite mine."

"It is."

"On the blind of that window, long before I knew Mademoiselle La Roche, I used to see and take an interest in her shadow. So, you see, although you first gave me her name, and told me that that ugly fellow was her brother, our acquaintance is not your fault."

"Englishmen are so eccentric," said the porter.

I felt tempted to unfold to him a little of my theory of shadow worship, but recollecting the fate of the whimsical author of A Journey Round My Room, who, having begun to explain philosophically a simple question from his manservant, stopped short on perceiving that his pains were thrown away, and was thence triumphantly supposed to have been posed by the latter, I determined rather to submit to be considered eccentric.

"I may depend on you," I said.

"My word of honor," replied Mr. Grégoire, with the grace and dignity of a crowned king. My candle might have fallen out of its socket many times that night, before I could have found it in my heart to say a bitter thing against my landlady. I had seen my shadow again, and the bird-cage, and—what was more important than all that night—I had also seen the shadow of a nosegay in a vase, placed between the light and the window, according to a request in my letter. Three days after—I know not by what means—I received a note.

"Sir—Your whimsical description of your interest in my shadow has amused me so much, that I have tried to persuade myself that there can be no harm in receiving from a stranger so pure and graceful a present as a few flowers. I placed them near the window last night, as you requested. You say you have seen me lately. I entreat you to avoid meeting me at present. You, who have so long shown yourself capable of silence must promise me to remain strictly faithful to my shadow for—say six months. By-and-by you shall know the reason of all this. Meanwhile, if you obey me, it will be a strong proof of your sincerity. But, above all, do not make the porter of the house in which I live your confidant in this matter. Address me, in future, at my friend Mademoiselle Polart's, Rue Robee, No. 8. My brother has already seen you in the 'loge,' and he is very suspicious.

"Marie Stuart La Roche."

"Six months!" I repeated, as I finished the reading of this letter. "Would that I had to toil seven years, as Jacob toiled for Rachel; that you might see the strength and endurance of my love. I read it a dozen times, and wondered if a Frenchman, who had been familiar with the words from childhood, could see more meaning in them than I did. I analyzed even the subscription—the heartless French form of "assurance of esteem and distinguished consideration," which I have not thought it worth while to transcribe, and found a meaning in every word. But that constant craving, which distinguished my new sentiment from its original form, began to trouble me. A shadow every day, with the occasional feast of a letter, seemed to me a very spare diet for a strong, hearty, growing passion like mine. The love of Jacob for Rachel, I felt, must have been of a very cool, business-like character, and not at all to be compared with mine. "I must have been a fool," thought I, "to think of pleasing a Frenchwoman, by being ready to wait for her any length of time." Before I went to bed that night I had despatched another letter to the address she had indicated. This was her reply:

"Sir—I assure you that your idea of my brother's character is quite a mistake. He is no tyrant. If I condemn myself, at present, to almost total seclusion, it is because I feel it to be necessary for his sake. I may confide to you the fact, that his present occupation is such that we cannot admit strangers here—not even a servant. Judge, then, how necessary to him is the presence of one upon whose prudence he knows he can depend. Adieu. Be discreet and patient.

"Marie Stuart La Roche."

Here was a tantalising mystery, indeed! Her brother's occupation required a beautiful and accomplished girl to shut herself up (except going to church once a week) for six months, never so much as showing her face at the window, save when the blind was down at night. What honest business could explain that? Was that monster—as far removed from her in mind as in body—persuading an inexperienced girl to aid him in some dishonorable pursuits; bringing her, perhaps, to ruin with him? Was he a midnight robber or assassin? I thought of his herculean form, and of some mysterious murders lately committed in the streets of the city, and pictured him stealing up the dark staircase at night—like Cardillac, the jeweller—fresh from some horrible deed. This must be it: unless he was a coiner. Yes; he might be a coiner; he was a coiner; I had no doubt of it. Till, lying in bed awake, it struck me that he was, perhaps, a political conspirator. This would account for the desire for privacy. He had papers about. He was making an infernal machine. It would not do for his sister to expose her beauty to the world, and attract strangers to watch about there. Otherwise, what was there particularly dangerous in my being in the porter's lodge? This milder hypothesis seemed to me a sudden inspiration. "She is in hourly danger," I said; "dark plots are forming around her: barrels of gunpowder are under her bed. Her brother, with horrible imprecations, forbids her to pry into their contents. She sees a dreadful machine with rows of iron barrels, and is told to ask no questions. Her brother mysteriously implores her to keep at home, and like a noble, self-sacrificing creature, she renounces all for him."

My suspicions became more and more painful; but I did not dare to hint them to her. In spite of her injunction, I watched in the cathedral unobserved, and saw her again, dressed exactly as before. I thought she was paler, and her face haunted me. The next night, I watched till I saw the door of the porter's lodge open, and I glided in and crept up the stairs. I thought, if I could listen at the door a moment, and perhaps hear her voice, which I had never heard yet, it would be a relief. There was a lamp on the staircase, but it was nearly burnt out, and I groped my way up in the dark. I listened at her door, but could hear nothing. A light came through the keyhole, and a curiosity—which was perhaps my secret motive in coming there—prompted me to look through. But I was disappointed. I could see no one, nor anything more suspicious than a fireplace and a picture on the wall.

I was turning my eye from side to side, to get as wide a range of sight over the room as possible, and was wholly absorbed in my expectation of seeing something remarkable, when I felt myself suddenly grasped by both arms from behind.

"I know you," said a voice, "though we are in the dark. I am tempted to throw you headlong down the well of the staircase."

"Let go," I said, struggling.

"Scoundrel! spy!" he exclaimed.

"Let go!" I repeated, still striving in his terrible gripe, "and I will explain my conduct frankly."

"I know your purpose," he replied, giving me a sudden swing round that hurled me against the opposite wall, and taking my place at the door. "I suspected you the first time I saw you. You have been prying here before."

Scarcely waiting to hear his last words, I felt so exasperated with his violence, that I rushed at him, and struck him several times with my fist. Immediately after, the blows of a stick began to fall upon my back and shoulders, like the strokes of two blacksmiths beating at the same piece of iron on an anvil. Warding off the blows with my arm, I rushed at him again; but a second time he hurled me against the wall, and suddenly opening the door, he entered and closed it in my face, turning the key.

My position was embarrassing. To batter the door would have been as ridiculous as to have been caught listening there. I resolved to retreat, and meditate some scheme for vengeance at leisure. I walked about the streets for some time, and thought of the stanzas in Corneille's tragedy, in which the Cid describes the conflict of love and honor, when called upon to avenge the insults of Don Gomez. From this, it will be supposed that my bruises were not of a serious character: but my humiliation was great. I would have given an Aldine copy of Erasmus, with the signature of Montaigne upon the title page (if I had possessed a copy of Erasmus with that valuable addition,) to have known whether his sister was in her room during our fracas. I passed by the window and saw a light there, but no shadow. I determined to go home and write a long letter, in which I hinted my suspicions of her danger, and entreated her to confide all to me.

Her reply was longer coming this time. Meanwhile, the horrible brother haunted me; I compared him to that furious and unreasonable genii, who would hear no explanation from the unfortunate merchant, who, peacefully eating his meal by the wayside, and flinging his date stones over his shoulder, had unintentionally knocked out his miserable one eye. There was cunning, malignity, and injustice, and even a consciousness of supernatural power, all to be discerned in that hideous countenance, that I had never forgotten since the moment when it suddenly appeared, set in the frame of the porter's doorway. I knew he had not walked up the stairs when he found me at the door: I must have heard him if he had. He was probably at a few thousands of leagues distance, engaged in some nefarious business; when knowing by some means that I was looking through his keyhole, he vanished, and in a moment reappeared behind me on the landing. This might naturally have led me to suspect that his sister was some wrinkled old hag, whom his magic art made beautiful, in whatever eyes he pleased; but it did not. And, herein, I cannot blame myself, consistently with my philosophy of illusion. For I hold that Titania was blessed even in her love for Bottom, the weaver, and was not at all to be pitied until the spell was broken.

This was the third letter that I received from Miss La Roche:

"Sir—I am much grieved that you should have suffered from my brother's violence on my account. How could you be so mad as to enter the house, after I had told you the danger? My brother is very unreasonable, but you must be patient with him, and forgive him, as I do, for my sake. I will explain to you everything, as I might have done at first, if I had forseen this misfortune. My brother, I assure you again, bears no resemblance to the monster which your imagination has pictured him. His personal defects, I am sure, do not prejudice you against him; and his slight failings, in other respects, I think you will forgive when you know him better. Listen, then, to the simple explanation of the mystery which has so troubled you. Five years ago, my brother was a chemist; he served the dyers with ingredients for dyeing. One day he heard that Jacob Garcia, a Spaniard, had discovered a new scarlet of more brilliancy than had hitherto been known, and that he had sold his secret for a million of francs. My brother's mind was captivated, and he began to experimentalise for further improvements. The pursuit became a passion; he gave up his business and came to Rouen, our native city, to continue his experiments in secret. Drawing near (as he assures me) to the attainment of his object, he is become, after five years research, more and more anxious lest his secret should be stolen from him. For this reason he never allows any stranger to enter here. His apparatus and materials are always exposed, and the slightest trace, he imagines, might afford a clue to his mystery. I have told him that he exaggerates the danger, but his anxiety only increases. It has become almost a mania; and his eccentric and irritable nature, I feel, will not be improved till his labors are ended.

"This, sir, is why I entreat you, at present, to be contented with my shadow.

"Marie Stuart La Roche."

Here was a reasonable explanation. Why, of course, I might have guessed all this, but for an unfortunate propensity to imagine marvels. How could I sufficiently apologize to this noble and disinterested girl for my absurd suspicions? Her wise and gentle tone, her devotedness to her brother, her compassion for failings—that highest proof of a thoughtful mind—made me ashamed of my own weakness. I wrote to her again, promising to wait patiently, and excusing my folly on the plea of my anxiety for her welfare; and assuring her that since her explanation, I felt the highest respect and esteem for her brother. I confess, however, that my antipathy for him was not diminished, and if I happened to go out late, I had no desire whatever to meet him in our lonely street.

My labors in the library were now ended, and nothing but my shadowy correspondent retained me in Rouen. One Sunday I resolved again to watch for her in the cathedral, concealing myself as before. She came as usual, and wore chocolate boots again. Standing behind a pillar, I saw her once more go out by the baize-covered door. When I thought that she had time enough to disappear, I went out also. But, as I stood in the porch again, I saw her, to my astonishment, standing with a stranger, talking, in the very centre of the market-place. Could it be possible that this story of her brother's pursuits was but an ingenious fiction intended to deceive me, and prevent me, for some purpose, discovering that she had another lover? I could not believe that. It must be some relative. She had said that they were natives of Rouen; they had, of course, connections in the city.

She took his arm, and they walked away together, while I followed them at a distance, determined to note any further indications of the nature of their acquaintance. Keeping close in the shadow of the houses, in a narrow lane, I saw the stranger place his arm around her waist, which she suffered without resisting, and they walked on thus till they came to the street in which she lived. There they stopped, as if deeming it imprudent to go further together, and stood again talking for some time at the corner of the lane. At last I saw them embrace each other, so long and earnestly, that I felt the evidence of her treachery to be complete; and finally they separated, and walked away, in opposite directions, in the same street.

I had never imagined such duplicity. Such a beautiful girl to turn out the cunningest hypocrite I had ever met with! All my old suspicions of her horrible brother were at once revived. I shuddered to think what might have been her real motive in trying to keep my passion alive for six months. Perhaps to give her time to draw one victim into her brother's power, before beginning with me. At any rate, I resolved to overtake her, and tax her at once with her faithlessness, in order to remove all grounds for doubts. So I walked after her rapidly till within a few yards of her, when she heard my footsteps and turned round.

"Is that you, Adolphe?" she said, for the overhanging roofs made it quite dark upon the pathway.

"No," I answered, coming forward. "It is I—another of your lovers—your shadow-worshipper. You know me."

"There is some mistake, sir," she said, evidently trembling. "The darkness has deceived you."

"No," I answered, "there is no mistake;" for I took her trembling for a sort of guilt. "I am your simple correspondent, to whom you told that pleasant story about the dye. Do you not blush a deeper scarlet than Jacob Garcia ever discovered?"

"I don't know what you mean, sir, by Jacob Garcia?" she interrupted.

"Jacob Garcia, the Spaniard, I mean: he who set your fiendish brother's head a-fire, till he gave up the chemistry business, and shut himself up with you, and became very irritable, and could not bear you to look out of the window."

"Indeed, sir," she said, "there is some mistake. I have no brother. I don't understand you. Pray let me go."

"I am not mistaken," I persisted. "You think I have only seen you once; but I have watched you many times in the cathedral. I have discovered your duplicity, this very night. Miss La Roche," I continued impressively, intending to warn her of the results of such faithlessness—

"No, sir, indeed," she interrupted, "that is not my name. I have heard that name somewhere—I don't know where. My name is Mademoiselle Antoinette: my other name is Duchemin."

"Ay, ay," said I, "you have a lively fancy. You can invent names—whole histories when you please. Serpent, confess that you know who I am."

"For shame!" she said, beginning to shed tears; "you would not dare to insult me thus, if Adolphe were near. He would kill you on the spot."

"Your tears betray you," I said, with the stern perseverance of Milton's Samson; "I am satisfied. Henceforth—"

But my manner becoming very impressive at this point, she shrank back in alarm; and then, seizing the opportunity, she darted away, and in a moment disappeared through the entrance to her house.

In spite of my philosophical theories, I felt compelled to take the ordinary view of things which, in calmer moments, I should have undoubtedly rejected. I was, in short, vexed at having been her dupe, and tempted to rush up the stairs again, and provoke her Goliah of a brother to instant combat. I felt that I could have returned from the fight, carrying in my hand his hideous head (with the expression of contemptuous defiance with which he began the strife still upon its features,) swinging it to and fro, by its long black hair, with very great satisfaction. It would have been sweet to hang his scalp at my girdle. I could have very great pleasure in drinking beer out of his skull in the Scandinavian paradise. All which ideas passed through my mind while I was crossing the road, and before I had caught sight of my shadow, seated as usual on its shadowy chair. When I saw this, my mind was troubled. She had not had time to mount the stairs and take off her bonnet; I suspected that the brother's magic was again employed to deceive me: but the bare possibility of the porter having made some mistake occurred to me, and I crossed the road again, and entered the lodge.

"Mr. Grégoire," I said, "did you not tell me that the name of my opposite neighbor is La Roche?"

"Without doubt."

"And that she was to be seen in the cathedral any Sunday afternoon; that she was of common height; had black hair and eyes; wore chocolate boots; and never appeared without a bonnet?"

"Pardon," replied the porter; "you confound two people. I spoke then of Mademoiselle Antoinette—a very different person."

"But I was speaking of Miss La Roche. You told me that was my neighbor's name."

"I did. But, said I, if you wish to see a really pretty young woman, look at Mademoiselle Antoinette, or rather I meant to say so when you stopped me."

I was confounded.

"Monsieur is so hasty—so very eccentric," said the porter, following up his advantage. "But you said you knew Mademoiselle La Roche; and it was not for me to say anything against her.

"Against her!" said I. "What is there to be said against her? Speak; I shall not be offended. You may depend upon my secrecy."

"Mademoiselle La Roche is a very good young woman," replied Mr. Grégoire, shrugging his shoulders; "and they say a very sensible young woman."

"But in face," said I, instinctively interpreting the shrug of his shoulders, "is the very counterpart of her horrible brother. Is it not so?"

"Not quite so ugly," said the porter, shrugging his shoulders again.

That shrug was sufficient. I fled precipitately, and the next morning departed for Paris, without having seen or desiring to see the object of my truly shadowy passion.

THE BIG TREES OF CALAVERAS.

MEASUREMENTS were made in August last of the height and circumference of the most noted of the "Big Trees" (Sequoia Gigantea) by Charles J. Jackson, M. D., and Mr. Joseph B. Meader, who report as follows:

"We were provided with a Sir H. Douglas reflecting semi-circle, a reflecting level and a measuring tape, and by means of these instruments have made quite accurate measurements.

The horizontal point, or level, was first ascertained on each tree by means of the reflecting level, and the angle was measured to that point, and the difference of level was corrected for in each case By means of the tape the base lines were determined, and the circumference of each tree, at least six feet above the ground, or where the tree took its proper form, was measured. Sir H. Douglas' reflecting semi-circle is made so as to protract the angles, and it carries also a scale for measurement of the triangles protracted.

In several instances we repeated the measurements, with different basis, especially in those where too high an angle introduced the error of refraction of the glass of the mirrors.

WEALTH OF THE ITALIAN CHURCHES.—The Unita Italiana states, on what it considers good authority, that in the churches of the Italian secular clergy there are more than 500,000 pounds weight of silver, and 20,000 of gold; in the churches of the regular orders, 800,000 pounds of silver, and 18,000 of gold; in the Church of Loretto, 7,000 pounds of silver and 4,000 of gold; in that of St. Dominie, at Soriano, in Calabria, 5,000 pounds of silver, and 1,500 of gold. The value of the precious stones amounts to above twenty millions of francs.

ONE of the most extraordinary assassinations on record is that of Begbie, a bank runner in Edinburgh, who was stabbed to the heart at noonday, about sixty years since, and robbed of a large sum in notes. Of this, Sir W. Scott said, in 1813: "If ever this crime comes to light it will be through the circumstance of an idle young fellow having written part of a playhouse song on one of the notes, which, however, has as yet never appeared in circulation. The murder is still a mystery."

"How long did Adam remain in Paradise before he sinned?" said an amiable spouse to her husband. "Till he got a wife," was the calm reply.

THEATRICAL TALK.

MY prophecy has come true, and Vestvali is acknowledged as "the magnificent" by all. That she was not generally endorsed as a great actress on her first appearance, was owing to her appearing in a trashy melo-dramatic character. In the part of "Gamea," she displayed original talent of a high order. Her expressive countenance and the sly, cunning glances of her eyes while pretending to tell the fortunes of the villagers, were a perfect study for the physiognomist, and the ease with which she threw off the character of the vagabond fortune-teller with the tawdry garb, and appeared costumed in regal splendor with the air and mien of a queen was grandly striking. Vestvali's impersonation of "Gamea" is a triumph of genius and a most artistic study. The play was admirably put on the stage, and the choruses were very effectively rendered by members of the late opera troupe, who were engaged for the occasion. Mrs. Sophie Edwin played the character of "Guelia" charmingly, and in the last scene displayed much tragic power. Mr. Charles Thorne played "Rutchioui" excellently well, but we are sorry to observe that he is falling into the habit of imitating Frank Mayo, when playing characters in which that actor formerly appeared. Mr. Charles Thorne is fully capable of forming as good a conception of a character as Mr. Mayo or perchance a better, in many cases, than the late leading man of the Opera House company was able to do. Mr. Thorne has the making of a really fine actor in him; he should be careful to avoid imitating the faults of another—and that other one whose talent was not of a sufficiently original order to serve as a desirable model for a young actor. On Wednesday, Mlle Vestvali was suddenly indisposed, and Boucicault's patch-work drama of the Streets of New York was substituted for Gamea. On Thursday, a drama entitled the Wicklow Rebel, founded on the same incidents as Boucicault's Arrah-na-Pogue, was produced to a good house. It is a creditable dramatization of the story, as published by De Witt, of New York, but still not a good drama. Mrs. Sophie Edwin played the heroine, "Arrah Meelish," with considerable spirit and vivacity. Mr. Aldrich, who undertook that of "Beamish M'Coul" at short notice, played it very creditably, and quite gained the sympathy of the audience. Mr. Franks played "Shaun the Post" very effectively, and the play, as a whole, had justice done it; it will be repeated this afternoon and evening. The play of The Fool and his Master, in which Mlle Vestvali will make her reappearance, is in rehearsal, and will be produced next week.

At Wheatleigh's Eureka, the Colleen Baun was played in splendid style, and drew very fairly until Wednesday evening, when it was withdrawn, and a very long and very good bill was presented, Mrs. Annie Yeamans taking her first benefit in California on that occasion. Every one who has observed the care and attention which this meritorious young actress has invariably bestowed on the faithful rendition of even the smallest character entrusted to her, was pleased to see the house crowded, and know that the benefit was a substantial one. Mrs. Yeamans has of late evinced a talent in eccentric roles, such as that of "Waddilove" in the Jubilee House, which has quite taken people by surprise; she is a clever, reliable, and useful actress. Mrs. Alicia Mandeville Thorne made her first appearance at this house in the character of "Lizette," in the musical farce of The Swiss Cottage. She received a hearty greeting, and her charming singing drew much applause. Mrs. Yeaman's "Natz Tieck" was a perfect study, and was fully appreciated by the audience. The Jubilee House concluded the evening's performance; a new feature was introduced in this: Miss Jennie Yeamans, aged about four years, I should judge, made her first bow to the public, appearing as a young "Waddilove;" she behaved herself like a little corpulent angel, and was much applauded. This entertainment terminated the theatrical season at the Eureka. The preparations being made for the production of Boucicault's great drama of Arrah-na-Pogue at the Metropolitan Theatre, on Monday next, are of the most costly and extraordinary description. The play will be produced under the general supervision of Mr. James Dowling, while the beautiful scenery, which is all being painted expressly for this play, is the work of Mr. Torning. An entirely original and beautiful effect is introduced, namely: the light of the fire and moonlight are seen at the same time in different parts of the stage. This is effected by the use of a strong electric light. The tower scene in the last act is one of the grandest and most startling effects ever produced on the stage. "Shaun the Post," in effecting his escape, has to descend a wall ninety feet high, by clinging to the ivy; a terrific sensation is produced by the ivy giving way and "Shaun's" being precipitated headlong. All the members of the company, cast in this piece, are at the present time absolutely perfect in their parts, and but one more rehearsal will take place before the drama is produced.

Mrs. Sedley Brown, who came here from New York under engagement to Mr. Wheatleigh for the express purpose of appearing in the character of the heroine, "Arrah-na-Pogue," brings with her a most enviable reputation, both as an actress and in private life. She possesses talent of the most versatile description, and is said to be one of the most charming soubrette actresses on the American stage. The cast is fully satisfactory, and the play will be produced and performed in a style hitherto unattempted in California.

TOUCHSTONE.

[For the Californian.]

POPULAR FALLACIES.—No. 4.

"LIBRA" must needs continue his dissertations, or he may seem to be utterly pulverized by the weight of "Arrastra's" blows. Your correspondent just named, in his reply to "Libra," in last week's CALIFORNIAN, claims first, as his title to being heard, that he is one of your oldest subscribers. Now, we have a great respect for age, and considerable tenderness for its privileges, and we will not dispute "Arrastra's" claim to senility. You may have many aged subscribers, but we will readily concede to this one the pre-eminence. Not wishing to contest any point in which we can honestly agree with him, and glad to find some common ground of belief, we would even go so far as to acknowledge that he was born before the invention of the art of printing, and educated in the dark ages.

"Arrastra" takes alarm at the tendency of our humble articles as "calculated to sap the foundations of all our established notions, and to wipe out the first lessons of our childhood." Now, one business of mature years, we take to be, to unlearn the false notions of youth and inexperience, and to substitute in their place broader and truer views and profounder convictions. If it were not so, our life would be in vain, and our condition stationary, if not retrograde—certainly not progressive. Our critic, with charming facetiousness, recommends us to write a new geography and persuade the Board of Education to abolish the old ones. This we should be delighted to do, if time and opportunity offered; but "Arrastra" is, perhaps, hardly aware of the improvements in text books since his school days. He was, doubtless, taught that there was a wonderful whirlpool off the coast of Norway, called a maelstrom, by which whales and ships, and hosts of people, school-boys and others, were annually sucked in. This used to be represented on all the maps by a series of curved rings, and, if it has served no other purpose, has furnished a standard simile for the vortex of crime, with its gradual approaches and final irresistible attraction.

But it is noticeable that the geographies omit to mention or to represent it now-a-days, and why? Because recent navigators find that there is nothing of the kind, or nothing more than a strong current between two islands—like that called "Hell Gate," in East River channel—which current is perfectly safe for small boats in ordinary weather, and only becomes dangerous in storms or during strong westerly winds. The love of the marvelous and the pleasure of exaggerating led successive story-tellers to make a maelstrom out of a mill stream.

But what a pity to have this lesson of our childhood "wiped out!" How painful to find we can no longer believe in the maelstrom, or Munchausen, or Sinbad, or Santa Claus! Oh for the simple faith of childhood!

"Arrastra" finds our explanation of the direction in which a child's hands point when facing the north, and extending the arms at right angles to the body, to be obscure and unintelligible. We have known a faithful teacher reply to the complaint of a parent in regard to the slow progress of a dull pupil, that it was not the teacher's duty to impart brains as well as instruction.

"Arrastra" thinks he might have borne a good many things in silence, but he could not give up the fond hope of being one day eaten by worms. He might relinquish other outposts of belief, but here is his citadel; here he makes a stand; here he plants himself on what he calls "the traditionary faith of the fathers," and says to all assailants, "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further; and here shall thy proud waves be stayed!" We will not try to shake his position or lead him to change his base. Let him have his worms, and exult in the prospect of furnishing some day a cold meal to creeping things.

But lo! "Arrastra" becomes prophetic, and says, "If this new light in philosophy goes on in this way, insulting common sense with his parodoxes, the next thing we may expect him to tell us will be, that two pints do not make one quart, or that one from two leaves three, or some such nonsense." Now, dear "Arrastra," two pints do not always make a quart. There are several exceptions to that rule. We will only mention one, which you can perhaps understand and easily verify: A pint of sulphuric acid added to a pint of water will not make a quart in the mixture. Try it and see; but don't burn your precious fingers in the experiment, for considerable latent heat is set free in the attendant condensation. Again, if "Arrastra" can refer to one of the leaves in his father's family bible, which separates the books of the old covenant from those of the new, and which chronicles the date of his advent into this world of facts and fallacies, he may be able to realize that there are cases where one from two leaves—we will not say precisely three—but call it two and a quarter.

"Arrastra" does not like our pseudonym, and draws from it all sorts of funny inferences as to our sex, disposition, pretensions, etc. "What's in a name?" says Shakspeare. A great deal, says "Arrastra."

Now, we like our opponent's signature. It is significant and appropriate. It calls to mind a clumsy old Mexican machine, in which a great deal of force is expended to little purpose. Stick to your "Arastra," most worthy conservative friend, and frown upon stamp mills and steam power, and all new-fangled notions.

It is true, as you say, that "Antiquity has set up a great many lights along our pathway." Some of them were false lights, however; some have gone out long ago—died out, or been extinguished; others are waning, and some that ought to be put out are still in full blaze, burning only to mislead. Shall we refuse petroleum because tallow once served our purpose, or shall we use the best light attainable?

It was long an axiom in philosophy, that "Nature abhors a vacuum," and this furnished a convenient explanation of the suction pump, till Torricelli's experiments, in 1643, demonstrated the weight and pressure of the atmosphere, and dispelled this ignis fatuus.

It used to be thought that the water on the Pacific side of the continent was higher than on the Atlantic side, till surveys and levellings across the Isthmus proved the contrary.

Many persons still cling to the belief that the moon governs the weather, presides over seed-time and harvest, and in a variety of ways influences the affairs of men and women, notwithstanding the thorough and repeated refutations of these notions by such physicists as Dionysius Lardner and others. Well, let them hug their delusions if they will. After all, there is something attractive in the ready credulity, the unquestioning trustfulness, which accepts on testimony or tradition so many false doctrines. And yet there is wisdom in the rule not to believe more than half of what you hear—or more than a quarter of what you see, if you are looking at a fashionably dressed female.

There is a favorite and very spirited engraving which represents "Napoleon crossing the Alps," mounted on a fiery steed, who is rearing with impatience and seemingly eager to clear the highest peak at a bound. Now, we suppose when "Arrastra" looks at this picture, he takes it for a faithful representation of the great hero's passage; but the sober truth of history is that the great commander made the ascent—like other sensible people not anxious to break their necks—on the back of a patient, plodding mule, which was led by a guide who walked in advance.

But we must leave "Arrastra" imbedded in his ancient opinions like a fossil elephant in Arctic ice, or like a slow toad hermetically sealed up in a rock while the swift years are changing the face of the earth and new forms of life and of truth are garnishing the changing vesture of the world of nature and of thought.

But here we find ourselves using, as an illustration, another popular fallacy, for scientific naturalists discredit the stories of toads having lived utterly deprived of air and nourishment.*

Light is diffusive, and one might as well attempt to bar up the gates of day as to check the advance of new opinions. One generation overthrows the theories of a preceding. History is constantly obliged to reverse her decisions. A new jury renders a new verdict. The martyr of yesterday becomes the saint of to-day. The so-called fanatic turns out a prophet. Mahomet, long derided as a simple imposter, is shown to have been a reformer, who introduced a better order of things. Cromwell, ridiculed for two hundred years as a hypocrite, is enshrined as a Christian patriot and hero.

Retaining the best products of the past, a wise man discards outgrown forms and fallacious opinions, as the thrifty tree sheds its old bark, when it expands to larger proportions.

A SINGULAR and painful incident happened recently at the Royal Theatre in Berlin. A new ballet by Taglioni, named Sardanapalus, was represented, in the last scene of which all the dancers appear and arrange themselves around "Sardanapalus" to die with him in the flames. To produce the necessary smoke, stones were heated and water was to be thrown upon them. The stones were laid between the seats, but the dancers, instead of sitting upon the seats, sat down on the burning stones. A scream of pain followed, which was not in the play. Nearly all of them were badly burned.

ONE of the Hanlon brothers met with a fearful but, fortunately, not serious accident, while in the course of his acrobatic performances in the Cincinnati Opera House last month. In attempting to grasp a rope, at the conclusion of the dangerous echelle feat, he fell to the stage with fearful momentum, rolling over, unconscious and bleeding, into the parquet. He soon recovered, and a surgeon pronounced his injuries not of a dangerous character.

THE PANSY.

THERE are few flowers which exhibit so forcibly the extraordinary improvement which may be effected in form, size and color, by diligent cultivation and hybridizing, as the Pansy. It was introduced to the region of fancy flowers by Lady Monck, in 1812, and since that date what an immense number of superb varieties have been produced! It is only necessary to place a flower of the wild Viola tricolor side by side with one of our present garden varieties, to comprehend at a glance the mighty improvement it has undergone. Ever since it was taken in hand by the florists, it has maintained its popularity, and bids fair to continue it for many a generation yet to come. The favorite situation of the wild Pansy is that in which it is partially shaded from the heat of the mid-day sun and the wind; it is frequently met with in the fields and meadows, and is one of the gems of our native flora. It is found in the Old and New World, where it is always regarded with affection by the tillers of the soil. That our ancestors admired and loved it, is evident from the number of endearing names it was called by at various periods, in different parts of the country. "Three Faces Under a Hood," "Herb Trinity," (on account of the three colors and the three divisions of the flowers,) "Love in Idleness," and "Kit Run-about," are a few of them. The name, however, by which it is now commonly known, and the most loving of all, is Heart's-Ease, a name by which the poet speaks of it:

> "There is a little flower that's found
> In almost every garden ground;
> 'Tis lowly, but 'tis sweet;
> And if its name express its power,
> A more invaluable flower
> You'll never, never meet."

How it obtained the name of Heart's-Ease is a mystery; but the poets have attributed such a romantic appellation to various causes:

> "I said in every garden ground—
> Perhaps in Eden 'twas not found,
> For then it was not wanted;
> But soon as sin and sorrow came,
> The flower received its gladdening name,
> By mercy's angel planted."

However, Herrick assigns its origin to a very different cause:

> "Frolic virgins once there were,
> Over-loving, living here:
> Being here their ends denied,
> Ran for sweethearts mad and died.
> Love, in pity for their tears,
> And their loss in blooming years,
> For their restless here-spent hours,
> Gave them heart's-ease turned to flowers."

The most elegant name by which it is at present known is Pansy. This word came originally from the French pensee, signifying thought; and it is in this sense that it is ever regarded by writers. So that, besides its heart-healing virtues, this little flower has other good qualities attributed to it:

> "Are not Pansies emblems meet for thought?
> The pure, the checquered—gay and deep by turns:
> A line for every mood the bright things wear
> In their soft velvet coats."

Shakspeare alludes to this meaning in his Hamlet, where "Ophelia" says, as she distributes her flowers, "There's rosemary—that's for remembrance: and there is pansy—that's for thought." And truly the sight of this lovely flower is a meet subject for reflection, and ought to suggest many a thought of love, admiration, and gratitude to Him who has bestowed it so lavishly that it may be found in every peasant's garden plot, and formed it so exquisitely that it ornaments even the castle's proud parterre. Here, then, is one of those links that binds all classes of men together—a little, finely-moulded organization, which elicits alike the admiration of young and old, rich and poor, speaking to them in its mute eloquence of the hand which bestows its greatest bounties alike on all men—of Him whose "tender mercies are over all his works." It was an ancient custom in France to present a bride with a bouquet of Pansies or Thoughts, and Marigolds or Cares, which would seem to hint rather at the difficulties to be encountered in after-life than at the present joy experienced. The flowers worn round the brow of the bride in the present day are said to suggest similar reflections:

> "For they are omens—many anxious years
> Are in the wreath that binds the bridal veil."

Pansies are not difficult to cultivate, as they will grow in common garden soil with little attention, but, if it is desired to grow them for specimen flowers, they must be sheltered from the winds and the heat of the mid-day sun; when coming into bloom, watering with guano-water will be found particularly beneficial.

Choice kinds may be propagated from cuttings, but the plan most adopted is to grow them from seed, saving the best kinds and discarding the others. Any extra care or attention bestowed on this plant well repays the cultivator by an increase in size, form, and quantity of blooms.

THE PROCLAMATION.

SAINT PATRICK, slave to Milcho of the herds
Of Ballymena, wakened with these words:
"Arise, and flee
Out from the land of bondage and be free!"

Glad as a soul in pain, who hears from heaven
The angels singing of his sins forgiven,
And, wondering, sees
His prison opening to their golden keys,

He rose a man who laid him down a slave,
Shook from his locks the ashes of the grave,
And outward trod
Into the glorious liberty of God.

He cast the symbols of his shame away;
And, passing where the sleeping Milcho lay,
Though back and limb
Smarted with wrong, he prayed, "God pardon him!"

So went he forth: but in God's time he came
To light on Uilline's hills a holy flame;
And, dying, gave
The land a saint that lost him as a slave.

O dark, sad millions, patiently and dumb
Waiting for God, your hour, at last, has come,
And freedom's song
Breaks the long silence of your night of wrong!

Arise and flee! shake off the vile restraint
Of ages; but, like Ballymena's saint,
The oppressor spare,
Heap only on his head the coals of prayer.

Go forth, like him! like him return again,
To bless the land whereon in bitter pain
Ye toiled at first,
And heal with freedom what your slavery cursed.

THE KINGDOM OF RESERVE.

BY ADA CLARE.

"LEAR.—Nothing can come of nothing; speak again.
"CORDELIA.—Unhappy that I am, I cannot heave my heart into my mouth. I love your Majesty according to my bond; nor more nor less."—KING LEAR.

IF there is one thing more unsparingly satirized and girded against than another, in these modern days, it is the one of impulsive or emotional speech. Words have been coined, or rather exceptional meanings fitted to existing words, in order to apply more effectively the torture of irony to it. We see it, for instance, afflicted with the definitive title of "gushing," than which no word could be a greater plague to a quality. So much has been said on the subject, that no one would think the absence of expression was the absolute pledge of depth of feeling. To be reserved is to be true as well as profound; to be reticent is to have infinities of unsaid wisdoms in concealment.

And yet what is there really to admire in the quality of reserve, unless it suggests the accumulation of thought, to be duly expressed when the time is ripe; or what is the value of reticence, unless it arises from such experience, both in emotion and its outward signs, that one has learned so thoroughly to master it, as to repress it in those moments where vivacity would be folly, tenderness would be vulgarity, and impulsiveness a want of self-respect.

It never seems to occur to most people that silence sometimes proceeds from having nothing to say, rather than from a power of repressing speech; or that the much-lauded faculty of self-restraint may be the offspring simply of emotional emptiness. A man may be a self container, not because he is so great as to contain unsounded depths, but because he has precious little to contain. However profound a man might be, it would be certainly a very useless depth, to say the least, if nothing were ever to proceed from it. Of course it is the best of virtues in a body of water, (and so by analogy in a human character,) to be deep, but it is wonderfully improved as to purity if it have an occasional if not a continual outlet.

It would be a curious study for some of the scholars to dig out of the past the root from which this intense worship of reserve sprang up, to overshadow the whole Anglo Saxon tongue. For it is only among races born English as to speech, literature, and customs that this altar-fire is kindled to the goddess of Reserve. If any one doubts this general worship, let him try the simplest and most harmless traits of human nature in public places, and then watch the indignant consternation it will excite. When I speak of simple traits, I mean, to laugh when one is merry, or to express happiness, amusement, content, animal spirits, even by the language of the features.—A party, in an English restaurant, for instance, (when I say English of course I refer to all those where the English language reigns supreme) may feel pleased with themselves, with each other, with the viands, and all attending circumstances, but if they dare to express it by seeming lively, happy and merry, see how the frown of suspicion and contempt instantly lowers over them like a thunder-cloud charged with black and angry electricity. However contented, pleased, free from care they may be, they must look dissatisfied, afflicted, and gloomy, unless they desire to come under the adverse criticism of the majority of their fellow-beings. The theatres too—they are supposed to be places of amusement, and that we go there to enjoy ourselves. No such thing. They are places of distress, and we go there to see how dismal we can look. I don't know about the upper gallery. I believe it to be the most sensible portion of the audience, from the way in which it leads us with signs of genuine appreciation and animation, but I know how people are expected to look in the fashionable parts of the house. The men are to look as if their minds were entirely absorbed in something else, (stocks and scrip perhaps,) and they were, moreover shortly expecting an interview with the undertaker. The women are to look scornful, suspicious and implacable. I take it on faith, these looks are very creditable to humanity, very dignified, and all that sort of rubbish, but they are certainly not very pleasant. I am pleased to record, however, an exception to this leaden uniformity, which may be remarked at such matinees as Edwin Booth's, for example. The young girls did permit themselves to be animated over his performances, and to gaze upon them with their lovely faces all alight with enjoyment and enthusiasm, and I am forced to confess that I loved them for it.

In my ignorance, let me ask, why, in a world where we are liable to lose our hair, get cheated in business, broken in heart, bereft of our property, and parted from our beauty, where we are liable to old age, death, and the neuralgia, do we take it upon ourselves to tenderly nurture gloom, and assume low spirits and repulsiveness to be the chief among the virtues? Do not our digestive organs and complexions fade earlier and oftener than those of other nations; and has the cultivation of moroseness nothing to do with it?

Besides, this procrusteau rule makes hypocrites of some of us. For my own poor part, I dote on a hearty "weep" over a tragedy, but it is an indulgence I grant myself but seldom. I generally set up St. Simeon Stylites in his most stolid moments as the model of facial expression, and aim at it with an industry unworthy of so bad a cause. Again, see me in a saloon after a theatre, with some dainty little morsel before me, for which I am glad and thankful to the kind providing fates, but do I show it? No, not I. I accept the understood formula that the table is a bier, from which I, a ghoul, am taking a ghoul's feast, and regulate my countenance accordingly. If this eternal laudation of grim reserve can make such a silly little hypocrite of me, how do I know but the same film of grave humbug is masking over other faces that would like to smile and seem cheerful.

This affectation of reserve does not exhaust itself in public places, but it extends through the whole line of domestic life, like the mildewed ear blasting its wholesome brothers. Expressions of feeling, "gushing," as it is cruelly called, are forbidden between friendly, parental, filial, or conjugal relations. However antagonistic we may be in other things, we are all united in a horror of scenes. I believe a scene means, with us, the least laxness of rein given to the heart and its impulses. We choose to have our lives all leveled smoothly down with the great garden-roller of uniformity. And yet we see how nature varies her scenes with hill and vale. She is not afraid of bursting into a Vesuvius or a Niagara.

Judging from our own experience we know a little burst of kindness, tenderness, or praise affects us; how it pierces straight to our hearts, unburdens, and sweeps them on their daily way, like a healthsome breeze which unfurls a chafing, idly-flapping sail.

It is all very well for the husband, father, brother, to have what is called a "sturdy" love for a woman, an affection that will bear up in tempests as well as calms; yet that is but a sad staunchness at best. For, after all, women want to be cherished, comforted, cheered in the daily routine of life, rather than assured of protection in storm. Few people really encounter tempests in life; what they suffer from is the array of little weary ills, which everybody is too grave to alleviate. When true tempests come, we must stand alone; we may not look to human love, however strong, for help; and while tossed about on lonely seas look for succor only to Him who boldeth the waters in the hollow of His hand.

Once in a while it happens whole nations give the lie to our pet theory, that goodness is synonymous with stolidity, and worth with dullness. Witness the Italian nation, which we had long considered effeminate, given over to trifles and frivolities, and quite incapable of any national virility. But when it was tried in the ordeal of war it arose and threw off its yoke, quietly, firmly, and without any of that sickening self-conceit and laudation which other nations, priding themselves upon the possession of the whole panoply of manly virtues, have so often exhibited. In the face of that valor, simplicity, and earnestness which then wrapped all Italy as with a garment, does any one dare to call that nation worthless and effete? No, by the heads of a Cavour, a Garibaldi, I will answer no! And yet, were they not ever a romancing, singing, laughing, demonstrative, "gushing" people.

Just because all that glitters is not gold, people will have it, nothing that glitters is gold. The glitter of gold is as truly one of its inherent properties, as its denseness, solidity, rarity, and, in fact, quite as useful as any of them. Otherwise, tin and iron would be just as precious.

By this time any reader I may have been so fortunate as to preserve thus far, will have concluded I have but one idea in nature—the bubbling brook. But, indeed, I love still deep waters, if only because, under a pressure, they are capable of roaring the loudest, and rushing the fastest. Also, I revere that reticence which is the still, holy calm of a rich, mellowed nature. The reticence which covers up the well-spring of its feeling, that, free from the dust of common things, it may be strong to flow in crystal streams, to the life that comes weary and athirst to it for comfort.

In all nature I know nothing finer than when a really true, highly-toned soul in a moment of expansion, drops the veil, and for a brief moment makes visible its longings, ardors, aspirations. I love reticence when I find it the soil where the seed of such moments can lie covered up until the time come for them to burst through and bloom.

I know well enough how much could be said on the other side of the question, and I know some of the things that should be said, but I am not going to say them. The other side is too strong already. Every one knows its virtues; even those who run may read them, but for its evils the majority of people are blind. Before closing, I will refer to one of the most noted characters of the reserve school. I refer to Shakspeare's "Cordelia."

"Cordelia" believed silence to be the measure of truth, never seeming to remember that saying too little is often just as false as saying too much. She underrated her affection for her father as much as her sisters overrated theirs, and the one circumstance had as disastrous consequences as the other. That "Lear" was a horribly foolish old man we cannot doubt; but that "Cordelia" loved him better than her husband or her life, the events of the play proved, when she came back for his sake to lose both of them. But she would sooner see herself banished, and him given over to a pair of female vultures than tell him so. She was untrue through the excess of her devotion to facts, and in her eagerness to fulfil the letter of the law, she violated its spirit. That the other sisters expressed so much and felt nothing, does not shame me at all; that sort of artificial exuberance of speech no more resembles real expression of feeling than the rank, sickening weeds that run riot over the unkempt earth do the crowding sweetness of the violet and heliotrope beds. If once "Cordelia" had deigned to give words to that true depth of loving tenderness which welled beneath her breast, the spurious passion of her sisters would, in its light, have glared with brazen and bawdy falseness. Her father wished not only to be loved, but he wished to have sweet verbal pledges of it. He wanted her, in other words, to "gush," and had she but "gushed," she would have been beside him, in possession of the greater part of his kingdom, to succor him; to keep the rapacity and cruelty of her sisters in check. He would not have been turned into the storm houseless by night; she herself had not died an ignominious death, and the world would have been deprived of the sublimest tragedy recorded in the literary annals of this planet.—New York Saturday Press.

GRISWOLD AS A HASHEESH EATER.—Griswold, the "Fat Contributor," relates in one of his letters his experience as a hasheesh eater. Those who have read Bayard Taylor or Fitzhugh Ludlow on the subject, will read it with infinite satisfaction. It is as follows: "All at once the scene changed. From the fiercest torments and most horrible agonies, I was suddenly changed into seas of bliss. I found myself floating in an ocean of brown gravy which was dotted with islands composed of boned turkey and alamode beef. French rolls floated along in the gravy, warm from the oven, and dashed helter skelter down my throat, the only natural species of bread and sop that I ever heard of. Partridges on toast, with quail in the same delightful spread-eagle condition, danced along on the rippling gravy-like nautiluses on a spree, sails made of the thinnest and most delightfully seasoned omelettes hot and boiling. Potatoes bobbed along in pyramids, while turkey wings moved on savory pinions to my capacious mouth. I climbed gleefully the island of boned turkey, and then trod with a light heart colonnades of bologna sausage, and along lanes of porter house steak. Fountains adorned the parterres from which squirted cubinet pudding (both kinds of sauce.) and Alsop's pale ale. Conservatories, the roofs of which were composed of Welsh rabbits, were filled with the rarest puddings, while the lawns absolutely crawled with lobsters who were busy chopping each other into salad. Fried oysters hung in clusters from every bough, rivulets of turtle soup ran in every direction, irrigating the foundation of boned turkey underneath. I rioted in fields of grass, every blade of which bore a dozen shrimps, and in bowers where every twig was laden with ham sandwiches, mustard flowing naturally from every shrub. I rolled over and over in beds of oysters, all fat and luscious, each of which held up its head and begged the privilege of being swallowed. I threw handsprings in meadows of mushrooms, with stuffed hare running about, ready browned, with lemons in their mouths, entreating the pleasure of my teeth in their toothsome carcases. The trees bore eggs on toast, and the heavens rained pop corn and peanuts.

HAWTHORNE AT CONCORD.

[In the preface to the Mosses from an Old Manse, it will be remembered that Hawthorne slightly sketched the story of his social life at Concord. It will be read to-day not only for the characteristic beauty of its style, but as a pleasant personal reminiscence of the great author :]

"WHEN summer was dead and buried, the old Manse became as lonely as a hermitage. Not that ever—in my time, at least—it had been thronged with company. But, at no rare intervals, we welcomed some friend out of the dusty glare and tumult of the world, and rejoiced to share with him the transparent obscurity that was floating over us. In one respect, our precincts were like the Enchanted Ground, through which the pilgrim travelled on his way to the Celestial City. The guests, each and all, felt a slumberous influence upon them; they fell asleep in chairs, or took a more deliberate siesta on the sofa; or were seen stretched among the shadows of the orchard, looking up dreamily through the boughs. They could not have paid a more acceptable compliment to my abode, nor to my own qualities as a host. I held it as a proof that they left their cares behind them, as they passed between the stone gate-posts, at the entrance of our avenue; and that the so powerful opiate was the abundance of peace and quiet within and all around us. Others could give them pleasure and amusement, or instruction—these could be picked up anywhere—but it was for me to give them rest. Rest, in a life of trouble. What better could be done for those weary and world-worn spirits? for him, whose career of perpetual action was impeded and harassed by the rarest of his powers, and the richest of his acquirements? for another, who had thrown his ardent heart, from earliest youth, into the strife of politics, and now, perchance, began to suspect that one lifetime is too brief for the accomplishment of any lofty aim? for her, on whose feminine nature has been imposed the heavy gift of intellectual power, such as a strong man might have staggered under, and with it the necessity to act upon the world? in a word, not to multiply instances, what better could be done for anybody, who came within our magic circle, than to throw the spell of a magic spirit over him? And when it had wrought its full effect, then we dismissed him, with but misty reminiscences, as if he had been dreaming of us.

"Were I to adopt a pet idea, as so many people do, and fondle it in my embraces to the exclusion of all others, it would be, that the great want which mankind labors under, at this present period, is—Sleep! The world should recline its vast head on the first convenient pillow, and take an age-long nap. It has gone distracted, through a morbid activity, and, while preternaturally wide-awake, is nevertheless tormented by visions, that seem real to it now, but would assume their true aspect and character, were all things once set right by an interval of sound repose. This is the only method of getting rid of old delusions, and avoiding new ones—of regenerating our race, so that it might in due time awake, as an infant out of dewy slumber—of restoring to us the simple perception of what is right, and the single-hearted desire to achieve it; both of which have long been lost, in consequence of this weary activity of brain, and torpor or passion of the heart, that now afflict the universe. Stimulants, the only modo of treatment hitherto attempted, cannot quell the disease; they do but heighten the delirium.

"Let not the above paragraph ever be quoted against the author; for, though tinctured with its modicum of truth, it is the result and expression of what he knew, while he was writing it, to be but a distorted survey of the state and prospects of mankind. There were circumstances around me, which made it difficult to view the world precisely as it exists; for, severe and sober as was the old Manse, it was necessary to go but a little way beyond its threshold, before meeting with stranger moral shapes of men than might have been encountered elsewhere, in a circuit of a thousand miles.

"These hobgoblins of flesh and blood were attracted thither by the wide-spreading influence of a great original Thinker, who had his earthly abode at the opposite extremity of our village. His mind acted on our minds, of a certain constitution, with wonderful magnetism, and drew many men upon long pilgrimages, to speak with him face to face. Young visionaries—to whom just so much of insight had been imparted, as to make life all a labyrinth around them—came to seek the clue that should guide them out of their self-involved bewilderment. Grey-headed theorists—whose systems, at first air, had finally imprisoned them in an iron frame-work—travelled painfully to his door, not to ask deliverance, but to invite the free spirit into their own thraldom. People that had lighted on a new thought, or a thought that they fancied new, came to Emerson, as the finder of a glittering gem hastens to a lapidary, to ascertain its quality and value. Uncertain, troubled, earnest wanderers, through the midnight of the moral world, beheld his intellectual fire, as a beacon burning on a hill-top, and climbing the difficult ascent, looked forth into the surrounding obscurity, more hopefully than hitherto. The light revealed objects unseen before—mountains, gleaming lakes, glimpses of a creation among the chaos—but also, as was unavoidable, it attracted bats and owls, and the whole host of night birds, which flapped their dusky wings against the gazer's eyes, and sometimes were mistaken for fowls of angelic feather. Such delusions always hover nigh, wherever a beacon fire of truth is kindled.

"For myself, there had been epochs of my life, when I, too, might have asked of this prophet the master-word that should solve me the riddle of the universe. But now, being happy, I felt as if there were no question to be put, and therefore admired Emerson as a poet of deep beauty and austere tenderness, but sought nothing from him as a philosopher. It was good, nevertheless, to meet him in the wood-paths, or sometimes in our avenue, with that pure, intellectual gleam diffused about his presence, like the garment of a shining one; and he so quiet, so simple, so without pretension, encountering each man alive as if expecting to receive more than he could impart. And, in truth, the heart of many an ordinary man had perchance, inscriptions which he could not read. But it was impossible to dwell in his vicinity, without inhaling, more or less, the mountain atmosphere of his lofty thought, which, in the brains of some people, wrought a singular giddiness—new truth being as heady as new wine. Never was a poor little country village infested with such a variety of queer, strangely dressed, oddly behaved mortals, most of whom took upon themselves to be important agents of the world's destiny, yet were simply bores, of a very intense water. Such, I imagine, is the invariable character of persons who crowd so closely about an original thinker, as to draw in his unuttered breath, and thus become imbued with a false originality. This triteness of novelty is enough to make any man, of common sense, blaspheme at all ideas of less than a century's standing; and pray that the world may be petrified and rendered immovable, in precisely the worst moral and physical state that it ever yet arrived at, rather than be benefited by such schemes of such philosophers."

PREMATURE INTERMENTS.

BURIED alive! To fall into the trancelike lethargy which follows disease, and only open your eyes in a coffin to die of the choking sensations of bitter reflection and foul air This has been, alas! the lot of many. The pallor and facial alterations of the honored corpse are received as proofs of his death! But all these are not conclusive evidence that the body is bloodless and that the soul has left it. A visit to the hospitals or to the private homes of the sick will discover many, who, in sleep, present more indications of death than those just about to be removed to the tomb. We have seen such cases, and we can attest the facts. When the supposed dead looks unchanged, except that the eyes have been closed and the face bears the hue of death, it is criminal in the physician to certify to his demise, until he makes an examination of the body.

The following facts, showing the numerous instances in which persons have been buried alive, have been collected during many years by a French gentleman, from medical history:

At Toulouse, a lady having been buried in the church of the Capuchin friars, with a diamond ring on her finger, a servant entered the vault to steal the ring; and as the finger was swelled, and the ring would not come off, he began cutting the finger. On hearing a loud shriek from the deceased, the thief fell senseless. At the time of morning prayers, the monks having heard groans, found the lady alive and the servant dead. Thus death had its prey; there was but a change of victims. This is the true version of the story, which has had many changes in going the rounds of the press.

A street-porter in Paris having died at the Hotel Dieu, was carried with the other dead into the same grave. Recovering his senses toward eleven at night, he tore open his winding sheet, made his way to his house, knocked at the door, which was not opened to him without some difficulty, and took new possession of his lodgings.

At the close of the last century a woman in Paris was thought to be dead, and the body was placed on some straw, with a taper at the feet. Some young men who sat up with the corpse, in a frolic overturned the taper. This set the straw on fire. The deceased, whose body the flames now reached, uttered a piercing shriek. Timely assistance was rendered, and she so well recovered that after her resurrection she became the mother of several children.

On the 21st of November, 1763, the Abbe Prevot, well known for his literary productions, was taken with an apoplectic fit as he was travelling through the forests of Chantilly. Being supposed dead, he was carried to the house of the mayor of the village, and the magistrate directed a post mortem examination to be commenced. A startling cry, uttered by the unfortunate man, proved that he was alive. He died under the scalpel.

Dr. Deveux, a surgeon of St. Come Hospital, Paris, had a maid, a servant, who had been three times brought to burial. She did not recover her senses the last time till they were lowering her coffin into the grave. That woman having died anew, the body was kept six days, lest they should have to bring her back a fourth time.

M. Rosseau, of Rouen, had married a lady of fourteen, whom he left in perfect health, after starting on a short journey. After a few days he heard that unless he returned immediately, he would find his wife buried. On reaching home, he saw the funeral ready. In an agony of grief he had the coffin removed to his room and opened. He then ordered the lancet to be applied to the body. Twenty-five incisions were made without effect; the husband, almost frantic, ordered one more, and deeper; which being inflicted, the lady exclaimed: "You are killing me with that knife!" Medical assistance was immediately given. The lady recovered.

The wife of M. Duhamel, a celebrated lawyer, having been supposed dead twenty-four hours, the body was placed on the table for the purpose of preparing it for burial. Her husband strongly opposed it, not believing her dead. To ascertain it, knowing she was very fond of the cymbal, and the tunes which cymbal-players sing, he called one. On hearing the instrument and the voice, the deceased recovered motion and speech. She survived her apparent death forty years.

Andre Vesale, physician to Charles V. and Philip II., after attending a Spanish grandee, thought him dead. Having obtained leave to examine the body, he had scarcely opened the chest when he perceived the heart palpitating. The relatives of the deceased prosecuted him as guilty of murder—the inquisitor as guilty of profaneness. Through the intercession of the king he was sent on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and thus escaped death.

In the sitting of the Royal Academy of Medicine, in 1827, a paper was read by M. Chauncey Chantournelle, on the danger of hasty inhumations. This led to a discussion, in which M. Desgenettes stated that he had heard from M. Thorout, who had superintended the removal of bodies in the cemetery and the charuel house des Innocents, that many skeletons had been found in positions showing that the individuals had moved in their coffins. M. Thorout was so much struck with the revelation that he caused a clause to be inserted in his will respecting his own interment.

A GORGEOUS GAMBLING PLACE.—A celebrated gambling house in Washington—kept by a colored individual—is thus described: "You enter by a door of variegated stained glass, which, by gaslight, reflects all the colors of the rainbow. Ascending a flight of stairs, you reach a door, pull a bell, and instantly a small aperture opens and you are greeted with a pair of red eyes and a double row of ivory. A glance suffices. You have filled Sambo's eye, and you are deemed passable. The door is at once opened, and you are ushered into the ante-room—the vestibule of hell! This room is not large, but elegantly appointed—the chief attraction being the sideboard, which is of solid marble, and white as snow. Here are arranged in long and glisteuing columns, decanters of cut glass, sparkling like brilliants, filled with the choicest nectar, and blushing to the very necks with the glowing vintage of the olden time. If you pass this Rubicon without tasting its sparkling but dangerous waters, it is not from any dearth of hospitality on the part of your persuasive host. The "sporting hall" is now visible. The floor is covered with carpet from the Orient, of immense cost and marvellous beauty; the walls are adorned with superb paintings, of the old masters and the new, while pendant from the windows hang curtains of embroidered lace, covered with golden tapestry of Oriental magnificence; while mirrors of mammoth size reflect your form and features from a score of gleaming embrasures. Along the hall at convenient distances are ranged circular tables of polished rosewood, around which are seated numbers of thoughtful, anxious, dark-visaged men who heed you not. One would naturally suppose this to be a theatre for jests, drollery and song, or bacchanalian revelry, or pugilistic encounter. Far from from it. On the contrary, all is hushed, silent, sepulchral:

> "No real voice or sound
> Within these cheerless walls are found."

You are oppressed with the fearful stillness and awful silence which pervade the place. A laugh, a joke, or even a curse, would be a sensible relief. But you hear nothing of this. An occasional long breath, or half subdued sigh, is all that tells the ear that these mad devotees are possessed of life and lungs.

THE agitation of the question of negro suffrage naturally awakens a desire to know how the blacks are distributed in the South. The war has of course made the census tables of 1860 less valuable for use than they were. But according to them the colored population was in excess over the white in 20 counties of the 52 in Alabama, in 5 of the 55 in Arkansas, in 6 of the 21 in Florida, in 43 of the 132 in Georgia, in 33 of the 48 in Louisiana, in 31 of the 60 in Mississippi, in 20 of the 87 in North Carolina, in 20 of the 30 in South Carolina, in 2 of the 75 in Tennessee, in 19 of the 151 in Texas, in 44 of the 143 in Virginia. In many others the black population was only a little less than the white.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1865.

OUR SOCIETY.

IN referring to a prominent scandal of the past week, the Bulletin deplores the easy virtue of San Francisco society in admitting to its privileges men whose distinction is public rather than private; who are remarkable more for their talent and present reputation, than for their morals or antecedents, and whose professional education and associates often unfit them for the company of the young. It rebukes very justly the extreme licence given to young girls, and declares in favor of those rigid rules which govern their conduct in European circles. It might be said that the first of these propositions is really a corollary of the second. It is certain that in a society where people are careless about the conduct of their own relations they are naturally indifferent to the character of strangers, and that where so much liberty is granted to the one sex, libertinism is very apt to flourish with the other. Let us be prepared to frankly admit that in a city where there are many honorable and accomplished people of either sex, there is nevertheless no society in the true acceptation of the term, and that, save the informal intercourse of neighbors and relations, that which passes for it is but a tissue of shams and snobbery—whose meretricious qualities are never more clearly shown than when the sanctity of a home is stricken through its flimsy barriers.

What is our society? Of the men who are invited to our soirees, who eat our ices or drink our wine, who familiarly clasp the waists of our wives and daughters in the dance, or who are met at the half-public assemblies of schools and picnics, how many would we choose for sons or brothers-in-law? Of their antecedents and private character, how much do we know; or, still more important, how much do we care? In what other community would such a piquancy be added to the newest scandal as that opportunity we so often enjoy of standing vis-a-vis, in a cotillion, to its unhappy subject? Where else are girls of fourteen and fifteen permitted to make promiscuous acquaintances, or are allowed, unchaperoned, the privilege and excitement of the ball? And yet these anomalies exist in what we term our society, and we are startled that the most extravagant trust ever imposed upon human probity and integrity is ever broken.

The conditions of our civilization have been against the formation of well-guarded and properly organized society. Freed from the restraints of kindred and the social trammels of long-settled communities, a cosmopolitan people have met together here with the freedom of passengers on shipboard, and, like them, have formed acquaintances and intimacies which they did not calculate to outlast the conditions which brought them together. The test of admission to this inchoate society was naturally the present position, celebrity or wealth of an applicant, without reference particularly to his antecedents or promise. It would be foolish to deny that this easy familiarity of pioneer intercourse does not still exercise its certain fascination over our people. The new man, the parvenu, the snob, will not willingly seek to alter a state of affairs which gives him a position he could nowhere else obtain. The vaunted preference for California over other communities, the dissatisfaction and return of Californians after an Eastern visit, may often be traced to this source. It is not to be wondered, therefore, that the travelling artist or strolling player, finding himself suddenly invested with an importance and social distinction to which he is unfamiliar, should have little regard for a community so regardless of its own self-respect. That this presumption is not exaggerated, the spectacle exhibited at certain social reunions during the stay of the late opera troupe, and the culminating scandal of the past week, afford sufficient evidence.

But it will be argued that Gottschalk had been admitted to the best Eastern society, that he was a relation of one of the most respectable families, that there are some among us who still recall the foolish adoration of feminine New York for the talented pianist, and that we are consequently no more culpable than our Eastern neighbors. But it must be remembered that the guarded conventionalities of an older civilization exercised that restraint upon both Lothario and his foolish admirers which is here unknown, and it is a poor compliment to our society that it offers such superior opportunities to the trespasser. While the conduct of this man—a roué by reputation—is not excused by the temptations to which he was subjected, it must not be forgotten that we are far too often apt to heap upon the individual criminal all the obloquy of these crimes, for which we are as often to a greater or less degree responsible. It is not enough that we denounce the "Don Giovanni" and "Leperello" of this last cheap romance, if we still countenance that state of society which makes them heroes.

OUR POLYGLOT CITY.

"AQUI SE HABLA EL ESPAÑOL."
"HIER WIRD DEUTSCH GESPROCHEN."
"ICI ON PARLE FRANCAIS."

IF THE CALIFORNIAN possessed the proper variety of fonts of type, I might furnish my article with a schedule of signboard expressions from about town in every speech of civilization, denoting the fact that wanderers who loved the sound of their own mother tongue could find those within ready to communicate with them. There are dignified banks, whose massive doors are garnished with long and intricate advices to Asiatics; there are Hebrew boarding-houses where the wandering Israelite is tempted to enter by reason of the Chaldaism over the door, informing him that he has found a place where forbidden and unclean viands may not tantalize him; and I shrewdly suspect that if a simple Milesian, in utter ignorance of the language of the false Saxon, were to be dragged from his native bog, placed in a sack on the top of Mount Hilary, and conveyed hither in that virgin Celtic state, he would, before having made much of a tour through the city, meet with a reception as purely Erse in welcome as could be given in any out-of-the-way shebeen of his own dear island. There is no country however small in extent and undisturbed by the fever of emigration; there is no island of the most remote sea; there is no oddity of ethnology but what has contributed its mite to the motley crowd of San Francisco. If the last fifteen years of every adult's life could be blotted from his memory, together with every lingual advance he has made in that time, we would find ourselves in almost as bad a condition as the dwellers in the land of Shinar, where they were stricken in the building of their architectural monstrosity.

I hardly fancy that to the California youth the study of those chapters in the Geographies about races can be as difficult as it is to an Eastern child. He can see from the school-house door a procession of the races which would give him a more vivid idea than any series of ethnological wood cuts. Indeed, I have seen myself Caucasian children of a plebeian turn forming a fifth of a living tableau where every one of Blumenbach's types were represented. I meet a man every day whom I had presumed to be an eccentric sort of Greaser, but on enquiry, I learned from him that he came, not many years back, from the Canary Islands, where he was born and educated. Norwegian, Swede, Russian, Dane, Bohemian, (I refer to the Austrian subject and not to the postage-stamp-a-line gentleman, whoever he is.) Wallachian, and Greek jostle each other on the street and mingle their languages over the social glass. I have noted words coming from the lips of wandering Neapolitan fisherman that called up the image of the sage Ulysses travelling to find the Western Isles. Indeed, it may be that these piscatorial gentlemen of the fish-market can claim closer relations with Pericles, Lycurgus, and Theseus than any of the mongrel race inhabiting Greece and Athens to-day. Naples being known at one time as a Grecian city, and the point where, least of all, utter annihilation or eviction of the ancient inhabitants could be anticipated, we might naturally look for a less disturbed transmission of blood than in overrun and dismantled Hellas, by the same sort of reasoning that a French Canadian's claim to an unmixed nationality is more reliable than that of a native of that city of strangers, the capital of France.

It has often struck me that to a fastidious native-born American burglar, San Quentin offers few inducements as a place of temporary retirement. Fancy a dainty appropriater of other's money, which has been spent in operatic luxury or in æsthetic Cliff House pleasures with genteel associations, flung into close communion with Chang Wa from the slums of China, some Mexican murderer from the south, or a loose Kanuka who has back-slidden from missionary morality. It must make the punishment ten-fold more severe to receive it in company with the refuse of all nations and tribes. Give me, kind Providence, an Eastern penitentiary, if ever thy suppliant should stumble fearfully into criminality. The argot of crime becomes still more terrible when it wanders from the confines of one's mother tongue; and ethnology, as seen from and in prison, hath no charms to an unphilosophical student.

If the curious observer will take a seat in the gallery at the opera some night, he cannot but be amused at the foreign and manifold sounds with which his neighbors express their enthusiasm. Here is a spectacled German, who rattles forth gutturals with a mercurial rapidity hardly to be expected in the countryman of the earnest solemn Schiller; here is an Italian kissing his finger-ends at every fine passage and throwing out his hand as if he meant to fling his words of endearment upon the heads of the performers; and here is a Frenchman claquing away with an energy heightened by his nervous volley of plaudits. Music somehow or other gets home to every one's heart, and seems to have been left out of the Babylonian curse by the special interposition of some celestial musician.

But there is another place in San Francisco where the variety of tongues is needed. Go to the cemetery. Here is a "Ci git;" there a "Hier ruht," and so on, until it seems as though Death spoke every tongue, and kindly interpreted his solemn histories for the alien mourner to weep over.

An orator of our city some time since advanced the bold opinion that all this mongrel condition of our Pacific metropolis was wrong. I will not argue the political bearings of the question. I would not have liked, perhaps, any more than did Juvenal, to see the "sweaty Canopus" airing his servile fingers, heavy with rings, in the face of poor but honest born Romans; but I have no desire to "slop over" on any subject connected with the political bearings of the foreign population question. This country was intended by God and our fathers as an asylum for the oppressed; and the politician who advances any theory restraining the carrying out of that broad inspiration, must be prepared with better reasons than have been furnished as yet, before he can overthrow the good old dogma of antique American democracy, "Freedom for all without infringement of the rights of any."

In a literary, perhaps one might say, an æsthetic point of view, to a modern Chremes, who interests himself in all humanity, the varied population of our city presents something pleasing and exciting. I may not possibly fancy that Chinaman to be a high type of civilization who meanders along under my window, mornings, disturbing my guilty rest with his heart broken, sore-throated cry of Fis-she-e! he is not in the "foremost files of time" indeed, nor would he appear to advantage at a select party; but there must be privates in the rear rank of civilization, and the natty corporal in front who sneers at them is unfit for his place, and should be immediately degraded. What can be more expressive of that high quality of patience taught by "the first true gentleman that ever breathed" than the sight of a poor Chinaman travelling along Montgomery street, heavily burdened, turning out for every indifferent American that jostles him? It may be cowardice; it may be cringing; but it is so like a certain Christian virtue recommended in the Gospels that we should so accept and respect it. I may not be willing to hobnob with our African brethren indiscriminately; but I have been indebted for kindnesses too often to the race to wish to banish them from my august Caucasian presence. Consider, oh man of white race predilections, to what extremities you would drive everybody who has a mongrel circle of friends. I become impressed with the idea that miscegenation is down upon us; must I then regard poor old Jim as an eyesore because your daughter gazes with unseeming tenderness upon a handsome mulatto hairdresser? Must I fling off mine ancient friend Kiung, who knows more Greek than that booby son of yours does English, because, forsooth, you discovered Mongolian designs the other night upon your chicken-coop? But I wander too far into politics to be comfortable. Let us return to our aliens.

The language of our coast is modified by our mixed population. A San Franciscan would be surprised to learn that his speech is to a certain extent a western lingua franca. He uses expressions unknown to the ancient Cethegi of New England and the Mississippi Valley. Now, it is a Kanaka word that he flings in; now, it is an apt Mexican term; and now, in spite of his disgust for the race, he snatches up a Chinese monosyllabic and grunts it out with so faint a success in imitation, that an unsuspecting mandarin would suppose it Melican. "Evil communications, etc." We are on the high road to something novel in idea, started out by this strange meeting of races here on this quasi neutral ground. What literary turn it may take, it would be hard to imagine. We may some day be favored with translations of Chinese lyrics, efforts at Kanaka poetry, Klamath doggerel, South Sea epics, and what not in the way of Pacific Ocean originality. The sixteen years of California civilization have been occupied in bringing hither as it were merely a few tools of Eastern necessity, and in assuring ourselves of a hold upon one sort of culture before we attempt an æsthetic fabric of our own.

We soon may lay the foundations for our new life. What it will be when time has crowned its capital with completeness we cannot venture to prophecy, but if the variety of race and language for which we are remarkable now, does not have its influence, it will be because the public mind of our city is too weak even to receive novel impressions however strong they may be.

DIONYSIUS VAGO.

THE Sacramento Daily Union entered upon its thirtieth volume, Sept. 19th. It was established March 19, 1851. As a news journal it has no superior in California, and few equals anywhere. We sometimes hear an expression of surprise that the publishers of the Union do not bring their establishment to San Francisco; but, with the aid of the telegraph, they are in a better position at Sacramento to lay the news of the day before interior readers at the earliest moment than if located here, and perhaps this is the reason why Sacramento may continue to boast one of the best newspapers in the world. Well, the Capital City deserves all she retains, and we are glad that neither fire nor flood can subdue the spirit of her people, nor metropolitan attractions deprive her of the powerful auxiliary she possesses in the ability and energy for which the Sacramento Union has become famous throughout the country.

MUCK-A-MUCK;

A MODERN INDIAN NOVEL.

AFTER COOPER.

[BY THE CALIFORNIAN'S CONDENSED NOVELIST.]

CHAPTER I.

IT was toward the close of a bright October day. The last rays of the setting sun were reflected from one of those sylvan lakes peculiar to the Sierras of California. On the right the curling smoke of an Indian village rose between the columns of the lofty pines, while to the left the log cottage of Judge Tompkins, embowered in buckeyes, completed the enchanting picture.

Although the exterior of the cottage was humble and unpretentious, and in keeping with the wildness of the landscape, its interior gave evidence of the cultivation and refinement of its inmates. An aquarium, containing goldfishes, stood on a marble centre table at one end of the apartment, while a magnificent grand piano occupied the other. The floor was covered with a yielding tapestry carpet, and the walls were adorned with paintings from the pencils of Van Dyke, Reubens, Tintoretto, Michael Angelo, and the productions of the more modern Turner, Kensett, Church and Bierstadt. Although Judge Tompkins had chosen the frontiers of civilization as his home, it was impossible for him to entirely forego the habits and tastes of his former life. He was seated in a luxurious arm-chair, writing at a mahogany ecritoire, while his daughter, a lovely young girl of seventeen summers, plied her crochet needle on an ottoman beside him. A bright fire of pine logs flickered and flamed on the ample hearth.

Genevra Octavia Tompkins was Judge Tompkin's only child. Her mother had long since died on the Plains. Reared in affluence, no pains had been spared with the daughter's education. She was a graduate of one of the principal seminaries, and spoke French with a perfect Beinicia accent. Peerlessly beautiful, she was dressed in a white moiré antique robe trimmed with crimson tulle. That simple rosebud, with which most heroines exclusively decorate their hair, was all she wore in her raven locks.

The Judge was the first to break the silence:

"Genevra, the logs which compose yonder fire seem to have been incautiously chosen. The sibilation produced by the sap, which exudes copiously therefrom, is not conducive to composition."

"True, father, but I thought it would be preferable to the constant crepitation which is apt to attend the combustion of more seasoned ligneous fragments."

The Judge looked admiringly at the intellectual features of the graceful girl, and half forgot the slight annoyances of the green wood in the musical accents of his daughter. He was smoothing her hair tenderly, when the shadow of a tall figure, which suddenly darkened the doorway, caused him to look up.

CHAPTER II.

IT needed but a glance at the new comer to detect at once the form and features of the haughty aborigine—the untaught and untrammelled son of the forest. Over one shoulder a blanket, negligently but gracefully thrown, disclosed a bare and powerful breast, decorated with a quantity of three cent postage stamps which he had despoiled from an Overland Mail stage a few weeks previous. A cast-off beaver of Judge Tompkins', adorned by a simple feather, covered his erect head, from beneath which his straight locks descended. His right hand hung lightly by his side, while his left was engaged in holding on a pair of pantaloons, which the lawless grace and freedom of his lower limbs evidently could not brook.

"Why," said the Indian, in a low sweet tone, "why does the Pale Face still follow the track of the Red Man? Why does he pursue him, even as O-kee-chow, the wild cat, chases Ka-ka, the skunk? Why are the feet of Sorrel-top, the white chief, among the acorns of Muck-a-Muck, the mountain forest? Why," he repeated, quietly but firmly, abstracting a silver spoon from the table, "why do you seek to drive him from the wigwams of his fathers? His brothers are already gone to the happy hunting grounds. Will the Pale Face seek him there?" And, averting his face from the Judge, he hastily concealed a silver cake-basket beneath his blanket, to conceal his emotion.

"Muck-a-Muck has spoken," said Genevra softly, "Let him now listen. Are the acorns of the mountain sweeter than the esculent and nutritious bean of the Pale Face miner? Does my brother prize the edible qualities of the snail above that of the crisp and oleaginous bacon. Delicious are the grasshoppers that sport on the hillside—are they better than the dried apples of the Pale Faces? Pleasant is the gurgle of the torrent, Kish-Kish, but is it better than the cluck-cluck of old Bourbon from the old stone bottle?"

"Ugh!" said the Indian, "Ugh! Good. The White Rabbit is wise. Her words fall as the snow on Tootoonolo, and the rocky heart of Muck-a-Muck is hidden. What says my brother the Gray Gopher of Dutch Flat?"

"She has spoken, Muck-a-Muck," said the Judge, gazing fondly on his daughter. It is well. Our treaty is concluded. No, thank you—you need not dance the Dance of Snow Shoes, the Moccasin Dance, the Dance of the Green Corn, or the Treaty Dance. I would be alone. A strange sadness overpowers me."

"I go," said the Indian. "Tell your great chief in Washington, the Sachem Andy, that the Red Man is retiring before the footsteps of the adventurous Pioneer. Inform him, if you please, that westward the star of empire takes its way, that the chiefs of the Pi-Ute nation are for Reconstruction, to a man, and that Klamath will poll a heavy Republican vote in the Fall."

And folding his blanket more tightly around him, Muck-a-Muck withdrew.

CHAPTER III.

GENEVRA TOMPKINS stood at the door of the log cabin, looking after the retreating Overland Mail stage which conveyed her father to Virginia City. "He may never return again," sighed the young girl as she glanced at the frightfully rolling vehicle and wildly careering horses—"at least, with unbroken bones. Should he meet with an accident? I mind me now of a fearful legend, familiar to my childhood. Can it be that the drivers on this line are privately instructed to despatch all passengers maimed by accident, to prevent tedious litigation? No, no. But why this weight upon my heart?"

She seated herself at the piano and lightly passed her hand over the keys. Then, in a clear mezzo-soprano voice, she sang the first verse of one of the most popular Irish ballads:

"O Arrah, ma dheelish, the distant dudheen
Lies soft in the moonlight, ma bouchal vourneen:
The springing gossoons on the heather are still,
And the caubeens and colleens are heard on the hill."

But as the ravishing notes of her sweet voice died upon the air, her hands sank listlessly to her side. Music could not chase away the mysterious shadow from her heart. Again she rose. Putting on a white crape bonnet, and carefully drawing a pair of lemon-colored gloves over her taper fingers, she seized her parasol and plunged into the depths of the pine forest.

CHAPTER IV.

GENEVRA had not proceeded many miles before a weariness seized upon her fragile limbs, and she would fain seat herself upon the trunk of a prostrate pine, which she previously dusted with her handkerchief. The sun was just sinking below the horizon, and the scene was one of gorgeous and sylvan beauty. "How beautiful is Nature," murmured the innocent girl, as, reclining gracefully against the root of the tree, she gathered up her skirts and tied the handkerchief around her throat. But a low growl interrupted her meditation. Starting to her feet, her eyes met a sight which froze her blood with terror.

The only outlet to the forest was the narrow path, barely wide enough for a single person, hemmed in by trees and rocks, which she had just traversed. Down this path, in Indian file, came a monstrous grizzly, closely followed by a California lion, a wild cat, and a buffalo, the rear being brought up by a wild Spanish bull. The mouths of the three first animals were distended with frightful significance; the horns of the last were lowered as ominously. As Genevra was preparing to faint, she heard a low voice behind her.

"Eternally dog-gone my skin ef this ain't the puttiest chance yet."

At the same moment, a long, shining barrel dropped lightly from behind her and rested over her shoulder.

Genevra shuddered.

"Don ye—don't move!"

Genevra became motionless.

The crack of a rifle rang through the woods. Three frightful yells were heard and two sullen roars. Five animals bounded into the air and five lifeless bodies lay upon the plain. The well-aimed bullet had done its work. Entering the open throat of the grizzly, it had traversed his body, only to enter the throat of the California lion, and in like manner the catamount, until it passed through into the respective foreheads of the bull and buffalo, and finally fell flattened from the rocky hillside.

Genevra turned quickly. "My preserver!" she shrieked, and fell into the arms of Natty Bumpo—the celebrated Pike Ranger of Donner Lake.

CHAPTER V.

THE moon rose cheerfully above Donner Lake. On its placid bosom a dug-out canoe glided rapidly, containing Natty Bumpo and Genevra Tompkins.

Both were silent. The same thought possessed each, and perhaps there was sweet companionship even in the unbroken quiet. Genevra bit the handle of her parasol and blushed. Natty Bumpo took a fresh chew of tobacco. At length Genevra said, as if in half-spoken reverie:

"The soft shining of the moon and the peaceful ripple of the waves, seem to say to us various things of an instructive and moral tendency."

"You may bet yer pile on that Miss," said her companion gravely. "It's all the preachin' and psalm-singin' I've heern since I was a boy."

"Noble being!" said Miss Tompkins to herself, glancing at the stately Pike as he bent over his paddle to conceal his emotion. "Reared in this wild seclusion, yet he has become penetrated with visible consciousness of a Great First Cause." Then, collecting herself, she said aloud: "Methinks 'twere pleasant to glide ever thus down the stream of life, hand in hand with the one being whom the soul claims as its affinity. But what am I saying"—and the delicate-minded girl hid her face in her hands.

A long silence ensued, which was at length broken by her companion.

"Ef you mean your on the marry," he said, thoughtfully, "I ain't in no wise partickler!"

"My Husband," faltered the blushing girl; and fell into his arms.

In ten minutes more the loving couple had landed at Judge Tompkins.

CHAPTER VI.

A YEAR has passed away. Natty Bumpo was returning from Gold Hill, where he had been to purchase provisions. On his way to Donner Lake, rumors of an Indian up-rising met his ears. "Deru their pesky skins, ef they dare to touch my Jenny," he muttered between his clenched teeth.

It was dark when he reached the borders of the lake. Around a glittering fire he dimly discerned dusky figures dancing. They were in war paint. Conspicuous among them was the renowned Muck-a-Muck. But why did the fingers of Natty Bumpo tighten convulsively around his rifle?

The Chief held in his hand long tufts of raven hair. The heart of the pioneer sickened as he recognized the clustering curls of Genevra. In a moment his rifle was at his shoulder and with a sharp "ping," Muck-a-Muck leaped into the air a corpse. To dash out the brains of the remaining savages, tear the tresses from the stiffening hand of Muck-a-Muck, and dash rapidly forward to the cottage of Judge Tompkins, was the work of a moment.

He burst open the door. Why did he stand transfixed with open mouth and distending eye-balls? Was the sight too horrible to be borne? On the contrary, before him, in her peerless beauty, stood Genevra Tompkins, leaning on her father's arm.

"Ye're not scalped, then!" gasped her lover.

"No. I have no hesitation in saying that I am not; but why this abruptness?" responded Genevra.

Bumpo could not speak, but frantically produced the silken tresses. Genevra turned her face aside.

"Why that's her waterfall," said the Judge.

Bumpo sank fainting to the floor.

The famous Pike chieftain never recovered from the deceit, and refused to marry Genevra, who died, twenty years afterward, of a broken heart. Judge Tompkins lost his fortune in Wild Cat. The stage passes twice a week the deserted cottage at Donner Lake. Thus was the death of Muck-a-Muck avenged.

THE TELEGRAPH NEWS.—The Liberal Party in Mexico have met some successes recently. General Escambado defeated a strongly guarded specie train, after a sharp battle. The Rebel General Parsons and six of his men were found dead on the field by the Liberals. Escambado is receiving large accessions of "foreigners" to his forces, but lacks ammunition..... Large bodies of troops are being mustered out of service..... Augusta, Maine, has been nearly destroyed by fire..... The iron-clad Monadnock, the steamer Vanderbilt, and the screw steamer Tuscarora are all to be attached to the Pacific Squadron, and were to leave for this coast on the first of October. These vessels rank as first of their class, and must prove very valuable accessions to our Pacific fleet.

LECTURES ON INDIA.—The Rev. Dr. Scudder, of this city, will deliver the first of his course of lectures on the customs and peculiarities of the native races of India, at Platt's Hall on Tuesday evening next. Dr. Scudder is an able and pleasing speaker, and one of the few who interest and attract an audience by the manner as well as by the matter of his lectures. We trust that this series of lectures, so highly spoken of by the press at the East, may receive their due attention from our citizens.

THE State Teachers' Institute has held its annual session at the Lincoln School House during the present week. Over two hundred delegates were in attendance. The session was one of general interest. J. Ross Browne and others of note delivered lectures before the Institute for the benefit of the State Educational Journal.

SOCIAL PARTY.—The State Guard will have a social party at their armory on Market street, on the 28th instant. An inspection, which precedes social festivities, gives them an opportunity of combining duty and pleasure.

SUNDRIES.

A story is told of two Vermont captains between whom was a generous rivalry relating to their own gallantry and that of their companies. Both were dangerously wounded at the Wilderness. Capt. B. was insensible for two days, but on the third opened his eyes and inquired if Capt. W. was alive, and on being told he was doing well, said, energetically: "Well, if W. can live, I won't die!" and he didn't.

A beautiful interchange of compliments—sincere as the speakers themselves—took place between Jerrold and Leigh Hunt, at a dinner given some years ago in honor of the latter. Jerrold said of the veteran essayist and poet, that, even in his hottest warfare, his natural sense of beauty and gentleness was so great that, like David of old, "he armed his sling with shining pebbles of the brook;" and Leigh Hunt, with equal grace and truth, observed of "his friend Jerrold," that "if he had the sting of the bee, he had also his honey."

It is said that the late Chief Baron Thompson was a very facetious companion over the bottle, which he much enjoyed. At one of the Judge's dinners during the assizes, there was present a certain dignitary of the church. When the cloth was removed, "I always think," said the reverend guest, "I always think, my lord, that a certain quantity of wine does a man no harm after a good dinner!" "Oh, no, sir! by no means," replied the Chief Baron; it's the uncertain quantity that does all the mischief!"

In the introduction to his late work on Military Surgery, Dr. Hamilton speaks of war in general in the following terms: "War is the normal condition of mankind; peace is the abnormal condition. This statement is not flattering to a people claiming Christianity and boasting of civilization; it is nevertheless true, and the fact must be accepted."

When Madge was a very little girl, her father found her chubby hands full of the blossoms of a beautiful tea-rose, on which he had bestowed great care. "My dear," said he, "didn't I tell you not to pick one of these flowers without leave?" "Yes, papa," said Madge, innocently, "but all these had leaves."

Coleridge was acknowledged to be a bad rider. One day, riding through a street, he was accosted by a would-be wit: "I say, do you know what happened to Balaam?" Came the answer sharp and quick: "The same as happened to me. An ass spoke to him!"

When Mr, Jefferson was asked respecting his religion, his memorable answer was: "It is known to God and myself. Its evidence before the world is to be known in my life; if that has been honest and dutiful to society, the religion which has regulated it cannot be a bad one."

A Lady's Waterfall on Exhibition in Hyde Park.—An English paper tells the following curious incident as having occurred in Hyde Park, Loudon: "A curious incident in Hyde Park explains the reason why human hair has arisen within the last two or three years upward of one hundred per cent. in the market. On Tuesday last, the 14th instant, a young gentleman was seen riding slowly through the crowd of equestrians, holding on high at the end of his cane a chignon, as those heavy humps of hair are technically called, with which the young ladies of the present day delight in decorating the napes of their necks. As the chignon bearer rode along, looking inquiringly around him, it was most suggestive to observe the almost involuntary manner in which at least two-thirds of the alarmed young women raised their hands to the backs of their heads, in order to ascertain that their chignons were all right and tight. Whether the gentleman was merely playing the trick for his own private amusement, or whether he had really picked up a lump of false hair which some unlucky girl had accidentally shed, will probably never be known; but the sensation which the incident caused satisfactorily accounts for the increased value of human hair as an article of commerce.

Respectability According to Knocks.—A Paris paper has the following remarks on one of the English customs: "Every London house is inhabited by one single family, and, as the outer doors are always shut, the knocks at the door, counted from within, indicate the station in life of the person at the door; to give more or less knocks is an act of insolence or degradation. The milkman, sweep, beggar, and servants knock with one single knock, as if to say, 'Allow me to come in.' Two knocks denote the postman, tax-gatherer, etc., and seem to say, 'It is my business to enter this house.' When three knocks are given, they indicate the master of the house, or a friend, and are given with an air of command, as if to say, 'Open.' Four knocks, steadily given, denote a person of consequence, some aristocrat, arrived in a carriage. These four knocks may be supposed to express, 'I intend to enter.' He who gives four knocks, and, after a short pause, repeats them with a certain proud impetuosity, is decidedly either a milord or milady, or Indian nabob, a Russian prince, German baron, or Italian marquis. These seem to say, 'Open quickly; I wish to honor you with a visit.'"

AMERICAN HUMOR.

It seems to be generally conceded that the comic Mrs. Grundy is a failure. It shares the fate of predecessors in the same specialty, the number of whom we cannot now remember. The cause of this repeated non-success is not easy of explanation. Some of the humorous journals that have been born, languished briefly, and died, in this country, deserved better fortune. Vanity Fair and The Lantern were once good, and the still earlier Yankee Doodle was at one time not without merit: but they all went down.

This frequent failure does not result from insusceptibility to the humorous. The Americans are real fun-lovers, and while they are in the main too busy to make a business of pleasure, they sometimes, as in the case of our late President, turn comical capacity to good practical account, besides making it a recreative agent. American fondness for the jocose is proven by the success of some individual humorists who do not deserve to succeed nearly so well as the journals we have named.

Among these may be named Artemus Ward, who has gained fame and made money all over the country. That Artemus never says a good and laughter-provoking thing we shall not assert. But the bulk of what he has done is heavy mirth. The fun is fearfully forced. Lacking spontaneity, his lectures are usually slow. His humor is chiefly of that inferior quality which has to do with the dislocation of language rather than any brilliancy of thought or pungency of expression. Of his published works orthographical jargon is the principal characteristic. For example, we have seen people moved to uproarious mirth by "Yours trooly, A. Ward." Were it not for the peculiar spelling of "trooly," the sentence would never be suspected of a humorous purpose. Another phrase just occurs to us which the New York Bohemians are fond of quoting, and which illustrates Ward's style. Artemus is in the habit of asking: "Why is this thus?" Of course the audience always lapses into a guffaw, but if any critic can resolve the interrogatory into the elements of fun, or show how in any respect it rises above the inane gabble of the sawdust ring, we shall be glad to hear from him.

"A Disbanded Volunteer" does better with the orthographical jargon than does Ward. Now and then he evolves from the misspelling a joke, labored, indeed, but still a joke. As a satirist, the "Disbanded" surpasses his cotemporary.

An imitator of both, "Josh Billings," has written better things than either. He would do well to drop the bad spelling forthwith.

It is impossible to derive from this distorted writing and printing of words fun enough to compensate for the pain inflicted on the eye and the offence offered to the ear. The provincialisms of Lowell, very different, it is true, from the puerile and unmeaning inaccuracies of Ward, were only made tolerable by weight of thought and naturalness of style. We doubt that Lowell could make them tolerable again. No one else need try.

Orpheus C. Kerr's serious is better than his comic vein. His fund of humor is not very rich, and while the Mackerel Brigade letters were by no means destitute of fun, the incidents grew monotonous, and William Brown, Bob Shorty, and the Conservative Kentucky Chap rather prosy.

Among the very best humorists of the country is Corry O'Lanus. His Sanitary Fair letters to a New York journal were far superior to what the Bohemians we have named write. Some of his more recent productions are very clever. One published several weeks ago on going in the country is worthy of mention, and a previous one, suggested by the controversy touching the authorship of "The Exile of Erin," and involving a discussion of the vexed question: "Who killed Cock Robin?" We are not sure that Corry O'Lanus does not suffer from the forcing process, which is not very favorable to the development of humorous talent. During the heated term Corry told us the hens had been laying boiled eggs and hatching roasted chickens. It is impossible not to be reminded by this of Holmes's verses on the comet, two lines of which are:

> "I saw a roasting pullet set > Upon a baking egg."

We do not believe Corry borrowed his jest from the Autocrat, but the unavoidable haste incident to the weekly teeth-drawing system alone prevented his remarking the resemblance of fancies.

We have no room to refer to all the more or less familiar humorists of America, or indeed any more than the one whose name we just mentioned. Oliver Wendell Holmes stands first in the front rank in spontaneity, in pathos—so closely allied to true humor—in delicacy, grace, facility; and in all that comes of high culture. It is precisely in culture that most of our humorists are conspicuously deficient. Brooklyn Standard.

A married man, who was out a whist party, when he proposed going home, was urged to stay a little longer. "Well, perhaps I may as well," he replied; my wife, probably, is as mad as she can be."

THE GREAT UNACCREDITED.

I SUPPOSE you to be a wide and general reader of the journalistic literature of to-day. You run over the daily papers; you peruse the weeklies; you study the magazines. In them you find much that is brilliant. You cut out many poems and articles, to paste in a scrap-book or carry in your porte-monnaie. These give you an untold amount of pleasure. You read them over and over; you show them to your friends; you discuss them with admiration and benefit.

But what do you know of their origin? What rapport or sympathy have you with the men and women to whose talent and labor you owe all this? Absolutely none!

The publishers of the various periodicals seem, in many instances, to have an insane idea that the less that is known of their contributors, the more glory will redound to "the concern."

I am not quite sure that the elevated Bostonians who issue the Atlantic Monthly would not like to have it thought, in a vague and indefinite way, that the most versatile and accomplished magazine writers of the age were Ticknor & Fields. And possibly, too, it would not be offensive to that numerous, wealthy and energetic family, the Harpers, if they should achieve reputation for infinite talent as poets, artists, and novelists, as well as publishers.

Charles Augustus asked me, yesterday, if I had read a "splendid article" entitled So-and-so.

"Who wrote it?" said I.

"Why, it was in the Atlantic," said he.

That was enough for him, representing, as he does the reading public. Nobody wrote it. It was published. It might give pleasure and instruction and consolation to fifty thousand souls, and its author might go supperless to bed, but the magazine that printed it must have all the honor and glory! It is like as if a great theatre were to be opened, wherein good-living salaries should be paid, and no actor or actress' name ever mentioned in the bills.

The London Saturday Review makes me really downright angry in this way. It contains articles in every number which delight me by their soundness and brilliancy, but which are as inscrutably incognito as the man with the iron mask. Nay, more, all the writers for that periodical are trained to employ the same style and mode of construction; so that even the most erudite critic must fain imagine, after long research, that Mr. Saturday Review himself is sole editor, contributor, publisher, and proprietor, and performs all branches of the labor alone and unaided!

The public, however, likes to know who does all this work. When it can can get hold of a name, it makes much use thereof.

In the country, they firmly believe that Mr. Bennett writes all the editorials in the Herald, and nothing is more common than to hear folks say, "I see Greely is in favor of so-and-so," simply because the Tribune has an article recommending the measure in question. In reality, it is many years since Mr. Bennett wrote a word for publication, and Mr. Greeley never writes save over his initial signature, "H. G." The inimitably witty and pungent things that dear Ned Wilkins used to write, gave the Herald a wide reputation for brilliancy, while Ned went to his grave almost unknown, outside of his circle of personal acquaintances.

A Kaffir Anecdote. — At an out-post far up in the country, resided an officer and his wife. The latter was warned by her husband not to venture far from the house; but one day, imprudently going beyond her usual limits, she encountered a wild-looking, Kaffir, who took her by the hand, and would be moved by no entreaties to suffer her to depart. He made her sit down, and, untying her bonnet, let down her long, fair hair, at which he expressed rapturous admiration. He next took off her gloves, and appeared to be enchanted with her white hands; and then proceeded to divest her of shoes and stockings, and wondered at her little white feet. How much further he would have carried his investigations it is impossible to say, had not the poor lady been rescued by a party of squaws, who, with jealousy in their looks and gestures, rushed upon the Kaffir, thus giving her the opportunity of escaping to her home. The next morning the lady and her husband were awakened at an early hour by a great chattering under their window; and on inquiring the cause of the disturbance, the gentleman was accosted by the hero of the previous day, who had been so impressed by the charms of the fair Englishwoman, that he had come with twelve squaws, to make a liberal offer of exchanging them for the gentleman's wife, and was not a little surprised when his generous terms were refused.

On the sands at Scullercoats, near Tynemouth, England, a board has been fixed, on which is inscribed the following notice: "Any person passing beyond this point will be drowned by order of the magistrates."

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM

—OF—

WILD CHERRY,

HAS BEEN USED FOR

NEARLY HALF A CENTURY,

With the most astonishing success in curing

Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of

The Throat, Lungs and Chest,

INCLUDING EVEN

CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last-named and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the "medicinal gum" of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaints is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great the popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry, there are commingled with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of

has induced many physicians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

S. H. Finley, M. D., San Francisco, Cal.
E. Boyden, M. D., Exeter, Me.
Alexander Hatch, M. D., China, Me.
R. Fellows, M. D., Hill, N. H.
W. H. Webb, M. D., Cape Vincent, N. Y.
W. B. Lynch, M. D., Auburn, N. Y.
Abraham Skillman, M. D., Boundbrook, N. J.
H. D. Martin, M.D., Mansfield, Pa.

The proprietors have letters from all classes of our fellow-citizens, from the Halls of Congress to the humblest cottage, and even from beyond the seas; for the fame and virtues of WISTAR'S BALSAM have extended to the "uttermost bounds of the earth," without any attempt on our part to introduce it beyond the limits of our own country.

TO CALIFORNIANS AND OREGONIANS.

In future all genuine WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY for the Pacific Coast will be enclosed in a new wrapper which will bear the printed names of both SETH W. FOWLE & CO., Boston, Mass, and JOHN D. PARK Cincinnati, Ohio, as well as fac-simile of the signatures of "I. BUTTS," "SANFORD & PARK," and "H. WISTAR, M. D."

THE WHISTLER.

"YOU have heard," said a youth to his sweetheart, who stood
While he sat on a corn-sheaf at daylight's decline—
"You have heard of the Danish boy's whistle of wood;
I wish that the Danish boy's whistle were mine!"

"And what would you do with it? Tell me," she said,
While an arch smile played over her beautiful face.
"I would blow it," he answered, "and then my fair maid
Would fly to my side and would there take her place."

"Is that all you wish it for? That may be yours Without any magic," the fair maiden cried;
"A favor so slight, one's good nature secures!"
And she playfully seated herself by his side.

"I would blow it again," said the youth; "and the charm
Would work so that not even Modesty's cheek
Would be able to keep from my neck your fine arm!"
She smiled and she laid her fine arm 'round his neck.

"Yet once more would I blow, and the music divine
Would bring me the third time, an exquisite bliss—
You would lay your fair cheek to this brown one of mine
And your lips stealing past it would give me a kiss."

The maiden laughed out in her innocent glee—
"What a fool of yourself with the whistle you'd make!
For only consider how silly 'twould be
To sit there and whistle for what you might take."

INTERIOR ITEMS.

CONSIDERABLE excitement was created at the Park at about two o'clock yesterday afternoon, resulting from an attack made by Barney Mulligan on Police Officer Chappell, of San Francisco. While standing in the crowd in the front of the main stand, just before the commencement of the first race, Chappell was struck on the back of the head by Mulligan by some heavy instrument, which some represent as a cane and others as a loaded billet. As Chappell retreated he was struck several times on the head, which was considerably lacerated by the blows received. He drew his pistol and faced Mulligan at a distance of perhaps twenty feet, but did not fire, as he would have been compelled to fire into a crowd. Bystanders interfered, and Mulligan was arrested by Officer Harvey. It is said that Chappell was also struck by several of Mulligan's friends. It is supposed that this assault had its origin in circumstances connected with the death of Billy Mulligan, who was recently shot at San Francisco by another officer.—Sacramento Union, Sept. 20th.

THE editor of the Rocky Mountain News has received orders from England for three husbands, for as many English ladies, who were attracted by an article in his paper in relation to the scarcity of women in Colorado. He says he is prepared to negotiate with any gentleman answering the description and who means business.

THE Margarita copper mine in this county, says the San Jose Mercury, is turning out about $1,000 worth of copper ore per day. Much of the rock will assay as high as fifty per cent. copper. Two hundred tons of rock are ready for shipment.

THE bottoms of the Yuba and Feather rivers, in this immediate vicinity, says the Marysville Appeal, have produced this season an abundant quantity of excellent corn. As this grain brings a good price, this year, the corn raisers will make a good thing of it.

A GENTLEMAN who has just returned from an extended visit to the Desert Mining District, and to the Humboldt, reports to the Gold Hill News that several fine mills are being erected on the river, and that mining matters never looked better.

THE two-mile race between Norfolk and Lodi at Sacramento, on Monday last, was won by the former in two straight heats: time, 3.37 and 3.38. The same horses will run again to-day, September 23d.

THE Yreka Union says the mines on Humbug and McAdams's creek are paying large dividends, and all those having claims are getting rich. Several large strikes have lately been made.

JUDGE BELL, late a member of the Montana Legislature, committed suicide, at Ten Mile Creek, in that Territory, recently, by shooting himself through the breast with a pistol.

D. E. MCCARTHY, of the Territorial Enterprise, has sold out his interest in that paper to J. T. Goodman, his late partner.

SMALL POX prevails to some extent at Yreka, two families being afflicted with it.

THE proper course to pursue, on being informed that somebody has threatened to pull your nose, is to procure a candle and grease it [the nose—not the candle, Mr. Suisun Herald.]

SINCERITY, or what claims the name, is always ready to force its obnoxious sentiments upon you, as "Midas" would his ears, uncalled for.

A TIGER HUNT.

MR. SARKIES was, some years ago, one of the keenest sportsmen in Dacca, but he has for some time past given up entirely all kinds of field sports. He came to Dacca a few days ago to witness the races, and being desirous, before returning to Calcutta, to visit the scenes of his former exploits to see if his hand had not lost its cunning, he obtained the loan of several elephants from Khajeh Abdool Gunny, and proceeded with a couple of friends beyond Tezgong. On reaching the jungles he heard deep growls, indicating the vicinage of a tiger; the mahout also whispered the ominous word "bag." A veteran sportsman would not go out tiger-shooting without a full knowledge of the elephant he bestrode, as much of the success, or may be danger, depends on the firmness or timidity of the animal. The animal ridden by Sarkies was offered him, from among several on the spot, which gave him the tacit assurance of its being the best in the lot, and adapted for the purpose.

This elephant was urged on, and others formed in line They had not proceeded far when the tiger, rushing out of his cover, assailed one of the pad elephants. Mr. Sarkies, with a view to draw him away from the elephant, fired a shot in a hap-hazard manner. No sooner was the gun discharged than the tiger charged Mr. Sarkies' elephant, and lacerated her ears, clawing her forehead.

The elephant turned immediately around, as on a pivot, and retreated for her life, and strange to say, the tiger dogged her heels for about a hundred yards, biting and clawing them all the while. The elephant, maddened with fear and pain, ran at a furious pace, so that Mr. Sarkies could with difficulty retain his seat, but as for shooting the tiger it was an impossibility. The tiger being attached to the heels of the hathie, was not perceptible from the back.

Mr. Sarkies fearing, at the dangerous pace the elephant was running, that she might fall into some ditch or another, or in all probability throw off the howda—in either case loss of life may have been the result—he with the greatest difficulty put his right foot on the seat, with one hand clinching the front rails of the howda; he used his double gun for a pistol, and contrived to fire it off towards the place where he suspected the tiger to have been running—the growls of the tiger alone indicating that he was at a dangerous proximity to the heels of the elephant. The tiger, at this report, let go his hold, when the elephant released from her tough customer, ran like mad. No endeavors of the mahout could stay her; fortunately, a number of elephants chanced to be on the path that the runaway was pursuing, and their mahouts, seeing how the state of things was, hemmed her in, and stopped her career.

Mr. Sarkies was so disgusted by the cowardice of the elephant, as also the culpability of the mahout in giving an elephant of that character, that he was for turning home, when another mahout told him to try another elephant, who would not disappoint him.

The howda was shifted, and Mr. Sarkies proceeded to the spot where the tiger had left him. As the field was denuded of tall jungles, the tiger was clearly seen crouched on the very spot. He allowed the elephant to approach within fifty yards, when, with a roar and bound, he charged the elephant who fully answered the praise bestowed on him, for he stood as firm as a rock; not a single step did he recede, and, with his trunk up, he boldly faced his advancing foe. The tiger received a warm welcome, and was turned by a ball (smooth bore) on his shoulder, and, as he was slowly retreating, another ball on his back laid him prostrate, when he was finally polished off by a shot. My own experience in these kinds of field sports has not been much, but I have seldom heard of a tiger charging, biting, and dogging the heels of an elephant for near 400 or 500 yards in an open plain; their nature is to remain under cover, from whence, if disturbed, they make a charge, and retreat again to their shelter, but this animal being one of the most ferocious kind, Mr. Sarkies was in eminent danger when his first elephant ran away. Either a fall of the howda, which was afterwards found to have been very loosely attached to the back, or of the elephant itself, in his headlong career, would have endangered his life.

LADIES SHOULD READ NEWSPAPERS.—It is a great mistake in female education, to keep a young lady's time and attention devoted to the fashionable literature of the day. If you would qualify her for conversation, you must give her something to talk about; give her education with the actual world and its transpiring events. Urge her to read the newspapers and become acquainted with the present character and improvement of our race. History is of some importance; but the past world is now dead, and we have nothing to do with it. Our thoughts and our concerns should be for the present world, to know what it is, and improve the condition of it. Let her have an intelligent opinion, and be able to sustain an intelligent conversation, concerning the mental, moral, political and religious improvement of our times. Let the gilded annuals and poems of the centre table be part of the time covered with weekly and daily journals. Let the whole family, men, women, and children, read the newspapers

POETICAL TRIADS.—Mr. Owen Pugh, the Welsh bard, being called upon for his opinion of the requisites of a Poet, wrote, on the spot, the following Parody on the "Bardic Triads:"

1. The three primary requisites of poetical genius: an eye that can see nature; a heart that can feel nature; and a resolution that dares follow nature.

2. The three final intentions of poetry: increase of goodness, increase of understanding, and increase of delight.

3. The three properties of a just imagination: what may be, what ought to be, and what is seemly to be.

4. The three indispensabilities of poetical language: purity, copiousness, and ease.

5. Three things that ought to be well understood in poetry: the great, the little, and their correspondencies.

6. Three things to be avoided in poetry: the mean, the obscure, the extravagant.

7. Three things to be chiefly considered in poetical illustration: what shall be obviously seen, what shall be instantly admired, and what shall be eminently characteristic.

8. The three dignities of poetry: the true and wonderful united, the union of the beautiful and the wise, and the union of Art and Nature.

9. The three advantages of poetry: the praise of goodness, the memory of what is remarkable, and the invigoration of the affections.

10. The three purities of poetry: pure truth, pure language, and pure conception.

11. Three things that should thoroughly be: thoroughly learned, thoroughly animated, and thoroughly natural.

MR. ASHLEY'S POSITION.—In party matters, I have enough to do to fight the common enemy, without making war upon Union men because they may differ with me on some of the new and perplexing questions which the war has forced upon us. While a member of the Union party, I shall defend its settled policy, support its regularly nominated candidates, and acquiesce in the fairly expressed will of the majority of the party on all political questions, if I can do so conscientiously. If I cannot, I shall openly withdraw from the organization. I have always labored for the triumph of ideas rather than for the triumph of men; and I hope that for the residue of my public life, whether it be long or short, that I may continue as I began. In any event, my friends may rest assured that I will never join the bushwhackers or camp followers for the sake of place and power. Whatever other faults I may have, fawning at the foot of power for place and plunder has never been, and I trust never will be, one of them. I know that the brightest jewel in the diadem of the conqueror is mercy; yet mercy without discrimination, history and revelations alike teach us, gives no security to governments. I would pardon many—perhaps too many. I would rather err on the side of mercy than err on the other side. I am so anxious for a nation of men homogeneous in aim and purpose, that I would go far to win back an erring brother to his former love of the Union and Constitution of our fathers; to the love of that old Flag which is to-day the emblem of our national power and national glory; that Flag which is to become the Flag of destiny and of empire, before which all nations shall stand with uncovered heads.

Thanks to the God of nations and of men, in speaking to-night of the Flag, as it floats on the land and on the sea, we can truthfully say:

'No more its flaming emblems wave
To bar from hope the trembling slave,
No more its radiant glories shine
To blast with woe one child of thine.'

Recognizing the new and responsible duties which the war has imposed upon us as American citizens, let us go forward to the discharge of those duties in a forgiving spirit and with thankful hearts; let us go again to the old altars, and take with us our children, and our erring and repentant brothers also, and swear by Him who liveth forever and ever, that come what may, divisions, dissensions, rebellions, interventions and foreign wars, that living or dying, no other flag shall ever wave above our homes or graves.

NUMBER TWO HUNDRED THOUSAND.—At the National Fair, Dublin, Ireland, the two hundred thousandth Sewing Machine manufactured by the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company was on exhibition. We believe the Wheeler & Wilson machine has been before the public but about ten years; this would give an average rate of manufacture of 20,000 machines per year during the whole of that period. A most popular machine, truly.

TRIMMINGS.—Mrs. NORCROSS, No. 5 Masonic Temple, Montgomery street, is prepared to fill orders for civic and military at the shortest notice; also, invites the ladies to call and examine trimmings for Opera Cloaks received per steamer from New York. Mrs. Norcross has a Show Case on exhibition at the Fair, containing goods which for elegance and taste are not surpassed by any other establishment on the Pacific coast.—San Francisco Leader, Sept. 16.

LADIES' DRESS GOODS.—Thaffe & Co., proprietors of the popular dry goods house, No. 9 Montgomery street, are now opening their new fall styles of Silks, Cashmeres, Foulard De Laines, Empress Cloths, Linseys, Prints, etc., of endless and bewildering varieties. They have just placed $50,000 worth of new dress goods on their shelves.

PERFECTION IN WOMAN is all in all. Ladies, as they see the unsullied purity of the complexion, the alabaster and transparent face, all spots tan, moth, pimples, freckles banished, are led in great anxiety to enquire—What does it? The answer is, Davidson' Circassian Bloom.

A TRUE STORY.

DEDICATED TO THE SICK.

THERE dwelt in Sacramento a pale, bilious mechanic,
His muscles were strengthless, his blood it was chill;
And the wife of his bosom believed, in her panic,
The husband she worshipped was hopelessly ill.
Seeking daily for help, in her wifely devotion,
All vainly she tried pill, powder and potion—
Till at last, when a prey to grief's wildest emotion,
Of HOSTETTER'S BITTERS she heard from a friend.

She purchased the cordial, half hoping, half fearing,
A prayer on her lip and a tear in her eye;
And taking his hand, with words kindly and cheering,
Besought him the tonic for her sake to try.
As he drank, a new life through his system seemed stealing,
Each following draft did its mission of healing,
Until, strong in health and most grateful in feeling,
He told the "true story" here twined into song.

It is also proper to state that the Bitters are sold exclusively in glass, and never, under any circumstances, by the gallon or barrel. Imposters and imitators are abroad, and the only safeguard the public have against them is to see that the Bitters they buy have the engraved label and note of hand of Messrs. Hostetter & Smith, and their proprietary stamp over the cork of the bottle.

THE CONNECTICUT LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY organized in 1847, with a guaranteed capitul of $50,000; Eliphalet A. Bulkley was its first President, and Guy R. Phelps, Secretary. This company has been successful from the first, and has grown to be, in the number of its policy-holders, the largest company in the world, and its business for the past year was greater than that of any other Life Insurance Company in the world. The whole number of policies issued is 43,386, of which 24,054 are now in force, covering an aggregate risk of over $60,000,000. It has paid in losses, on 1,729 lives, the sum of $3,952,762; and in dividends, $2,812,904. Its capital and assets, February 1st, were $7,918,896, nearly eight millions. During the year ending February 1st, 8,115 policies were issued, $482,387 were paid in losses, on 201 lives, and $343,767 in dividends; its receipts for premiums were $2,381,954, and for interest on investments $556,608, making total receipts for the year, $2,938,562, nearly three millions. During the past four years, its interest on investments has been more than sufficient to pay the losses. The present officers of the Connecticut Mutual Life are, James Goodwin, President; Guy R. Phelps, Secretary.

HOME MANUFACTURES.—It is the duty of every Californian to give encouragement to the productions of our own State, and, all other things being equal, preference should be shown to our manufactures. Now, in the matter of cloth, things are at least equal, and when we examine the fine suits of fashionable clothing for sale at Quincy Hall, we incline to the idea that our productions have the advantage. This is the pioneer establishment in manufacturing clothing from California cloth, having commenced it in April last. Their work gives general satisfaction, and we are pleased to learn that their business in this line is steadily increasing. Our advice to our readers is, to call and examine for themselves at Nos. 545, 557 and 549 Washington street.—Call.

A LADY AT THE FAIR.—We always find a crowd gathered about the show-case of Mrs. Read, whose Skirt Supporters and Chest Expanders are in extensive use wherever fashion reigns or health is an object to be desired. Specimens of her work in this branch of art, remarkable for perfection and finish, are exhibited by her, and also supporters for Hernia and Rupture, which, it seems, are extensively in demand. All these are more or less appliances for the preservation of health; but the cynosure of all eyes is the "Bust," an article indispensable to a lady's toilet. These and other objects and curiosities, it is generally conceded, richly entitle Mrs. Read to a premium.—San Francisco Sunday Mercury.

MANY OF THE DISEASES which hitherto baffled and defied the highest medical skill, are now speedily cured by Dr. H. A. BENTON, whose processes of applying electricity receive the approbation of all prominent physicians. The nerves are directly reached, and patients suffering from chronic complaints find almost immediate relief, and rapidly recover their former healthy condition. Dr. Benton is a physician of excellent reputation, and as a Medical Electrician occupies the front rank in his profession.—Golden Era.

MONEY TO LOAN.—$5,000 to loan, in small sums, on City Property, for a term of years; repayments received in monthly instalments. Deposits received at 1 per cent per month from month to month. Apply to the California Building and Loan Society, 406 Montgomery street, opposite Wells, Fargo & Co's.

DR. C. W. MOORE'S MEDICAL AND SURGICAL INSTITUTE.—In speaking of this Institution, the Sunday Mercury says: "Aside from the most skilful treatment and nursing, the large, airy and elegantly-furnished rooms, will enable the patients to enjoy all the comforts and luxuries of a home. All in all, we regard Dr. Moore and his Institute a most valuable acquisition to the Pacific Coast—the need of which we have long since felt." See advertisement.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES
NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important considerationparticularly where fuel is scarce The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

JUPITER AND SQUARZA.

[AFTER BON GAULTIER.]

"TAKE away this clammy nectar!"
Said the king of gods and men;
"Never at Olympus' table
Let that trash be served again.
Ho, Lyæus, thou, the beery!
Quick—invent some other drink;
Or, in a brace of shakes, thou standest
On Cocytus' sulphury brink!"

Terror shook the limbs of Bacchus,
Palely grew his pimpled nose,
And already in his rearward
Felt he Jove's tremendous toes;
When a bright idea struck him—
"Dash my thyrsus in the lunch!"
For you never were in Frisco,
And you know not Squarza's Punch!"

"Bring it!" quoth the Cloud-compeller;
And the wine-god brought the liquor—
"Campagne and nectar are nought to it!
Bring me more, Bac.! come, be quicker!"
And Saturnius drank and nodded,
Winking with his lightning eyes;
And amidst the constellations
Did the star of SQUARZA rise!

A NEW INVENTION!

LEWIS'S

Self-Acting Wagon Brake!

By means of this invention, the wheels of a wagon are made to lock themselves when going down hill, certainly and effectively, and are released the moment there is any strain on the horses, without attention on the part of the driver.

It is already in use in many parts of the East, and has everywhere given satisfaction.

It will lock a wheel so that it CANNOT REVOLVE, the efforts of the wheel to turn making the lock tighter.

It operates in an instant, locking or unlocking as necessary.

It needs no care and requires no exertion.

It cannot fail to work, and is easier on the team than the common brake.

Simple in its construction, and costing no more than the common lock, it gives perfect security, and a child may drive the heaviest wagon over the steepest roads.

It can be used in the same way as the common hand or foot brake: A touch on the lever will effectually lock the wheels, and

RUNAWAYS ARE IMPOSSIBLE.

READ WHAT THE PRESS SAYS OF THE CALIFORNIAN.

The style is that of charming repose, easy address, and delicacy of perception. There are many original thoughts scattered throughout its columns; but the chief merit of the paper lies not so much in this as the thoroughly graceful style in which they are conveyed to the reader.—Call.

It will be found a welcome visitor in every house, and we wish it success. It is readable and interesting, and cannot fail making friends.—Alta.

The paper contains sixteen pages, is conducted with marked ability, grace and dignity, and presents a remarkably handsome appearance. It promises to become one of the best literary journals in the country.—Monitor.

In size and general appearance it resembles the New York Round Table. The contents, original and selected, establish the presence of editorial taste and the command of intellectual resources to insure a literary success, at least.—Sacramento Daily Union.

From what we have seen of its contents, we believe it will be a welcome visitor to the fireside. It is not of the wishy-washy, sentimental, sickly order of publications, but one which we hope Californians will be proud to recognize as one of the productions of our coast.—Marysville Express.

It presents a beautiful typographical appearance, and we may safely say is the neatest printed paper printed in California. It promises to be a popular and successful publication, and we add our quota of recommendation most cheerfully to this end.—Marysville Appeal.

The Californian is the best-looking paper ever printed in the State, and is well-filled with good reading matter.—Sacramento Daily Bee.

It is by far the handsomest journal of its character on the Pacific coast. The people of California are in need of just such a paper as the Californian.—Napa County Reporter.

It is in convenient form for binding, and we conclude the editor will make its contents sufficiently valuable for preservation.—Territorial Enterprise.

We have read its contents with considerable pleasure, for its originality and versatility are alike commendable. It will supply a void in literary circles, which has long been felt in the community.—Police Gazette.

The Californian seems to be receiving golden opinions from the press in all parts of the State, and from the specimen before us we are satisfied they are well deserved. It is evidently destined to fill a high place in the ranks of journalism on the Pacific coast.—Sonoma County Democrat.

We find it well filled with reading matter, original and selected, of the highest order.—Mountain Messenger.

The Californian is a high-toned literary publication, and of such a character as should receive a liberal support from the people of the Pacific coast.—Herald, Suisun.

We can assure our readers that the Californian is a first class literary and family journal, full of interesting matter and ably edited. It is established on a permanent basis, and Californians should take pride in extending its circulation.—Grass Valley National.

The Californian is a journal of high literary character, and will undoubtedly become popular.—Nevada Transcript.

It is the best literary paper published on the Pacific coast. The matter it contains is carefully prepared, well-digested, and worthy of perusal.—Nevada Gazette.

It is a handsome paper of sixteen pages, about the size of the Round Table before it was cut down, and not unlike that journal in character and scope. If such a journal can be sustained in California it is certainly a good token for the literary taste of the land of gold.—Boston Transcript.

It is enlivened with a vein of humor, that promises for it a position in the first rank of our native publications.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

A weekly journal, made up of editorial and selected matter indicating ability and excellent judgment.—Boston Post.

The paper is published in handsome quarto form, is very lively, and shows a disposition to redeem its promise to devote itself to the "best interests of California;" it deserves success.—N. Y. Eve. Post.

It contains an immense quantity of matter, selected with exquisite taste, varied, instructive, amusing, and always worthy of attention.—N. Y. Review.

Many of the above notices were given by our contemporaries during the publication of our first volume. With pride and pleasure we remark evidences of continued good will and approval in the columns of home and Eastern journals. No literary paper in California is copied by first-class Atlantic publications to one-tenth the extent that honors the CALIFORNIAN. By a firm adherence to the course we have hitherto pursued—fearlessness in condemning what we believe to be wrong (especially in regard to literary pretension where no merit exists,) by always preferring a good "selection" to an indifferent "contribution," by encouraging talent where it unmistakably has a germ, and utterly refusing to foist upon our readers the namby-pamby productions of brainless "space-annihilators," we feel confident we shall consult the wishes of the better class of readers, and that a rapid increase in its circulation will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to demonstrate the good taste of the people of California.

LECTURES ON INDIA.

WILL DELIVER THE FIRST OF HIS

Course of Lectures on India,

AT

PLATT'S HALL,

TUESDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 26TH,

AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

SUBJECT—Races of India, Languages, Curious Customs, Fakirs, Hermits, Hindoo Wit, and Hindoo Women.

TICKETS OF ADMISSION, - - - ONE DOLLAR.

No extra charge for Reserved Seats.

Tickets to be had at the principal Book and Music Stores, and at the door on TUESDAY MORNING.

Dr. Scudder's Lecture on India, delivered last evening in the College-street Church, was very largely attended. Rarely has an audience been so highly pleased and so deeply interested in any public lecture as was that last evening. Dr. Scudder is an able and eloquent lecturer; easy, graceful and polished in delivery, while his style of description and narrative is most charming. The pictures he presented of India life and customs were graphic, and placed before the audience in colors not to be forgotten. Altogether, the Lecture was a successful effort, and we venture the assertion that not one of the thousand who attended last evening would willingly be absent from any one of the course.—New Haven News.

The closing lecture of this brilliant course, though delivered on a rainy night, was attended by more than 2,000 people. In both manner and matter it excelled the preceding efforts of the eloquent lecturer; and as a just analysis of the relations of British power to the Indian race, it was worthy of a Christian statesman. The incidents and causes of the recent mutiny, and the career of the heroes it called upon the stage, were sketched with great ability and graphic skill, and with a constantly evident interest in the fate of an empire where the lecturer first saw the light, and to which his own energies, and those of his missionary father and five missionary brothers are devoted. At the close of the lecture on Monday night Rev. Dr. Prime called Mr. Doremus to the Chair, and Rev. Dr. A. D. Smith offered resolutions of thanks for the course, and requesting its early repetition, which were passed unanimously, with marked approbation. We hazard little in saying that as no course of lectures in this city was ever more successful, so none ever more deserved success for their remarkable combination of instruction and entertainment.—*N. THE MOUSE-TRAP.

"We that have free souls, it touches us not."
HAMLET—Act III., Scene 2.

THERE is a limit to human endurance. Even a worm will turn when trodden on, though what good it will do him we cannot tell. The proprietors of the Californian have gone a little too far. When we made arrangements with them to publish THE MOUSE-TRAP in the same form in which they published the Californian—in consequence of the high price of paper—we did not suppose that we, as editor of THE MOUSE-TRAP, would be exposed to the persecution which we have uncomplainingly borne for many weeks past, holding our peace from a dislike to expose our business arrangements to the public. But, as we observed before, there is a limit to human endurance. Shortly after the proprietors of the Californian admitted THE MOUSE-TRAP into their sheet, they informed us that when they agreed to do so they were unaware of its nature, and added that "the Californian wasn't a powder magazine." We let this pass. Again they complained that if we had a fancy for blowing up daily papers they would not allow us to do so at the risk of blowing up the Californian. We put up with this, also—in consequence of the high price of paper. After this they approached us in a different manner. "Look here," they said, "here's the Call is quite inclined to be civil, and really takes quite an interest in the Californian, and no doubt would copy it by the column if you'd only keep that infernal MOUSE-TRAP of yours from catching every little error which it makes." This was almost the crowning insult, but not quite. We also let that pass; simply because paper was still so high that to publish THE MOUSE-TRAP as an independent sheet was dangerous. Last Friday these fiends—determined to drive us to desperation, to force us to remove our MOUSE-TRAP from the shelter they had for some time with a very bad grace afforded it, and perhaps compel us to wander round the country as an itinerant vermin-destroyer—committed an act which makes our blood boil as we think of it. We had seen THE MOUSE-TRAP safely locked up—the Californian was behindhand as usual, and THE MOUSE-TRAP had to wait for it till it was ready to go to press. The concluding article contained some strictures on a letter, written by some one who signs his name "John Paul," which appeared in the Sacramento Union. We stated in the commencement of this article that the aforesaid letter reminded us of the utterances of "Barnaby Rudge's" raven which continually shrieked, "I'm a devil!" On Saturday morning we looked at THE MOUSE-TRAP and found that this article had been shorn of its fair proportions—only the first three lines remaining, and in these lines "Barnaby Rudge's" raven is made to shout, instead of "I'm a devil," "I'm a TREM"—the proprietors of the Californian thus applying the name of the Enemy of Mankind to the editor of THE MOUSE-TRAP, or intimating that "Trem" and "devil" were synonymous and interchangeable terms. We could have let that pass—paper being very high at present—but on searching to ascertain what the miscreants, who had feloniously broken into THE MOUSE-TRAP and mutilated the finest and most lively mouse, had substituted in the place of what they had removed, we were indeed enraged. A string of vile doggrel verses met our eye, entitled, "Important Mexican Correspondence," and purporting to be an intercepted letter addressed to the editor of THE MOUSE-TRAP. We correspond with a man who writes:

"Their manners to a stranger here,
Is stranger yet to see;"

We continue on friendly terms with a degraded being who outrages all laws of grammar by writing:

"The fields are parched and so's my lips—"

Ye gods! The man is an imposter! This precious effusion is signed H. By what right does he drop his h's in our mouse-trap? We appeal to the public. Is this not past enduring? The laws of English grammar set at defiance in THE MOUSE-TRAP, by a vile wretch who dares to claim acquaintance with its editor and address him familiarly! We have made up our mind. We shall remove THE MOUSE-TRAP from the Californian, and shall publish it independently immediately, directly, that is—directly paper falls.

We have received a copy of The Home Missionary, published by the American Home Missionary Society. This society has for its object the supplying of clergymen. On the last page of The Home Missionary we read: "Feeble congregations desiring aid in supporting the Gospel, are requested to make full statements of their condition and prospects, and of the reasons for granting their requests." The circulation of The Home Missionary appears to be an important part of this society's work. This publication is "sent gratuitously (the italic's are the society's,) to every individual who contributes ten dollars or upwards during the year, unless he prefers to take it as a subscriber." The subscription is fifty cents a year. The society wishes missionary boxes to be sent to it, and gives "suggestions as to their contents" as follows: "In regard to what is to be put into the box, while clothing of woolen or linen fabrics, shoes, boots, writing-paper, and books will be specially valuable, scarcely anything in the shape of plain, substantial wearing apparel or bedding, or which is of common use in any form in a family, will come amiss. Knives and forks, spoons, a pair of scissors, a spool of cotton, a skein of yarn or silk, a paper of needles or pins, a cake of wax, a dozen of buttons, a thimble, a tumbler, a tin cup, a skimmer or a pepper box, need not be left out." On the whole, the society is not particular what you send it. If you have not any good books to send, put "Hoyle on Whist," "Jo Miller's Jest Book," and other light works in the box. "Reports of the Patent Office" will not be refused; paper is worth six cents a pound now. We do not suppose a box would be refused if two pair of scissors were put into it instead of one, or two spools of cotton, but it may be taken as a rule, that the missionary who has the articles enumerated, is fully equipped for the good fight. The missionary who has a skimmer does not get a pepper box. Put in "a skimmer or a pepper box." Lest any should be fearful of sending clothing which will not fit the missionary for whom it is intended, the society informs the public that they need not have any concern about that little matter, as the "missionaries are in the way of making exchanges with each other." Would a mouse-trap be of any use to a missionary? Will the society inform us? As The Home Missionary observes, San Francisco is in a most satisfactory condition. We don't want missionaries ourselves, because we're good; we ought, therefore, to do our best to send pepper boxes and skimmers to missionaries in other parts. The report from San Francisco is: "But few stores are now opened on the Sabbath and but little business is done; and whatever of amusement is enjoyed on that day by those who do not respect its sanctity, is enjoyed beyond the limits of the city proper." Yes, indeed, we keep the city proper proper in every sense, and those lost and hardened wretches who actually enjoy themselves on Sunday, do it outside the city; they go and look at a lot of profane seals at the Cliff House and hear profane music at the Willows. We have, however, one dark strip within the city proper in the shape of a collection of profligate monkeys and unholy bears at a place called North Beach; a great many ungodly little children go and gaze at these animals on Sunday, and we fear will continue to enjoy themselves thus, unless the Home Missionary Society will send a missionary (let him bring his own box) to preach to the feeble congregation. With the exception of the monkeys we are as near perfection as a city can be expected to be on Sunday, and have preaching in the streets every Sabbath in front of a newspaper office. If The Home Missionary would like a mouse-trap it can drop us a line enclosing stamp for reply.

We notice an advertisement stating that "a young man, an American and Protestant by birth, desires a situation as Porter in some wholesale establishment." This "Protestant by birth" should marry and raise a family of ready made Protestants to check the advance of "Popery." To paraphrase Shakspeare: "Some achieve religion and some have religion thrust upon them," but here is a man who was born with a religion—a Protestant by birth. Happy the wholesale establishment which secures the services of this Protestant porter! Oh, admirable young man! As he came into the world his first infantile cry was a protest against the errors of the Church of Rome! Not to many is it granted to be Protestants by birth, and such as enjoy this privilege are eminently qualified to act as porters in wholesale establishments. We trust this young man is ere this engaged.

THE New York Home Journal says:

"Harry Flash, recently of Mobile, has become a resident of this city, and is engaged in business. A new edition of his poems will be published in the autumn."

We had a better opinion of the Home Journal than to suppose that it would lend encouragement to the publication of flash literature.

We never fully appreciated what a "strong leader" was till quite lately. Several persons speaking of a recent scandal, remarked to us: "The Spirit of the Times has a pretty strong leader on the subject." We searched for the Spirit of the Times for the purpose of ascertaining what style of article suited the popular taste. Alas! never until we read that wondrously strong article, were we aware of our own weakness. How tame and spiritless do the paragraphs which we fondly imagined were terribly severe, appear when compared to the leading article in last week's Spirit of the Times. We intend to reform our style on this model. It is, indeed, withering! Speaking of Gottschalk, the editor says:

"Afraid of his coward carcass he left the city by stealth on the Colorado, on Monday last, to escape the just vengeance which was about being visited upon him."

It will be some time before we shall acquire sufficient courage to write such a sentence as that. It seems obscure to us. His carcass is described as "coward"—an abbreviation of "cowardly"—why then should he be afraid of it? Does a coward inspire fear? Surely a "coward carcass" is nothing to be afraid of. We intend to read the Spirit of the Times regularly in future, and hope to arrive at a just appreciation of its leading articles after a course of six months reading.

Does not the following which we clip from a religious paper encourage people to die drunkards?

"Five Governors of the State of New York, including three of the greatest and best she had, died drunkards."

Is not the fact that three of the greatest and best Governors the State of New York ever had died in a state of intoxication rather an encouraging one for drunkards? How such a paragraph was admitted into the columns of a religious paper we cannot imagine. It would have been far more expedient to state some other particular concerning the three best Governors the State of New York ever had, instead of furnishing drunkards with such a powerful weapon against the Cause of Temperance. Will not the unhappy inebriate when told by one of the Sons of Temperance of the destructive consequences which follow an indulgence in the vice of drunkeness, hiccup out: "Got better chance 'n you of been Guv'nor New York ole feller." We fear this. Religious papers ought to be more careful in making selections. How much better it would have been to have picked out five Governors of the State of New York who were never known to drink intoxicating fluids, utter profane language, or even chew tobacco—that is, provided five of this description could be found.

What a glorious welcome did California give to the war-worn heroes who some days ago returned, bringing with them their banners which bore the record of a hundred fights. How the bells pealed forth a merry welcome to the veterans who had fought so bravely and so well, how the old flag which they had shed their blood to protect from dishonor waved from a thousand housetops! Oh, 'twas a glorious sight to witness the triumphal march of those bold troops through our streets while bands of music played the inspiriting air of "Johnny Comes Marching Home." How the crowd pressed eagerly on them, grasping the bold fellows by the hand, while fair ladies waved their handkerchiefs from the windows and showered bouquets on the brave defenders of the Union. The editor of THE CALIFORNIAN says the above is all hosh, and that there isn't a word of truth in it; that the soldiers marched through Montgomery street in silence, not a soul turned out to bid them welcome, and the war-worn veterans went and got horribly intoxicated in disgust at the ingratitude of Republics. A pretty thing this would be to print. Not a bit of it. If the people of San Francisco didn't give the soldiers a welcome, the "Mouse-Trap" will give them one in print. We saw that welcome—in our mind's eye.

THE San Jose Mercury devotes nearly half a column of its space to abusing Gottschalk, he having "stuck the office for a three sheet poster." After relating a certain scandalous story, the Mercury winds up thus:

"We pronounced him a musical humbug when we first heard him try to "play a tune." We thought then that the piano was not his forte, however artistically he might seem to finger the keys. Our general opinion of the man is now confirmed and riveted with several expressive adjectives.

This is a delightful specimen of the Mercury's logic. Gottschalk has proved himself an unprincipled scamp in San Francisco as well as in most cities which he has visited, and has left without paying the San Jose Mercury for a three sheet poster, therefore that paper prides itself on the display of ignorance which it made in pronouncing him "a musical humbug!" Had he paid his bills and otherwise behaved himself respectably, his claim to be considered the finest pianist in the United States would never have been disputed. "Lord, what fools these mortals be!"

TREM

DAVID BROWN.

I.—1862.

"NOW, Brown," said I, as I turned down the bedquilt, preparatory to getting into bed, "you've been at it again!"

"At what?" quoth Brown.

"Why, shaking the feathers all over to your side of the bed. I won't stand it, now, that's all." And I gave the bed an indignant dig with my fists.

Brown fell back on his chair and laughed immoderately.

"Oh, you may laugh," I growled, "but, by George! it's no fun. You're always up to some such hoggish trick, and I say it's no fun. I'll give Mrs. Scoavle notice to-morrow—see if I don't. I pay as much board as you do, and I won't be come it over this way any more."

"Oh, now, what's the use in getting grouty, Pomeroy?" said Brown, as he kicked his boots across the room.

"Grouty? Who wouldn't get grouty? I don't come games on you. A fellow has enough to bear at this miserable boarding house without you to make it worse."

"Now, Pom, let the boarding house alone. Boarding houses are alike. Mrs. Scoavle gives as good as any one else will for the money."

"Oh, you can stand anything. I never saw such a fellow as you are. You'd get along in a coal-bin."

"I'd get along as good as I could, Pom, wherever I was. I don't believe in being so all-fired thin-skinned. Why don't you take things as you find 'em? I do."

"Well, you may take my side of the bed, then. See how you'll take that, after you've shook all the feathers over back."

"You don't mean it, Pommy! What a beast you are getting to be!"

"Don't like the place you fixed for me, do you? You'll sleep there, though, or you'll haul me out of bed."

With that I smuggled myself under the quilts as if determined to die there in defence of my rights. Brown laughed a good-natured laugh as he buttoned his night-shirt.

"I guess we won't fight to-night," said he. "It's too late."

Then he turned off the gas and got into bed.

Brown and I boarded at a cheap boarding house, where the accommodations were graduated very closely down to the price—we were fellow clerks in a railroad office, and our salaries were precious small.

I was a regular growler. Everything went wrong with me. Did you ever notice that people who are the hardest to please, people who find fault with everything, generally get the very worst of everything? That's my experience, in boarding-houses and out of them. I used to think Mrs. Scoavle was a regular skinflintess, and everything in and about her house at wrong ends. I should have left her a dozen times but for that selfish Brown—as I called him and as I believed him. I was five years older than Brown, but, somehow or other, he used to do pretty much as he pleased with me. There was something curiously fascinating about the fellow, notwithstanding he was such a hog—always looking out for Number One—a very prince of selfishness—must be, or how could he get along so nicely? He was high in favor with Mrs. Scoavle and the servant-girls, while I was quite the reverse. If you ever boarded out you know what that amounts to. The chambermaid used to do everything she could to please Brown and vex me. That matter of the feathers was her work, of course, but how could I know it? Brown never enlightened me. That was the worst of it. When I called him a hog he would laugh in my face as though he enjoyed it. The table girls used to look out for him in just the same way. If there was a knife with a handle that wobbled, you may be sure he never got it. I generally did.

The next morning Brown was out of bed bright and early, for it was a holiday with us, and that was a rare thing. He made his toilet cheerily, humming a little song, and was pulling on his best boots, when I got up and proceeded to make my ablutions.

"Now, then, Brown, where's the soap?" said I, in much vexation.

"I don't know," he replied. "I haven't seen any soap. I got along without."

I looked at him incredulously.

"Oh, don't stand there staring at me as if I was a funeral, Pom! I haven't swallowed the soap."

"Then where is it?"

"I say I don't know. It may be in your boots for all I can tell."

I looked in my boots, half expecting to find it there, and then washed myself rebelliously.

"Hang me if I don't give Mrs. Scoavle a going over for this," said, as I took up my patent-leather gaiters to rub them off. I found the soap in one of them. "Now, then," I cried, triumphantly, "here it is! I'd like to know how the soap got into my Sunday gaiters. I presume you'll say you didn't put it there."

"I suppose one of us must have dropped it there," said he.

"Yes, I dare say one of us did," was my angry response.

At dinner that day we had green peas—the first of the season. I am very fond of green peas. So is Brown. We ate them with a relish, and the dish was all too small; but there were no second dishes of such things at Mrs. Scoavle's, and that I knew very well; so I pushed the empty saucer away with a sigh. Brown pushed his away with a wink, directed at me.

A minute later I noticed Brown's dish had been replenished. New regulations, thought I, and beckoned one of the servant girls.

"Any more peas?" said I.

"Peas is all out, Mr. Pom'roy," said Maggie.

Of course! And there sat that hoggish Brown eating his second dish.

"Brown," said I, as we strolled out after dinner, "I've eaten my last meal in that house."

"Have you?" said Brown, quietly.

"Yes—I have. You needn't think I shall back down this time. I'm decided, and there's an end of it."

"Now, Pom—"

"You needn't commence it," I interrupted. "I won't hear a word."

"You won't leave a fellow all alone there, will you, Pom?" said Brown, in mock grief.

"I guess you'll survive," said I. "I'm going to enlist this very day."

Brown and I had been talking about it for some weeks, but I hadn't much thought of really doing it.

"Pom, old boy, if you go I shall go too, that's flat."

"You don't mean you'll enlist with me, do you?"

"Just so."

"You're joking."

"Not unless you are, Pom."

"Why, Brown, you'll be killed! You like your ease too well. What'll Mrs. Scoavle do?"

"Well, it is rather hard on a fellow," said Brown. "I can give Mrs. Scoavle a lock of my hair, you know. I shall stick by you, old man."

We did it. There was a new call for 300,000 men, and a regiment was rapidly filling up. I put my name down among the privates, and right after came the name, in a bold round hand, "David Brown"—that selfish Brown.

I went to bed in an unwonted good humor that night; and Brown said, as he flung his pants over the mirror and his necktie under the table—

"Where do you suppose we'll be a year from this, Pom?"

"Away from Mrs. Scoavle's boarding house," said I.

II.—1863.

"Brown, you're at your old tricks."

"What's the matter now?"

"Why, look at my blanket! It's wet. How's a fellow to sleep on such a blanket as that?"

"Why didn't you dry it?" says Brown. "Mine's as dry as a squirrel's nest."

"Oh, of course it is! How could I dry it when I had to stand guard all the evening? You might have looked after it! you would if you weren't so selfish. That's your style."

"Oh, what's the use growling over a wet blanket! I've slept on one often, and so've you. Take it easy, Pom, and go to sleep."

"You might give me yours after I've been out in the cold the past two hours, and you sitting here by the fire. I believe the blanket would have dried, itself, if you hadn't shoved it into the furthest corner of the house. It's like you."

All the answer that I got was a snore. Was there ever such a hog?

We were at Chattanooga now. Our quarters were comfortable, for the cold fall rains were kept off nicely by our little red cedar shanty—built the day after we camped. I might say that Brown built it himself, for he certainly did more work than any four other men in camp—no matter in what way. He never shirked. But when he got his nest made, be sure he was just as ready to enjoy it as he had been to build it. His health was splendid. He could sleep all night in a puddle of water, and come out of it next morning as hearty and good-natured as if he had slept in a bed of down. At breakfast, the morning after the blanket episode, Brown had milk for his coffee.

"Where'd you get that?" I asked.

"Tom Bates caught a cow last night," said Brown; "I thought you had some."

"Well, I didn't. Give me a little of yours, can't you?"

As I spoke the fellow was in the act of swallowing it.

"Spoke too late, Pom," said he, with a broad grin.

"Oh, of course! You're as big a hog as ever. I believe you'd see a fellow starve before you'd give him anything you wanted for your own precious stomach."

"You won't starve for want of milk in your coffee, Pom. I like it first-rate without milk."

"Well, I don't. I never can get used to it. It goes against my stomach."

"I'll drink it for you, Pom, if you're afraid it'll make you sick."

"Oh, thank you."

I was disgusted with him.

You know how we fought at Chattanooga. That day we went through fire. I can't describe it of course. We soldiers don't know much how a battle looks; it's a busy time with us.

Night came down on a bloody field, where I lay with my right leg shattered all to pieces by a shell from Lookout. Wounded, dead, and dying lay strewn around me. The darkness settled thicker and thicker. The stars looked down coldly on us. Ah, how I thought about old times! How I used to despise Mrs. Scoavle's bed and board! If I were only there now! I've seen the last of that, thought I. I wondered where Brown was. You lose sight of your friends wonderfully in the smoke and din of battle. No doubt he got off safe, and was sitting by the camp-fire now. He always looked out for Number One.

A hand touched mine in the darkness. It was wet with blood.

"Who's this?" uttered a husky, feeble voice.

"Tom Pomeroy," said I; "who are you?"

"No, Pom, you don't say you're here," said the voice; "are you hurt much?"

"My leg's split to flinders," said I. "Is this Brown?"

"Ay—Brown," said the feeble voice—feeble and muffled—uttered through rebellious groans. "I'm done for, I think."

"Where are you hurt?"

"All over, Pom. There isn't a whole limb on me. I think there's a bullet through my left lung. I can hardly speak for the blood in my mouth."

We lay in the silence of exhaustion for some minutes, but I knew by the way the poor fellow pressed my hand that he was busy with thought.

"Brown," said I, "it's fourteen months to-day since we enlisted. Do you remember?"

"Ah!" he murmured.

"I brought you here, old friend," said I.

"Pom, don't say that!"

It seemed to hurt him.

Another long silence followed. We both spoke only with great effort.

"Oh, for a drink of water!" I cried. I was perishing with thirst.

"Can you get my canteen?" said Brown. "There's some milk in it. Drink it."

I got the canteen, and held it to him.

"Drink, you," said I. "It will revive you."

"Don't waste it, Pom. Drink it up. It may keep you alive till they come for you. It wouldn't help me now."

I could not coax him to drink a drop. With eager, trembling lips I touched the mouth of the canteen. Ah, how refreshing it was!

"They're coming," said I, as I spied a lantern drawing near.

The owner of the lantern approached. There was another with him. They stopped near by, and leaned over a rebel soldier who lay there, badly wounded, but, as it appeared, conscious. The one with the lantern thrust his hands into the rebel's pocket, and drew forth the contents. The poor fellow remonstrated. The other suddenly dropped a bayonet through his heart.

"That's the way to fix 'em, Jim," said the one with the lantern, "when they don't like it. It's humane to put 'em out o' their pain, ain't it?—ha, ha!"

Then they came to us, and threw the light of their lantern on our face. We knew our safety lay in perfect submission only. They robbed Brown, and he never stirred or showed a sign of consciousness. I thought myself that all was over with him. Then they came to me.

"This fellow's shamming possum," said one of them, as he spurned my head with his foot.

"Leave him be!" fiercely uttered Brown, in a voice that would have been a shout but for the death-current through which it struggled.

"Fix that feller, Jim," said the one with the lantern, looking around.

A pistol cracked, and "Jim" leaped up, uttered—"God!" and fell dead.

"Damn you!" said the other, turning upon Brown, "you've done it now!" and he flashed a knife over my old friend's head. Brown struck up with his pistol, and the knife flew from the man's hand. At the same instant I caught his foot and tripped him. He fell headlong upon Brown, and was received in the embrace of my dying comrade, who in his death-agony struggled with the cursing brute. To my last hour I shall remember that fearful scene—the thief and the blood-covered soldier rolling over and over, in the struggle of death, in the dim starlight of that ghastly field; the one cursing furiously, the other silent, with all his energies centered in the grip with which his teeth were fastened upon the throat of the robber.

The laughing, light-hearted fellow, who loved his ease so well, and made sport of my petty vexations, when a great hour of horror came changed to a bandog in the service of his friend! Whether he could have lived, had he kept silence at the moment when he saw my life endangered, I know not. and it does not matter. He gave his life to save me—that I know.

I swooned while the struggle yet progressed. Days after I awoke in the hospital. They told me how they found poor Brown and the dead robber lying—the hero's teeth still in the fellow's throat.

LITERARY ITEMS.

Miss Yonge, the author of The Heir of Redcliffe, that most potent awakener of youthful sympathies, is writing a novel for a magazine, called "The Dove in the Eagle's Nest." We hope for the sake of Miss Yonge's readers, that it is a better story than her Clever Woman of the Family, lately reprinted here. We have four times strenuously endeavored to read the latter novel, but have been utterly defeated by its dreary mediocrity.

Miss Muloch, the novelist, has become Mrs. Craik, she having married the son of Professor G. L. Craik, the eminent author of the "History of English Literature." The newspapers first announced her marriage to a gentleman with a wooden leg, and then gave her Professor Craik himself for a husband. The professor is sixty-six years old, having been born in 1799. We notice that he has just published a "Manual of English Literature."

R. H. Newell ("Orpheus C. Kerr,") says the Citizen, intends to write a Life of Edgar Allan Poe, for which he has collected the requisite materials. We do not doubt that Mr. Newell will write an interesting biography of the eccentric poet; but we cannot help thinking that the work ought rather to be done by some writer who was personally and intimately acquainted with Poe.

Robert Buchanan, whose powerful and deeply pathetic "London Idyl," which appeared in the fourth number of the Fortnightly Review, has attracted so much attention in literary circles here, contributes to the sixth number of that magazine, an article on "The Old Ballads of Denmark."

George III. and Lord North are personages that must always possess an historic interest to Americans. We note, therefore, that Murray, of London, will presently publish The Correspondence of His Majesty, George III. with Lord North, during the American War—1768-1782. Edited, with Notes and Introduction, by W. Bodham Donne.

Sydney Smith wisely said: "Power will intoxicate the best hearts, as wine the strongest heads. No man is good enough to be trusted with despotic power; for when possessed of it, others can no longer answer for him, as he cannot answer for himself."

R. H. Stoddard, the poet, has in press a poem on the old story of the "Children in the Wood." The ballad on this subject, with which most readers are familiar, is an extremely imperfect composition.

Dante has been much written about, apropos to the six-hundredth anniversary of his birth. A Bibliography of all the works respecting him that have been published in 1865, appears in Trabner's Literary Record, No. 5.

Prof. W. E. Aytoun is dead. He wrote the Ballads of Bon Gaultier, the poem of Bothwell, and many other works. He was a man of learning, a powerful orator, and one of the wittiest men of the age.

Artemus Ward's new book will shortly be published by Mr. G. W. Carleton, of New York. It will be entitled Artemus Ward, his Travels.

An illustrated edition of Jean Ingelow's Songs of Seven, and a new edition of Alger's Oriental Poetry are announced.

Mrs. Sigouney, the poet, recently deceased, is to be commemorated by a monument in the city of Hartford, Connecticut.

Mrs. A. C. Mowatt Ritchie, Mrs. R. H. Stoddard, and Bayard Taylor will, it is said, publish novels the coming autumn. Sala's Streets of the World is also forthcoming.

Miss M. E. Braddon is presently to commence the publication of a new novel, in the St. James's Magazine, to be called "The Lady's Mile."

Victor Hugo's son has written a fantastic romance, entitled Le Cochon de Saint Antoine. It is published, and is dedicated to Voltaire.

John Saunders, who wrote Abel Drake's Wife, a book that is well known here, has lately put forth another novel, called One Against the World.

Geo. Alfred Townsend is about to publish a volume of his miscellaneous articles on American topics, printed in English periodicals during his residence abroad.

S. H. Hodgson, an English metaphysician, has put forth what we fancy must be a cheerful book for summer reading—entitled Time and Space.

Cruikshank's caricatures, eighty in number, are advertised for sale, in London, for $42 50. Forty of these memorials of the great comic artist are signed from 1813 to 1815.

HOMES WITH PRIVILEGES "THROWN IN."

Willis in his "Idlewild Mems," says: "An artist, on a visit to the Highlands, came down to the Landing Pier of Cornwall, the other evening, to enjoy (for which I had come also,) a luxury 'not charged in the day's expenses.' In ten minutes we were to see a picture, worth travelling as far as Florence to attain the sight of—the gayest of steamers making its apparition suddenly from between two mountains, and launched upon the mirror of a lake—the swiftly pencilled asterisk of a most heavenly sunset.

"But what a variation was here, to the monotony of a summer's day! The rosy glory of the West was flooding that inland lake, (the spread of the Hudson above West Point,) and the Storm-King, aproned with his seventeen hundred feet of precipitous woodlands, stood pointing his majestic instep into the water—a circling cluster of cloud-touching mountains right opposite, and all doubled in the breathless mirror at their base—as splendid a nest of landscapes as ever bewildered the dream of poet* or painter. For the music of it all, a mile off, played, just audibly, (to me,) the cascades of the glen of Idlewild; and the guns of West Point, hidden behind the Switzerland which locks that fortress in, were 'practicing' (they so call it) their adieux for the sun which was out of sight, to them, though, for us, in all its blaze five minutes more.

"And how strangely unaware was our twelve-hundred-horse-power friend, (Captain Anderson, the model of Commanders, on board his thus-potent Mary Powell,) of the manner in which he and his 'phenomenon' were to perform in a melo-drama with Nature! From the closed overfoldings of the precipices of two mountains, he was punctually to dart forth, at the speed of twenty miles an hour—(that beautiful craft which runs two hundred miles a day for the three months of summer, bearing one thousand passengers for her average 'up and down trip')—and, gliding up to the dock of our Highland village, he was to 'touch and away' with the ease of a swallow on the wing—every spectator re-astonished and re-delighted with what was but a punctuality of our week-day at home, certain to pass my library window at the same hour every morning—certain to astonish me (if I please) by the swift issue forth, from between the mountains, of the returning boat—certain to run for one hundred and fifty successive days, and sometimes, (as on the evening before the 'Fourth of July' was her actual number,) with twenty-one hundred passengers on her luxurious decks—what a circumstance is this for a belonging to a home in the country! It is (I declare) like a miracle, to see this splendid Mary Powell, (especially with her best speed on, the twenty-five miles in the hour,) as she merely 'goes by,' on the river. The majestic power with which she does her work, and the beauty with which she lays her breast to the swiftly-divided water; the quiet enjoyment of the hundreds of travellers looking over her balustrades, and the perfection of system with which she is 'handled'—it is all a daily marvel to me and mine!

"But how such 'advantages' endear one to a place! Our neighborhood of Cornwall, with this and many more such beautiful opportunities, is the prettiest 'Interlachen' of hills, within reach of New York, (sixty miles and three hours the removal only,) and yet my friend the artist fell to philosophizing, (as Anderson and his 'swift felucca' followed the sunset up the river,) on the strange propensity of the prosperous to 'sell their places.' He spoke of the three thousand 'summer boarders" (the number of our season's recent census,) and then pointed to dozens of lovely country-places 'for sale,' and we talked over the 'oddity' of reasons for breaking up—most of which we could as neighbors conjecture, but others which were a mystery to all."

*There is a wonderfully sweet "inevitable," in an Evening Post which comes to hand while I write—their correspondent saying that "the author of 'Manfred' is the only successful painter of Swiss scenery."

Meat Pies Without Vent.—A correspondent of the Lancet, in commenting on the case of Mr. Sprague, who was charged with having poisoned his wife and her father and mother, at Ashburton, says: "All learned toxicologists and chemists appear to have forgotten the important fact that if a meat pie is made without a hole in the crust, to let out certain emanations from the meat, colic, vomiting, and other symptoms of slight poisoning will occur. I have known two instances of large parties being affected in this manner from eating meat pies that had no vent in them."

There is no object in creation more lovely, more fraught with intense interest (if, indeed, we are not wholly wrapt in the petty world of self as to have none for such lofty sympathies) than a young girl standing on the threshold of a new existence; beautiful, innocent, and true; offspring as yet of joy and hope alone, but before whom stretches the dim vista of graver years, and the yearning thoughts, unspoken griefs, and buried feelings, which even in the happiest career must still be woman's lot.

Tennyson has of late been conducted by the newspapers to the brink of the grave. He is, in fact, in good health.

ROMANCE AND REALITY.

One of the most beautiful actresses of the Boulevards received daily for about a month a little penny bouquet of violets. She found the bouquet in the box or with the doorkeeper every evening as the play was about to begin, and this simple offering of an unknown love affected her in spite of herself.

While acting she looked carefully around—at the boxes, the parquet, and even behind the scenes—but to no purpose; she saw nothing by which to recognize the man of bouquets. And thereupon she gave her imagination free reign, and the imagination of an actress is very similar to that of other folks.

Was he a foreign prince who wished to captivate her heart before placing at her feet his crown and treasure? Or was he an artist too bashful to declare his passion?

She interrogated the boxkeeper, the tirewomen—in short, everybody employed in the theatre, but nobody knew anything about it. Still the bouquets came.

"Do they tell us that constancy is a chimera?" murmured she.

The other evening, as she entered the theatre, she received a fresh bouquet of violets, and this time the flowers were accompanied by a letter. "At last!" said she, and opening it by the light of a reflector, she read as follows:

"Mademoiselle: I have loved you for a long time, for is not beholding and loving you the same thing? Every day I come to admire you, to applaud you, to delight myself with the brightness of your eyes and the charm of your voice—"

"He must be in the house," thought the actress, and she peeped through a hole in the curtain. The audience had just commenced to assemble. She resumed her reading:

"Of your voice. You are indeed beautiful and charming, and happy are they who may approach you. What would I not give to be near you always? Would the treasures of all the world be worth one of your smiles? No."

"Ah, that is nice!" she sighed; and turning the page, she continued:

"No! And yet I dare to love you—to tell you that I love you still more. I venture to beg you not to reject my homage."

"He begins to explain himself," said she to herself, "and I shall know"—and she continued—"my homage. If this expression of my love does not offend you, place this bouquet of violets in your bosom. Oh! then I shall be the happiest of men!"

"Well," said she, "no signature, no name given; but let us see—here is a postscipt:"

"P. S.—If you are curious to know who writes to you, look up to the fourth tier; my legs will hang over!"

The note dropped from the hand of the actress, and her arms nearly dropped from her shoulders.

Can Balloons be Steered at Will?—The new aerial vessel or sailing balloon, an ungainly monster, but perfectly successful invention, has made its first voyage in this country with unquestionable success. There is something graceful in the appearance of an ordinary balloon, but M. Delamarne's tractable giant is the ugliest thing conceivable. That is, however, perfectly immaterial, since the trial of Wednesday, from Cremorne Gardens, resulted in a complete triumph for the clever French aeronaut. Monday was the day advertised for this interesting experiment to take place; but the weather was, as the Scotch would say, much too "soft" to venture and run the risk of failure. The steering principle seems to be accomplished by several little windmills, the precise arrangement of which is of course only known to M. Delamarne. The balloon was inflated with gas, and after a delay caused by the necessary removal of the ballast the docile mammoth sailed away, and from the commencement of the memorable voyage was clearly under subjection. M. Delamarne demonstrated in the most satisfactory manner his ability to steer the balloon in any direction whatever, and there can be no doubt that a new era in aerial navigation will commence with this particular exhibition. The balloon at once crossed the Thames, Battersea Park, Clapham, South Lambeth, and the districts beyond in a southeasterly direction. The enterprising Mr. E. T. Smith is to be warmly congratulated upon having helped to inaugurate this new and startling institution, M. Delamarne's assistants were all Frenchmen, and one Englishman only accompanied the party.

The balloon proceeded as far as Vicar's Hill, Lewisham, and finally descended in Mr. Lee's brick-fields adjoining, called Loam Pit Hill. A crowd soon collected, and it was then found a matter of great difficulty to expel the gas. The most active of the rough bystanders were allowed to stamp upon the balloon, which they did with such a vengeance that several holes were made in the canvas. The gas was liberated by these channels instead of through the valve, which with the usual perversity refused to act. M. Delamarne was found in a state of insensibility, having inhaled some of the gas, but he speedily recovered and manifested the liveliest anxiety concerning his balloon, which was at length packed up ready for removal to London. So finished the aerial voyage which, though somewhat irregular in its termination, has demonstrated that a balloon can be guided, to some extent, in its course through the air.—London Era, August 5th.

THE MERCHANTS' BOOKS.

ANOTHER LEAF FROM THE BOOK OF REAL LIFE.

IN my way home the other afternoon, I passed the door of the house where my old friend S. R. has his chambers. He was just coming out at the moment, and seeing me, he said:

"To-day has been a pleasant day for me."

I said I was glad to hear it—had a good fortune come to him?

"No," he said—"No such luck for me; but I have the pleasure to know that a case I had before me two years ago has ended in a singular way only within the last fortnight, and fortunately to the individuals concerned."

He spoke in the very cheerful and exultant manner usual with him when he had achieved a success tending to make some parties happy. Knowing his partiality for giving information on such subjects, and also to help him let off the steam of first impression and impulse, I told him I had a little leisure, and should like to know what it was all about; "for two years," I said, "is a long time for you to have had any of your class of work on hand."

"True, it is," he replied; "but the circumstances of the case were such that I could not hasten them. I was rather under the control of others as regarded my movements; and as you would like to know the story, if you will step up stairs I will annoy you half an hour or so. But it is not a sensation case of a young lady getting into Newgate and out again; I have no pretty ladies in it—they are plain-looking, common sort of women of a peculiar class of our society, more unfortunate in some respects than those poor girls we call Unfortunates, and who have now been given a new name, 'the Social Evil.' However, come along and I will tell you what makes me feel so pleased with myself this afternoon."

Seating ourselves in his room adjoining the office, he began:

"As you are engaged in commercial affairs, you may perhaps know the rich firm of Wheeler, Smith & Co., of London Wall—large merchants in foreign spices, drugs, etc. It was customary with them for one of the firm, who kept the keys of the warehouse and of the iron safety closet, to attend to the placing of the bars on the outside and be sure that the place was entirely cleared and locked up, and it was his duty to be there early in the morning to unlock—for all the parties employed to come in and attend to their work.

One summer morning, now about two years ago, the partner —— went down to the warehouse as usual, where he was met by one or two of the porters who had to undo and take down the fastenings. This was done; the iron bars taken down, and the doors opened, the lock moving with its usual facility. On going into the warehouse he observed some nutmegs strewn about on the floor, and he remarked to the porter his carelessness at not having overnight put them into the bag which was standing close by. The man said he had done so, and he was quite sure nothing had been left lying on the floor. The partner then went into the counting-house and observed the flap of a clerk's desk standing a little open—here again he remarked on the careless habits of folks in the warehouse; and he took from his pocket the key of the safety closet, which opened in its usual way without the least appearance of anything amiss—but when the door was thrown back, to his great surprise there was not a book to be seen. He could hardly believe his eyes, but, slamming the door back he locked it again, and unlocked and relocked three or four times over, but the key moved with perfect order—nothing being amiss. He then opened it again and spoke to the porter, who was at his elbow, as to his knowledge of the affair. The man answered that he recollected his master locking all up safe at night and assisting in putting in the large ledgers; but being at home with his family he knew nothing more about it. The partner then examined the small drawers which were in the closet; the key opened all but one easily enough, as if quite undisturbed. One, however, was unlocked; this had contained a little gold coin and some bank notes, which were not now there, but the lock was all perfect when the key was applied. He then went and tried the locks of the warehouse doors and found them all perfect. Quite astonished for a few minutes at this very mysterious affair, he inquired of the porters as to the various goods in the warehouse. They replied that nothing had been disturbed; except the few nutmegs they first found on the floor everything was just as it had been left the night before. He was quite puzzled; no marks of violence anywhere—a little money and all the books of the concern taken away—what could it mean? how could it have been done? were the thoughts which passed through his mind. After a few minutes, having recovered from his first surprise, he put on his hat and went off to communicate with the Chief Marshal. Going to his house, he found Mr. Cope, the Marshal, at breakfast. He was received kindly. Mr. Cope listened to his tale, and observed: 'There is only one man that I know of who could do this; but whether he is in town or not I do not know; however, I will enquire and let you know what I learn.' Mr. Cope left his house to go to his office at the Mansion House, to leave word for the Under Marshal as to his absence. On his way here, a little old woman ran after him, calling: 'Mr. Cope! Mr. Cope! I know what you want!' He stoped a moment and she came up to him. 'You want Charley, Mr. Cope. I know all about it—he did it!' 'And where can I find him?' said Mr. Cope. 'Oh, you must be quick! You must go to such a place [describing it] in Felter Lane, and you will see a small cart at the door; the books are all in the cart, and Charley is in the house—only be quick or they will be off to the country.' So this was the man who Mr. Cope suspected—the most expert burglar in London, a fine locksmith, and one who made all his own keys and tools. The Chief Marshal, who knew the old woman, and that what she said could be relied upon, went to the Mansion House and left word for the Junior Marshal. Taking an officer who was there, they got into a cab and drove off to Felter Lane. Stopping and getting out of the cab before they came to the house named, they walked up to the dwelling. Sure enough, there was a small higgler's cart standing at the door with a piece of sacking thrown over it. Lifting up the sacking, he found the cart was loaded with merchants' hooks. He left the constable in charge of the cart, and passed quickly into the house, the door of which was open. A flight of stairs was facing the door, and he heard a noise as of a window being opened. He directly rushed up the stairs, suspecting there was an attempt to escape, and he called out: 'Charley, Charley, it won't do!' He got up to the window, where he caught Charley by the leg as he was trying to get out to some leads below. Charley then came back saying to Mr. Cope, 'I can't help it, it's of no use,' or some such expression. Mr. Cope told him not to make a noise, but come away quietly; he obeyed, and Charley Turnley and the cart were taken away by the officers.

"The searches made by the police, the finding of the hooks, with the attempted escape of Charley, all being produced before the Aldermen at the Guildhall Police Court, ended in the commitment of Charley to the prison of Newgate, for trial. The trial was to be at the following Sessions. I was engaged to prosecute him; I had attended the last examination before the Aldermen, so Charley knew that I had the conducting of the case. About five or six days before the day of the Court sitting in session, I received a message from Charley, to say he wished to see me at Newgate. I went there, and the governor, Mr. Wontner, on my stating I came there by the prisoner's request, had him brought out of the prison into a private room. He began the conversation by saying, 'You and I, sir, know each other by name, although we never met before; but I wished to see you and ask you a favor, which I am sure, from my knowledge of your character, you will do for me.' I replied, he must be well aware I had, as regarded him, an unpleasant duty to perform, but anything I could do for him that was not inconsistent with that duty, I would try and do, if it were at all reasonable. He smiled and said, 'I know what your duty is, and shall give you no trouble. We have never met before, and I have never been up before the Court at any time. You will be sure to find your bill of indictment against me, and I shall be put on my trial; but I shall save you trouble, for I shall plead guilty. I shall be sentenced to transportation, and be sent away; they will expect to have a run over me, like a fox chase, but I will disappoint them by pleading guilty, and you need not bring any witnesses for the trial.' I remonstrated with him, and said he had better take his chance with the jury. 'O, no,' he said, 'I am too well known to escape; but, as it is my first and last appearance, I do not want to be made too much of a show of, and I shall be sentenced to transportation and be marked to be sent away, and I now wish you to help me. I shall be sent away from the country, and I shall get my wife to call on you a few months after, to know if you can assist her to get out of the country to join me, and bring our two children with her, for she is a good young woman and has been a faithful and kind wife to me.' I replied, 'The Government will never send your wife and children after you.' 'I know that,' he said, 'but they will not prevent her coming out on her own account. There is plenty of money, so you need not be afraid. Old Mrs. Watts will call on you about it.' 'What,' I said, 'old Mrs. Watts!" and I was almost going to say, 'the old woman who betrayed you,' but I checked myself. 'Yes,' he said, 'she is rich enough, and will arrange all with you; and if you will but help me to have my wife and children come out to me, I shall ever be grateful for your kindness. This is the favor I want you to do for me.' Thus finding the nature of his request, I promised I would see Mrs. Watts, and I left him, fully relying upon his word to perform his part of the arrangement about the trial."

"And what sort of a person was this Charley you speak of?" I inquired.

"Well," said S. R., 'he is a mild speaking man, about your size. In ballroom dress he would be much better looking than half the men present. He was not a big, burly, bull-headed ruffian, as I suppose you thought his profession would require or cause him to be; but a civil man, of quiet demeanor."

"So, you took the mild thief's word as of an honest man?"

"Stop, my friend. There is a species of honor among thieves the world does not generally give them credit for, and I have met with it in several very curious instances; and I had full belief in his promise—I may say almost more so than in the promise of many a fellow called honest and very respectable."

"Yes," I said, "that may be; but the promise is made and kept solely from motives of self-interest."

"Granted it is so," he replied; "still, if the promise is honestly kept, it is acting rightly, and is to be commended. However, I will go on. The time of trial came; the indictment was preferred before the Grand Jury and found as he said; and his trial was fixed for the following evening, for, at that time, the Court at the Old Bailey had evening sittings, which were held before the Recorder, who took the bench after the Judges had left. The evening came—I had not brought any witnesses; the prosecuting partner of the firm alone attended the Court. Charles Turnley was the first prisoner on the list called upon for trial. The Recorder, Newman Knollys, and Alderman Sir Peter Laurie were on the bench. Mr. Shelton, the clerk of the Court, read the indictment to the prisoner, and asked him, 'Are you guilty or not guilty?' when he answered in a firm voice, 'Guilty.' On hearing this, the Recorder told Mr. Shelton to urge him to withdraw his plea and let the case go to the jury, but Charley stood firm, and no other plea was given. The fox chase, as Charley had expressed it, was not had, and the Recorder and the Alderman counselled for a few minutes, seeming rather chagrined at not having their sport, when the Recorder bade Mr. Shelton call up the prisoner for judgment, which being done, and Charley making no dissent, the Recorder, in his usual sharp voice and petulant manner, gave him a lecture on his offence as disclosed in the depositions, and intimating that in a commercial city like London, the property of merchant and individual must be protected, and those who were found committing offence must be visited with severe punishment as an example to others—that he, Charles Turnley, had the character of being the most accomplished burglar known to the police, and, although he had never been tried before, yet he must not be allowed to repeat his misdeeds, at any rate for some time to come; and ended all his exhortations by sentencing him to the utmost period of banishment the law had provided. Charley made a bow to the Court, and quitted the dock where he had been standing. There was a slight commotion in the gallery of the Court, and some words 'O, dear me!' or such like, was the only interruption, which subsided almost instantly. About four or five months after this night, and other matters had occupied my attention, my clerk one morning told me an old woman, rather meanly dressed, wanted to see me. I bade him show her into my room, and she came in. She was a little, short, old woman, dressed what I may call meanly-respectable, with sharp, quick, restless, black eyes. I motioned to her to take a seat, and she came near to me and began by saying: 'I am old Mrs. Watts. You know me and my name. Charley Turnley has told you all about my visit, and I have come to talk to you about it.' She then told me she wanted me to assist in getting her daughter and her two children out to join her husband, for Charley's wife was one of her daughters. I told her I did not know where he was to be sent to or when he would go. 'Ah,' she said, 'I can tell you that, I have made the inquiry: he has gone to Van Dieman's Land—the ship sailed last month.' I repeated to her what I had told Charley—that the Government would not assist such a plan. She said she knew that; but she also said, 'I have plenty of money, and I shall pay their passage in a ship and send them out; and, as to my daughter, she was brought up at the City of London Lying-in Hospital in the City Road, and can get a good living as a midwife, and she is a good, well-behaved, honest girl.' I ended by engaging to look after a ship and learn a few particulars, and she was to bring me her daughter next week and let me see her. The next week came, and Mrs. Watts and her daughter. I spoke to the daughter, and found her a very quiet, respectably-behaved young woman, about thirty years of age, and good looking, and such a woman as would be respected in the new colony. I promised to see after a ship for her without delay, as she was anxious to leave soon. I thought it would be greatly to the benefit of Turnley in his new condition of life if she joined him, for she seemed to be a woman likely to withdraw him from evil courses. Being acquainted with two or three ship-brokers, who had emigration to the colonies occasionally in their hands, I went to one of them and told him the case and the wish of Turnley's wife to join him. He advised me to let it rest a time, for it would be more to the advantage of Charley that he should have been there quite a twelve-month before his wife should make her appearance, and he added, if the parties would agree to wait, he would enter it in his memorandum book and send me word when he considered it would be a good time for her to go, and he would, on receiving proper instructions (i. e. being fully paid,) see that she had comfortable accommodations on board of a good ship at a reasonable price. I saw Mrs. Watts and her daughter in about a week after, and, being reasonable people, they at once saw the policy of complying with the ship-broker's recommendation; and so it remained, and the year quietly wore out, and I had a note from the ship-broker, and in two months after the wife and her two children were on board a good ship bound for Hobart Town. Old Mrs. Watts had spared no expense in fitting them out with every comfort they could enjoy on board the vessel; and the broker kindly spoke a good word to the captain and chief mate, and they left England comfortable and happy. And now comes my pleasure: Old Mrs. Watts called on me this very morning with a letter which she had received from her daughter, who has been in Hobart Town now some months, and has found some good employ in her profession, and all the family are in good health. She speaks of being grateful for the way I have treated them all, and she thinks her husband much reformed and deriving much benefit from regular and constant employ, but, for the present, she has no expectation of any alteration in his sentence, and concluding her letter with prayer and thanksgiving for all the blessings she considers have been bestowed upon them under such adverse circumstances."

"Well, and you are pleased," I said.

"Yes," replied S. R., "I am pleased to think I have been able, out of such adverse circumstances, to have been, by Divine blessing, of some use to such people, and I hope that the good Lord's blessing will be continued to them, that Charley, seeing the error of his ways, may turn aside and become a new man, and end his life as a worthy and respected member of society, for he is a clever man and of engaging manner."

"But, my friend, I said to him, "you have not told me what were Charley's motives for committing this robbery."

"Ah, you dunce," said he, "I thought you could see his object. I will enlighten you: The merchants are known to be very rich, and have very extensive connections in England and all parts of the world, and you, as a commercial man, know that a merchant's books are of very great importance to him; and then, by possessing himself of all the books, Turnley expected to be able to open a negotiation with them for the return of the books on being paid a good round sum of money. Now, you see what it was and how it was defeated; and I suspect old Mrs. Watts betrayed Charley, for the purpose of obliging him to break off his bad acquaintances, and follow his legitimate business as a locksmith and be a creditable husband to her daughter."

"But," said I, "is there so much honor among these fellows, that they can be trusted?"

"Yes," said he; "I will give you a little instance that occurred with me last year: A West End solicitor called on me one morning, and said he wanted my help for a client who had lost a £500 bank note.

"'Why,' I said, 'you are in the profession, and surely can help yourself.'

"'No,' he said; 'we have to deal with people we do not think we can trust. They offer us the note back again, on paying £250.'

"'Why,' I said, 'how came it to be lost?'

"He replied: 'A friend and client of mine, a man of good property, a bachelor of middle age living in the Albany, was three years ago at a dinner party at a friend's house. He there met a very pleasant party, and several friends of his acquaintance, and some ladies; the wine circulated very freely, and my client, after a short time, found he had exceeded his usual allowance, and was getting very merry. So, after he had taken a cup of strong tea, he started to go home. One of his acquaintances, who was in better condition than himself, kindly proposed to accompany him home, and keep him steady and from being interfered with by the police, who might be about. So, the two started, and he got to his chamber and retired to bed. He did not awake until late the next morning—the natural result of his over-night's dose. He aroused, dressed, and had a cup of strong tea, and felt able to face the light once more. Wishing to look into his pocket-book for a letter, he put his hand into the breast pocket of his frock coat, but found no book. Being quite sure he had it with him when he went to his friend's house, he was immediately quite sobered by the knowledge it was gone, and with it a £500 bank note. He looked into two or three of his drawers to be quite certain, but no book presented itself to his sight. He felt sure it was lost, but how and where he knew not. He did not like to suppose it was taken by his friend, and, after a good cogitation, he resigned himself to the loss. Being rich, it did not ruin him, however vexed he might feel at its loss. About ten days before he came to me, his friend received a letter, telling him he might have his note by calling at a certain house and paying £250. This he showed to me; we talked the matter over; thought it was a very hard case, but what could he do? He dare not accuse his friend, who was rather of high standing in society; besides, where was his proof? He himself overcome by wine, who would give credit to his tale against the character of his friend? He must lose his note or pay the money; but, as we do not know so well how these people are to be managed, we want you to take it in hand.'

"I told him there was no fear with them, although they were all a set of rogues. Besides, I said, 'it is illegal and punishable.' However, after much parleying, he would insist upon my doing it for him. So, knowing his respectability and seeing he was nervous and excited over the affair, I told him he might refer the parties to me and appoint his own time and bring me the money in gold. 'But,' he said, 'shall I get an Inspector of bank notes from the bank to be with you.' I said: 'there is no need. You will have the identical note, not a forgery. Besides, whoever comes would not speak before a third person.' 'Well,' he said, 'I will leave it with you.' The next day he brought me a little bag of 250 sovereigns, and said he had made an appointment for the party to be with me at 8 o'clock the same evening, as his client was anxious to get rid of the recollection. So, in the evening, a knock at my door announced a visitor, and a person came in, of gentlemanly appearance, who I knew by name and sight as reputed a very respectable merchant in the city, having a large warehouse at the Thames side, and three or four large wagons and teams of splendid horses all engaged in carrying on a very thriving money-making business. He sat down very coolly and opened the business by saying he had brought the note—had I got the money.? I produced the bag. The gold he counted out. Finding it correct, he returned it to the bag and into his pocket. He then produced a sealed envelope, saying: 'The note is there, it has been kept safe in an iron chest ever since it was lost.' I opened the envelope and found the note just as it had been described to me fresh from the bank. He wished me good evening, and departed. So you see my friend, there is honor with these fellows, although of a very queer sort. I saw the solicitor the next morning and gave him the note, and he was much pleased and satisfied with its conclusion."

"Well," I said, "honorable as these fellows may be among themselves, yet they do not appear to be afraid to trust you."

"No," he said, "they are not afraid, and the reason is this: if I pass my word for a thing to be done, I do it to the extent of my ability: they know that, and they know this also, that if they unwittingly fall into my hands, I enforce the law against them without ceremony or any favor. Therefore, they know I deal justly by them and they do so by me when necessity impels."

It was now grown late beyond my dinner hour at home, so we adjourned to a chop-house in the vicinity of his chambers and had a beef-steak and a glass of wine, drinking health and prosperity to Charley and his family, in the hope of his entering upon a more creditable course of life for the future.

A GRAND trotting match between May Queen, owned by J. B. Gallar, and George M. Patchen, owned by W. Hendrickson, two-mile heats and repeat, for $2,000 a side, half forfeit, will come off at the Ocean House Course, on the 26th of December, if the day and track are favorable, or the first good day and track thereafter. The reputation and past performance of these horses, says the Sacramento Union, they will undoubtedly show the best trotting time ever made on the Pacific coast.

THREE Chinamen were killed on the line of the Central Pacific Railroad, above Colfax, on Saturday last. A large tree had been felled, which got away from the workmen and rolled down the hillside. The log rolled over two Chinamen, killing them, and struck a third with such force as to knock him over an embankment. The latter died from his injuries in a few hours.—Nevada Transcript.

SOME sort of mysterious disease is killing off the sheep in Calaveras county. What is very singular, is the fact that the older and least valuable sheep of the flock prosper finely, while all at once, without showing any premonitary symptoms of disease whatever, those young and in excellent condition drop down and die.

WATERMAN, one of the parties who robbed Wells, Fargo & Co's Express of $10,500 near Carson City on the 21st of last May, has been sentenced to thirteen years in the Penitentiary. Not a cent of the money has ever been recovered.

THE Cosmopolitan Copper Mining Company, says the Quincy Union, have sold out their claim at Genessee Valley, in this (Plumas) county, for the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, gold coin. The purchasers are N. P. Sheldon and Chas. W. Tozer, of Virginia City, Nevada.

THE Nevada Transcript says: On Sunday night, September 24th, it rained very hard at Eureka for about three hours. A mile and a half above that place it snowed until the ground was covered. The storm extended to the summit of the Sierras.

JAMES OWENS, a cattle buyer and drover, residing at Yuba City, was robbed of $1,284 in coin, by two scoundrels near Suisun City, a few days since. The occurrence took place about noon.

THE colored people of California are to have a Convention at Sacramento, to meet on Wednesday, October 25th, to consider and deliberate on subjects connected with their interests.

BELLINI.

HE was tall and slim; his face was neither pale nor florid; his hair was of a light, almost golden hue, and hung in ringlets. His forehead was very high, his nose straight, his eyes light blue, his mouth well proportioned, his chin round. His features seemed as vague and as void of character as milk. In fact his face was a milk face, and was frequently marked by a lacadaisical expression of pain, which made up for the want of character. But it was pain without depth, void of poesy or passion. It glistened in his eyes and quivered on his lips. The young maestro seemed bent on making a show of his sadness. Fantastic melancholy betrayed itself in the arrangement of his hair, languor in the cut of his clothes, and ideality in his light cane. Thus he always reminded me of the old pastorals in which shepherds, in light-colored jackets and short pants, tripped about, carrying staffs bedecked with ribbons. Then his gait was so mournful, so feminine, and ethereal. His whole appearance suggested a sigh en escarpins. There always seemed something comically unenjoyable about him, caused, perhaps, by the style in which he spoke French. He spoke it terribly; he butchered it unmercifully. The way in which he often tortured the poor French words, as though an executioner were breaking them on the wheel, and the way in which he uttered his monstrous coq a l'ane, were enough to make one look around with fright to see whether the world was coming to an end with a mighty crash.

Deathly silence reigned on such occasions; a mortal terror was depicted on every countenance, whether rouged or powdered; the women seemed undecided whether they had better rush out of the room or faint where they were; the men looked down toward their pantaloons to make sure that they really had such garments on; and, worst of all, the circumstances would fill every one with an almost uncontrollable desire to laugh outright. Bellini's presence always filled one with fear, which, through some strange fascination, seemed at once to attract and repel. Sometimes his involuntary puns were mirth-provoking, and reminded one, by their droll absurdity, of the castle of his countryman, Prince Pallagoni, which Goethe, in his Italienische Reise, called a museum of bizarre distortions and ill-matched monsters. As Bellini always imagined that he had been making some serious and harmless observation, his face, on such occasions, was in strange contrast to his remarks, and then the unpleasant expression of which I spoke became more marked. His face and figure had an air of physical freshness, blooming health and rosiness, that was calculated to make an unfavorable impression upon one with my morbid tastes. It was not until later, when I had found him of a kind and noble disposition, that I grew to like him. I fully believe that his soul remained pure to the last, and that the childlike kindness of temperament which men of genius usually possess, but never parade, was truly his.—Ex.

THE CATTLE PLAGUE.—It will be of some importance to our drovers and farmers to know that the cattle disease, now raging in England, is said to have originated from infected foreign cattle. The disease is described as a catarrhal affection, producing in the blood an impurity which has a tendency to work itself outward in every direction, and it is asserted that any exhalation, even through the pores of the skin of an infected animal, is highly infectious. The London Times says: "Sound cattle coming there have caught the disease and spread it to such an extent that nearly 2,000 have suffered within a month. There is no known remedy or antidote; but unless something be done, it is possible the disease may spread over the whole country, and England may suffer an actual dearth of animal food, and the usual consequences of a lower diet on a people accustomed to a better. A deficiency of animal food will tell upon the price of bread, and all other kinds of food, and the poor will always be the greatest sufferers. But there is no need to wait to be sure of these consequences. It is enough that losses have been suffered; that no doubt quantities of diseased cattle have passed into the meat market, and that matters appear to be getting worse. What is, then, to be done? Official inspection is urged, complete insulation, and destruction where necessary, the loss of the owner being defrayed out of a general subscription. That was found to answer when the small-pox had made its appearance in Wiltshire two years ago. When the owners of infected flocks knew they could have compensation they made no secret of the matter, but invited inspection; and so that plague was stayed. Professor Gamgee assumes the existence of the disease on the Continent and its transmission here by the steamers. He assumes also that Continental governments are doing all they can to stop the disease from spreading at home. The remedial or preventative measures he discusses are those to be taken on the appearance of the disease in this country, whether in foreign or British cattle.

"The Professor's own proposal is a very serious one. The plague, he says is highly infectious, and even sound English cattle take the disease by brief contact with the foreigners in the market. The holds and decks of ships, therefore, must be charged with infection, as well as the railway trucks of the preliminary journey. Nay, it has even been said that the very roads, the hedges, the posts and rails, the gates, receive and communicate the morbid matter from the passing cattle. Is it altogether impossible to interpose some sort of scrutiny at the port of embarkation, so as to allow the disease a day or two to show itself? At all events, a veterinary inspector might be stationed at the quay, to see that no evidently diseased animal came on board."

The Morning Advertiser adds the following: "Now, there is no doubt that this disease has lately gathered head to an alarming extent, and that though it is said that the infection does not extend to human beings, it may lead to disease by an undue reduction of the food of the country. During the short period of a month, no less than 2,000 head of cattle are said to have suffered from the disease, which is, as a rule, incurable. When we consider that up to the present time no decided measures have been taken to resist the disease, we have the best grounds for alarm about the future.

A TRUE ACCOUNT OF AN APPARITION.

ON a wintry afternoon, in the month of February—carnival time—in Paris, I sat in my room, in the Rue Rambouillet, Quartier Latin, alone. The course of lectures in the Collège de France which I had been following, were suspended for the holidays. All serious things were put aside for that round of gaiety which was to fortify the Parisians against the privations of Lent. I, however, had determined to eschew all pleasures for awhile. Upon a serious review of my career for some months previously, I had come to the conclusion, that nothing short of hard study and moderate fare, in my hermitage, far removed from the gaiety of Paris, in the time of carnival, could atone for the past, and bring me upon good terms with myself. So, upon this afternoon, being the third day of my voluntary confinement, I had returned from the restaurant, and putting on my dressing gown and Greek cap, sat down with my book open before me.

There is a solemn sensation in a wintry afternoon, when the dusk comes on early, and we sit quietly alone, which belongs to no other season. Mine was a retired street, and my room being au sixieme, I was as much removed from the bustle of Parisian life as if I had been in Palmyra or Pompeii. Yet, sometimes, in the pauses of my reading, out of the very solitude and stillness, perhaps from an involuntary listening for some sound, there grew up a low noise in the air, which seemed always about to become more distinct; but dying away, returned again, in a manner that perplexed me. I speculated upon the cause of it. I fancied it was the whole noise of the city blended and softened down into one deep murmur. I imagined the variety of sounds of which it was composed. I annalysed it into the rumbling of vehicles, of voices of people, bells, shutting of doors, working of machines, falling of waters, music, laughter, wailings: and, letting my fancy take such shapes as it would, I saw, in my reverie, many scenes from which such sounds might arise. I found pleasure in such fancies, and gave myself up to them easily. When I aroused, the sound was hushed; but on waiting awhile and listening attentively, the same murmur seemed to fill the air. A suspicion that it was a deception of a sense overstrained by listening, set me meditating; for with this, as with most trifling things which baffle our inquiries into their causes, I was reluctant, having begun my speculations, to give them up without coming to some satisfactory conclusion.

I arose from my seat and looked out of the window. In the square yard below, the bare branches of the trees were not stirred by a breath of wind. The sky was cloudy, as if snow were about to fall: in the dusk, here and there, I saw lights at the windows. My neighbor, the daguerreotyper, who lived with his wife—a Norman woman—and four children, in a little erection upon the next roof, I could see smoking and reading by the fire. For three weeks, nobody had been on his roof to pose for a portrait; the sun having altogether withdrawn his smiles from the people of Paris during that time, and the secret of taking photographic portraits par tous les temps, not having been then discovered. He was a cheerful man, and his wife was a cheerful woman, yet he was poorer even than I was. He had a little glass-case beside a shop-door in the Rue Dauphine, with an announcement that he would make portraits, in a style there exhibited, at two francs fifty centimes; or, in family groups of not less than four, at one franc per physiognomy; and directing the public to "M. Brison, Rue Rambouillet, No. 2, top of the house." His room was never crowded at the best of times, and in dull weather his occupation was gone. At such times, with the wind that way, I have missed the savory smell of soup or bouilli at the accustomed hour of eleven in the morning. A Frenchwoman can make soup of anything; and the poverty must be sad indeed, when she can no longer provide this.

I took an interest in this family. I climbed up their dark staircase one day, six flight of stairs and a ladder, and as soon as I could recover my breath, demanded a portrait at two francs fifty centimes. They had attracted my attention from my window, and I was prompted more by curiosity than aught else to pay them a visit. The sun was feeble that day; and after "posing" eight times, and waiting while his wife gave an extra polish to the plate; and, finally, for the ninth time, putting on that look of profound sagacity, mingled with good humor, which all people try to get into their portraits, I was obliged to give it up. The time was not wholly lost; I had seen something of Monsieur Brison's home in the time that I had waited, and this was my chief object in going to him. Indeed, a portrait would have been of no manner of use to me, and I half suspected myself of a secret design in choosing such a dull day. So I rose to go away; and, after remarking upon the trouble to which I had put him, held out two francs in my hand. Poverty was written on his walls, and in his patched blue blouse; but he resolutely refused my offer, with a speech that would have brought down an avalanche of applause on the Gymnase, if he had pronounced it there in a tone a trifle more tragic than that in which he then spoke, and had paused to take the sense of the house on the propriety of his sentiment. That man's cheerfulness puzzled me. I strove to account for it upon philosophical principles, and thought all daguerreotypers in Paris must be cheerful, because they live on the roofs, and are most subject to "skyey influences." So I fell meditating deeply upon this subject.

When I looked out again, it was getting darker, and there was a slight fog, which made some lights, a long way off, across the housetops, glimmer in a halo. Looking round my room, it had to me a drearier air than usual, with its scanty furniture, and floor of polished tiles. My fire was nearly out—if an Englishman could give the name of fire to a few chips of charcoal, shut up closely in a porcelain cylinder, standing out in the room, and communicating with the chimney by a rusty tin-pipe. I opened its little door; and, kneeling down, was just in time to blow out the last remains of vitality. The weather was cold, but I did not care to light it again. It was becoming too dark to read, and I determined not to light my lamp. I sat down again, and wrapped my dressing-gown about me with a shiver. The great pipe, which my friend Louis Rynal gave me, when he came back from Africa, hung upon the wall. I sat looking at its enormous bowl—carved into the face of an Arab, with a fierce grin and small black eyes—until I could scarcely see it; though, now and then, I knew not why, it suddenly became more distinct. When I was tired, my eye wandered, and fixed itself upon the carving of the Crucifixion on the mantlepiece. This was of white wood, and consequently remained distinct, for a longer time, in the deepening twilight of the room. I was not sorry when I could see it no longer. I would have preferred that that carving had not been in the room alone with me that afternoon.

It was growing darker still; and, as the few objects near me faded away, and my attention was no longer occupied, I heard again the murmuring in the air, which had troubled me at first; but this time it was still more perplexing. Now and then, as I listened, it seemed about to become deeper; and then, with the utmost effort, I could not hear it all. It was this monotony (while it lasted) that teased me. If any one of the multitudinous noises, of which I supposed it to be composed, would have predominated for a moment, I should have been content. If some clanging peal of the bells would have broken out near me, or come from a distance upon a sudden shifting of the wind, I would have lighted my lamp and gone on with the perusal of my book. But it was still the same confusion of noises—so perfectly blended, that although sometimes it became louder, no distinct sound could be caught: as if, at a certain moment, all its components increased, in exact proportion, in order to preserve a perfect monotony.

It is strange that this trifling fancy was gradually sapping the foundations of my resolution—holding me with so singular a fascination, that I was compelled to abandon my studies for that day. I began to suspect that the sudden change, from a life of pleasure to one of solitary study, had wrought some injury to my mind. I experienced a degree of timidity and irresolution that I had never known before. I had other strange fancies. Once, while walking to and fro, in my room, I had seen my features, darkly, in the glass, and instinctively shrunk from looking there again. Afterwards, on reflecting, I could not divest myself of the notion that they were not my features that I had seen there, but a face wholly different. I sat down again, and thought of going out and wandering in the streets. I knew that, during the cold weather, great wood fires were lighted at midnight, in certain open places in the city, that the homeless might not perish of the cold; and I thought of spending the night by one of these, and not returning to my room until daylight.

From this mood I was suddenly startled by a noise, as of something falling on the floor of the adjoining room. I was startled, because I had always known that room to be uninhabited; and as it communicated by a door with my room, I knew that I should have heard of any change in that respect. It was one of those rooms, often met with in the great houses of Paris (where each floor is divided into many apartments, or, as we should say in England, sets of chambers,) into which it had been found impossible to admit sufficient daylight for a sitting-room. In such a case, the usual course would have been to let it with my room as a sleeping chamber; but I had declined it, and it had remained unoccupied during the several years of my residence there.

I listened attentively for a repetition of the noise; and now all my wild fancies were forgotten in this new feeling of curiosity. I had never been in that room, for the door had always been kept locked, and the key was in the possession of the porter below; but I recollected, now, having frequently heard noise in the night, which I had attributed to the wind out of doors, but which, I seemed now to remember, had come from the garret. I had once heard from the Concierge (though I had taken it for an idle story) that Danton—memorable among the tyrants of the Revolution—had lived in a room in that house. And now I thought I remembered that it was in a house in that quarter where he had spent the night (it was the night of the terrible butcheries at the prisons of La Force and the Conciergerie) in conversation with Camille Desmoulins, until, seeing the first glimmering of the dawn across the house-tops, he told Camille that a terrible blow had been struck at Royalism, even while they had been sitting there. It seemed to me remarkable that I had not thought of this before. I remembered now distinctly the words "across the house tops," in the account that I had read; and a superstitious conviction forced itself upon me, that it was in that very room that Danton (affecting, as was common with the revolutionary leaders, an appearance of poverty) had dwelt.

My fancy had wandered away among the scenes of that terrible Revolution, when I was roused again by a second noise. But this time it was the sound of a light footstep walking in the room. I listened, and waited, with my eye fixed upon the door, and now for the first time I remarked a faint light shining through the keyhole. The footstep ceased for a moment; and then I saw by the long light in the crevice that the door, which I had always supposed to be locked, was ajar. I had not heard any movement of the handle of the lock, but I felt convinced that it had only just been opened; for it was impossible, otherwise, that I should not have observed it. The door trembled for a moment, as if an undecided hand were upon the lock, and then, opening wide, I saw, to my surprise, the figure of a man standing in the doorway.

He held in one hand a thin candle, with a shade, which threw that part of the room in which I sat into darkness; but I could see him distinctly, as he stood there a moment, apparently hesitating whether to go on or turn back. His face was deadly pale, and his eyes, in the light that struck upward, through the aperture in the shade, were fixed and sunken. His dress was that which was worn by the old revolutionary leaders; but he bore no resemblance to the portraits of Danton. I recognized him at a glance. The prominent forehead, the short pointed nose, the scornful curl of the upper lip, the powdered hair, the frilled shirt, the broad sash, and even the nosegay in his hand—all, except the general faded look of his attire, identified him at once with the ideal indelibly fixed in my mind, by portrait and tradition, of the great fanatical Jacobin, Maximilian Robespierre. The door closed sharply behind him, as if by the current of air, for his light was extinguished at the same moment. I heard his footstep across my room; the door closed behind him as he went out upon the landing. I listened, but could hear no footstep descending the stairs. I walked to the door, and looked down into the darkness of the great staircase, and listened, but the house was quite still.

Was I to believe my senses? Here I sat, exactly as I had sat ten minutes before. My stove was cold: my room was dark: I was alone: my book was open before me. I saw the light still in the daguerreotyper's window, on the roof, and at other places, far off. I walked over and tried the door of the room, but it was fast locked again. Everything was in its usual state. In a few minutes from the time when I first fancied that I heard the noise, the door had been unfastened, this strange apparition had passed through my room, the door was re-fastened, and no trace of what had happened remained. I was not dreaming? No. But how often, in sleep, had I questioned myself the reality of my dream, and invariably ended by convincing myself that I was awake—sometimes even remembering that I had so deceived myself before; but always, at last, conquering my own objection, and coming to the conclusion that this time, at least, I stood amid the real life of the daylight world. But I rubbed my eyelids, rose again, and walked to and fro, and convinced myself that I was really awake.

What could I think, but that my reason was becoming weakened? The life I had led for some time had been wild and reckless. I had become so accustomed to excitement, that it was almost necessary to my existence; so that when I applied myself to a steadier life, I experienced something of the depression of the drunkard in the first days of his reformation. The mood in which this vision had found me was favorable to such hallucinations. My mind had been unsettled. My fancies would not let me apply myself to my task. Whimsical, and filled with vague apprehensions, I knew that my mental state exactly coincided with the descriptions of those who have been visited by similar apparitions.

Smoking would, I thought, soothe me. I lighted some wood in my stove with a fusee, and taking down my pipe from the wall, filled it, and sat there smoking hour after hour. The great transparent bowl glowed in the darkness at every puff, so deeply, that I could watch the wreaths of smoke by the light it gave. I strove to fix my mind upon cheerful images—thinking of an English home, where the fatted calf was ever ready to be killed when I should return; but chiefly of thee, Eugenie (of whom I knew myself unworthy,) lily-handed, lovelier than the loveliest of all flowers!

I dropped asleep, and awoke several times, always dreaming and waking up with the feeling, that my strange vision was a portion of my dream; but the burning embers in my stove recalled to me what had passed, and each time, putting on more fuel, I dropped asleep again.

I do not know how long I had been sleeping the last time. When I awakened, my fire was out, and I was in the darkness. I knew, however, that it was past midnight, the hour at which my ghostly visitor would probably have returned, if he had had an intention of returning. My slumbers had tranquillized me. Looking out of the window, it did strike me that a certain dark object, close upon the next roof, had somewhat the look of a monk, staring out of his cowl at me through my window; but I speedily recognized it for a portion of the daguerreotyper's apparatus for fixing his customers in the required position. The fog had cleared away. There were no lights on any of the roofs, or at any windows far and wide. In the distance rose the dusky towers of St. Sulpice; and the stars were shining.

I had determined to go to bed, and think no more of my apparition until the morning. when turning to light my lamp, my eye caught again a faint light through the key-hole of the adjoining room. This was stranger still; for I knew that no one, in the habit of shutting doors so noisily, could have passed through my room while I had been sleeping. I lighted my lamp and listened. I heard again a light footstep, and presently a voice as of some one talking to himself, though loud enough, sometimes, for me to distinguish his words:

"A good wind getting up, such a wind as blows sharp dust into the face on a frosty night. Whew! I wouldn t turn a dog out. This is cheerless; but better than that hot, cursed place, full of shrieking, whining men and women. How the dusky Satan took that girl, and turned her till her brain was giddy, and she swooned! She had a pretty simple look; but she would not have been there if she were as innocent as her face They knew me. The priest taunted me with my free use of the guillotine. No matter. That peasant girl did not shrink from the monster, nor look upon my hands to see if they were blood-stained, when we joined the others in their devilry. Oh, it was a pretty sight for them to see a man with so many thousands of murders on his mind, looking so merry, and handling a nosegay so delicately—a nosegay that they knew so well in all my portraits! Well, well! enough of this for to-night. My feet can scarcely forget their habit. The fascination of that whirling multitude haunts me. I seem to have her still—my peasant girl. Steadily! Hold me firmly. Now then! Away!"

My mysterious neighbor seemed to be turning rapidly about the room. I heard the quick movement of his feet; and then a noise, as if a heavy body had come violently in contact with the wainscot. I walked on tiptoe to the door, and looked through the keyhole, but my sight only ranged over a small portion of the room, and I could see no one. There was a silence for some moments. Then I heard him talking—again:

"This kind of sport does not suit the middle of the night. I shall wake the whole floor. Let me see; how am I to amuse myself? No rest for me to-night. At daylight I must be gone."

I heard again a noise, as if he had flung himself heavily into a chair; and then there was a long silence again. I sat listening for any sound, and wondering at the strange words that I had heard; but, when the church clocks had twice chimed the quarters, the room was still quiet. Looking at the key-hole, the light was gone; but, on observing again, I thought I saw a faint glimmer, as if the candle were still burning, with the shade down. After awhile, however, I resolved to retire to bed; taking first the precaution to place a chair against the door, in such a manner that it would fall and awaken me, if he attempted again to enter my room; besides which, I placed my sword-stick within reach. I tried to persuade myself that this was some trick of my fellow students to alarm me, or that my neighbor was a harmless madman, personating the great republican: although I felt uneasy in remembering that he was in possession of the key of the door opening into my room. Resolved, however, at any rate, to shake off my alarm, I strove to rally myself upon the subject. "If M. Robespierre," said I aloud, "takes a fancy to walk through my room again, he will be kind enough to shut the doors with less noise, if I am sleeping."

Instantly, I heard the footstep again; the handle of the lock turned; the chair, with some articles that I had designedly placed upon it, fell with a loud clatter; the door opened wide; and the same figure that I had seen before stood in the doorway.

"Keep off!" I exclaimed, seizing my sword-stick, and planting myself, like Roderick Dhu, with my back to the wall.

"I beg your pardon," said my disturber, with a low bow.

"Who are you? What do you do here?" I demanded, waxing bolder.

"M. Hector Favart—at your service; student of the Ecole de Médécine; having the honor to do duty in the Third Legion of the Garde Nationale—an honor that will take me out of doors at daylight this frosty morning."

"What!" said I, letting my sword-stick fall from my hand—"the cousin of my Eugenie?"

"Eugénie de la Tour?"

"Eugenie de la Tour."

"The same!"

"But how do you find yourself in that room?" I asked, still somewhat incredulous.

"I took this little place to-day," said he, "as a quiet room to read in, and to sleep in at night. By the way. I have to apologize for coming through your apartment in your absence, for the porter had not yet given me the key of the other door upon the landing."

"I saw you," said I; "but how did you contrive to lock your door agin, without my hearing it?"

"Do you not know that when this door is once shut, it cannot be opened again, from your side, without a key?"

"I understand," said I, advancing, with the light, to shake hands with him. But his unaccountable resemblance, in dress and features, to Robespierre himself (which I had almost forgotten,) his pale face, and sunken eyes, struck me again so forcibly, as the light shown upon him, that I started back. "I hope you will not think me unpolite," said I, "if I observe, before coming closer, that I am struck very forcibly with the remarkable resemblance that you bear to a certain historical personage."

"Ha! ha!" he laughed, in a tone that sounded strangely hollow. "To whom, now? Tell me. To Louis Seize, or the Cardinal Richelieu; Jean Jacques Rousseau, or the Emperor Napoleon: the lean Frederick of Prussia, or the portly Mirabeau?"

"To none of those," said I.

"To a man of the Revolution—eh? A Girondin, or a Cordelier; a Feuillant, or a Jacobin?"

"To a Jacobin!" said I, "without any offence."

"No doubt," he replied; "but to which of them?" Not to Marat, the blackguard, I hope? nor to little Camille Desmoulins? nor the jolly Danton? Something more of the Robespierre look about me—isn't there?" Holding the nosegay in one hand, he placed himself exactly in the attitude of Robespierre in the portraits.

"I certainly," said I, "did have such an impression when I first I saw you; and now, that you stand in that position, I cannot help being struck with the similarity between you."

He laughed again, in the husky tone of a man afflicted with a severe cold. "The day I was born, my nurse—who never before, in her life, admitted a child to have the slightest resemblance with anybody but his own father—could not help exclaiming, 'Ah, le petit Robespierre!' for she had seen the great man when a girl. Everybody said I resembled him exactly; everybody was right. Faith! to night, at the fancy ball at the Chaumiere, I make my appearance in this style, with nosegay complete, and everybody recognises me in a moment."

"Ha! ha!" I exclaimed, laughing in my turn. "The mystery is unravelled! Pray, step in; I will light my fire in a moment. I think I have materials for a bowl of punch."

"With all my heart," said he. "I dare not go to bed, lest I should oversleep myself, and forget my engagement."

"To your fair cousin, Eugénie!" said I, when the bowl stood smoking on the table, while we struck our glasses together, in ratification of the toast.

"To one not less fair!" said he, filling again, "whose name I need not tell."

Mendelssohn's Children.—"Agindos," writing to the Transcript from Heidelberg, says: "Dr. Carl Mendelssohn Bartholdy is a private docent here, and is delivering lectures in Greek history. Some of my readers will remember his name as one of the editors of his father's (the composer) letters. No one of Mendelssohn's children inherits their father's musical abilities, but they are all of them, Carl, perhaps, excepted, remarkable for personal beauty. The Heidelberg doctor is the oldest of the four, the second son is now studying in Berlin, the oldest daughter is married and lives at London, the youngest daughter lives with her grandmother at Frankfort. Mendelssohn's wife died two years ago. The son who is a teacher in the Heidelberg University is a young man of great learning, of a highly excitable temperament, and of exceedingly agreeable manners. One can hardly tell what his future may be, for the life of a private docent is one of the most discouraging character. I attended one of Mendelssohn's lectures a few days ago, and found myself one of an audience of two. The substance was the modern Greek revolution. The lecture was written out in full, and was delivered with great spirit. The young doctor is so nervous that it becomes painful to watch his intensity, his clutching at his manuscript and hair and cravat, but his matter is excellent. Through his published works, at least, the world will probably hear of him from time to time.

Joseph Angus' Handbook of English Literature, lately published in London, is very highly commended. It condenses within a brief compass, says the New York Review, all that the general reader wishes to know for guidance in his studies of the literature of our language.

The difference between the two sexes may be often stated thus: A man gives a half-dollar for an article he wants, but which could be bought for a quarter; a woman buys a half-dollar article for a quarter, though she does not want it at all.

Joseph Mazzini's Life and Writings is announced among the recent books published in London.

MANNERS.

As the first thing man requires of man, is reality, so, that appears in all the forms of society. We pointedly, and by name, introduce the parties to each other. Know you before all heaven and earth, that this is Andrew, and this is Gregory; they look each other in the eye; they grasp each other by the hand, to identify and signalize each other. It is a great satisfaction. A gentleman never dodges: his eyes look straight forward, and he assures the other party, first of all, that he has been met. For what is it that we seek, in so many visits and hospitalities? Is it your draperies, pictures, and decorations? Or, do we not insatiably ask, Was a man in the house? I may easily go into a great household where there is much substance, excellent provision for comfort, luxury, and taste, and yet not encounter there any Amphitryon, who shall subordinate these appendages. I may go into a cottage, and find a farmer who feels that he is the man I have come to see, and fronts me accordingly. It was therefore a very natural point of old feudal etiquette, that a gentleman who received a visit, though it were of his sovereign, should not leave his roof, but should wait his arrival at the door of his house. No house, though it were the Tuileries, or the Escurial, is good for anything without a master. And yet we are not often gratified by this hospitality. Every body we know surrounds himself with a fine house, fine books, conservatory, gardens, equipage, and all manner of toys, as screens to interpose between himself and his guest. Does it not seem as if man was of a very sly, elusive nature, and dreaded nothing so much as a full rencontre front to front with his fellow? It were unmerciful, I know, quite to abolish the use of these screens, which are of eminent convenience, whether the guest is too great or too little We call together many friends who keep each other in play, or, by luxuries and ornaments we amuse the young people, and guard our retirement. Or if, perchance, a searching realist comes to our gate, before whose eye we have no care to stand, then again we run to our curtain, and hide ourselves as Adam at the voice of the Lord God in the garden. Cardinal Caprara, the Pope's legate at Paris, defended himself from the glances of Napoleon by an immense pair of green spectacles. Napoleon remarked them, and speedily managed to rally them off: and yet Napoleon, in his turn, was not great enough, with eight hundred thousand troops at his back, to face a pair of freeborn eyes, but fenced himself with etiquette, and within triple barriers of reserve: and, as, all the world knows from Madame de Stael, was wont, when he found himself observed, to discharge his face of all expression. But emperors and rich men are by no means the most skilful masters of good manners. No rent-roll nor army-list, can dignify skulking and dissimulation: and the first point of courtesy must always be truth, as really all the forms of good breeding point that way.

I have just been reading, in Mr. Hazlitt's translation, Montaigne's account of his journey into Italy, and am struck with nothing more agreeably than the self-respecting fashions of the time. His arrival in each place, the arrival of a gentleman of France, is an event of some consequence. Wherever he goes, he pays a visit to whatever prince or gentleman of note resides upon his road, as a duty to himself and to civilization. When he leaves any house in which he has lodged for a few weeks, he causes his arms to be painted and hung up as a perpetual sign to the house, as was the custom of gentlemen.

The complement of this graceful self-respect, and that of all the points of good breeding I most require and insist upon, is deference. I like that every chair should be a throne, and hold a king. I prefer a tendency to stateliness, to an excess of fellowship. Let the incommunicable objects of nature and the metaphysical isolation of man teach us independence. Let us not be too much acquainted. I would have a man enter his house through a hall filled with heroic and sacred sculptures, that he might not want the hint of tranquility and self-poise. We should meet each morning, as from foreign countries, and spending the day together, should depart at night, as into foreign countries. In all things I would have the island of a man inviolate. Let us sit apart as the gods, talking from peak to peak all round Olympus. No degree of affection need invade this religion. This is a myrrh and rosemary to keep the other sweet. Lovers should guard this strangeness. If they forgive too much, all slides into confusion and meanness. It is easy to push this deference to a Chinese etiquette; but coolness and absence of heat and haste indicate fine qualities. A gentleman makes no noise: a lady is serene. Proportionate is our disgust at those invaders who fill a studious house with blast and running, to secure some paltry convenience. No less I dislike a low sympathy of each with his neighbor's needs. Must we have a good understanding with one another's palates? as foolish people who have lived long together, know when each wants salt or sugar. I pray my companion, if he wishes for bread, to ask for bread, and if he wishes for sassafras or arsenic, to ask me for them, and not to hold out his plate, as if I knew already. Every natural function can be dignified by deliberation and privacy. Let us leave hurry to slaves. The compliments and ceremonies of our breeding should recall, however remotely, the grandeur of our destiny.—Emerson's Ess. 1st.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1865.

Successful Illiterature.—Artemus Ward, the American Showman, expects soon to give an exhibition in London. The real show on which Artemus' reputation is based — his "genuine wax figgers"—are plastic and grotesque distortions of the English language, which he does not exhibit in his lectures. We do not know whether, therefore, the English public will be disappointed, as others have been, to find that the showman talks usually in the correct vernacular, or that they will give him credit for that extravagance which they are fond of quoting as American humor, and thus grant him a position which the most critical of his countrymen shrink from according. There is something in the general good nature of the notices which Artemus has received from the American press—notices that never rise to the dignity of criticism—which suggests a doubt of the legitimacy of his performances. The popularity of Petroleum V. Nasby, Josh Billings, Olonzo Ward, and the host of imitators, whose fame is based chiefly upon the style of their orthography, does not tend to enhance the reputation of the showman. Let us hope that, for the sake of American literature, he will put his best foot foremost when on English ground, and prove that he has some better claim to the admiration of the English public than a studied violation of the Queen's English.

The Late Rope-Walking.—It is said that when Mr. James Cooke had completed his late perilous feat of rope-walking at the Cliff House, "he was surrounded by a vast throng who eagerly importuned him to delay his departure, and give another exhibition of his wonderful skill and daring." It would be wrong, perhaps, to imply to these enthusiasts any disappointment at the favorable termination of the affair, and perhaps the statement delivered with some satisfaction by a cotemporary—that Mr. Cooke had never stepped upon a rope until within the last two weeks, and that he could not swim at all—may not have exercised any influence upon them in making the request. But, remembering the story of the eccentric spectator who followed Van Amburg about with a prophetic speculation, that the lion would some day bite off the head of the lion-tamer, there is still room for doubt as to the integrity and humanity of these sight-seers. Had an accident happened to Mr. Cooke, even those who most deplored such an event would have had a certain satisfaction in being able to say hereafter that they had witnessed it. The moral aspect of these exhibitions is often shown in the character and conduct of the crowd who assemble on such occasions, and no one who was a witness of last Sunday's and Wednesday's gathering could feel quite convinced of its elevating quality.

The Front Street, Mission, and Ocean Railroad Company are laying down their track through Sutter street with commendable expedition. This section of the road is to be completed through Sansome to Polk, and through Polk to Broadway, traversing the whole valley that lies back of the high range of hills which divide it from the business portions of the city. This enterprise must greatly enhance the value of property in that section of the city, and be a source of incalculable convenience to its residents. The grading of Polk street has been completed, and it is only necessary to lay down the track to have the line in running order, which is contracted to be done by the first of January. Mr. S. R. Brooks is the Chief Engineer, and Messrs. Casebolt & Co. are the contractors, names that are a sufficient guarantee that the work will be energetically pushed on to its completion. The officers of the company are H. H. Haight, President; H. P. Coon, Vice President; John Barton, Treasurer; David Wilder, Secretary; S. S. Tilton, G. W. Dam, H. P. Herrick and J. T. Godfrey, Directors.

Madame Anna Bishop was the recipient of a serenade by the Philharmonic Society on Tuesday night. They numbered some thirty instruments, on this occasion, and as the society is composed of our best musical performers, neither the compliment nor the serenade was an ordinary one. Madame Bishop's first concert will take place some time during the coming week.

Recognition.—The New York Review, in its literary notices, pays the following tribute to the merit of our young contributor:

Charles Warren Stoddard is the name of a young poet in San Francisco who displays uncommon talents, and will, we think, achieve a worthy reputation.

AMONG THE BOOKS.

On visiting a certain public library in this city, I sometimes linger beyond the usual period required for the transaction of my business. This is partly the result of a hesitation to choose from so many volumes of apparently equal interest, and partly from an indistinct idea that the mere propinquity of so much learning and instruction is mysteriously beneficial to the mind. Whether I have been able to make any better choice by reason of this extra time taken for selection, or whether the perusal of title-pages has stimulated me to renewed intellectual vigor, I shall not now discuss. These intervals of recreation have been favorable to certain other observations, some of which I am tempted to transcribe.

Pencilling and marginal notation—a prevailing epidemic in all circulating libraries—is not unknown here. Although it rages more violently among a feeble class of romances, and breaks out in an unwholesome eruptions all over the leaves of most sentimental works, it is generally confined to short, squab, thick novels, in which the hero is usually a clergyman or doctor, much older than the heroine who undergoes what is termed a "lesson of the heart," or a "trial of the affection," and who suffers the most sensitive and unheard of agonies. These works are usually in demand among young ladies with pale blue eyes and blonde curls—are bespoken some weeks ahead—and generally go the rounds of a family of several sisters, before they return to the library. When they are gathered in, they always bear feeble evidences of the mild delight experienced in their perusal, by light pencil marks under sentences like the following: "Mary did not answer, but pressed her hand convulsively to her heart," or "the Rev. Mr. Lecturn turned away with a look of grave tenderness," or "the spirit strove with the flesh," and faint brackets enclosing whole paragraphs of attenuated sentiment and moral bathos. Although this bland criticism prevails in this style of literature and among these people, it would seem as if very few readers, even of the better class, could refrain from improving this opportunity to go to posterity side by side with their favorite authors. Perhaps there is something seductive in the attitude of the commentator, or the functions of the critic are more universal than we imagine. Lately, in looking over a copy of Montaigne, I found that some ingenious rebel sympathizer had complacently underscored, with comments, certain passages, which, to him, seemed to justify his course. But the sympathizer was followed, on the same page and in the opposite margin, by a fierce loyal pencil, unsparing in epithet, and bitterly sarcastic on the first commentator. Nevertheless, I could not help smiling to think how the old egotistical Michael would have been astonished to have found himself, after three centuries of rest, occupying his old position in a civil war, as wordy at least as any that ever disturbed his conservatism in the flesh. For my own part, whenever I come upon anything of this kind that does not please me, I do not seek to answer or refute, but providing myself with a piece of India-rubber I calmly rub out the offensive commentary, and thus consign the critic to oblivion. If all ridiculous and unnecessary criticism could be as easily treated, how quickly might the world be freed from feeble and enfeebling controversies.

The habits and manners of certain visitors have fallen more or less under my observation. While I look with distrust on that man, who, having a home, prefers deliberately to sit down to the perusal of novel or romance in a public library, I am by no means of the opinion that he should be tortured, by unnecessary violence and interruption, to forego his right. But I do not think that the opinion which some visitors entertain—that the appropriate mien for the occasion is a deportment, in which the solemnity of the church-goer and the pitying concern of the hospital-visitor are blended—can be said to be properly based. It will be noticed that excessively careful people, in their anxiety to preserve silence, invariably drop a large quarto on the floor, and precipitate a whole shelf in ruins in their frantic efforts to save it. These people usually involve themselves in difficulties with the ladder, ascending that instrument at perilous angles, which bring them presently to grief and lamentation. There is the man who repeats the titles of books audibly, as he walks beside the shelves; the three young ladies who giggle quite as audibly, and who evidently have intentions ulterior to the mere choice of reading matter; the two or three young men, observant of the preceding party, yet apparently engaged in studious employment; the man who is hunting authorities, and who is sternly scornful of everybody else and their business; the confidential young lady who requests the librarian to recommend some nice book: the pale theologian, personally aggrieved that Bishop Simpkins' admirable pamphlet on Transubstantiation is not found in the catalogue, and the stern moralist who objects that several infidel works are to be found therein; the envious man, who longs for the book another has just taken out, and the generous man, who drops in to find himself charged for an interminable array of volumes, taken out by his friends, and himself estopped of his privileges; these are among the individual peculiarities of the library. Add to this the feeling, shared, I think, by all human kind, that the absence of any book we particularly want is a kind of personal affront to ourselves—that librarian and directors are in some way privy to the fact and responsible for it—and you have the general psychological aspect of this, and, indeed, all circulating libraries. In regard to the Reading Room, I regret to say that its moral tone is not quite up to that of the adjacent apartments. A thin vein of selfishness is apt to pervade it. The man who reads two sides of the Bulletin at once, and holds the supplement in his hand, may be fairly supposed to be capable of any enormity. But what shall be said of him, who, lying in wait on the arrival of the steamer, secures Punch and the Saturday Review, by sitting on them while he peruses the Illustrated News. On the other hand, I fancy it would require a man of some nerve to give himself completely up to the calm enjoyment of a magazine or newspaper, with the shadow of some hungry member impending over his page.

When the business of the day is over and the endless procession of changing faces is past; when the janitor turns the key, and the green baize door swings on its hinges for the last time, I can fancy that the sealed lips of the silent intelligences ranged around the wall, are suddenly opened, and that they babble pleasantly together in the style and fashion of their authors; that perhaps the quaint critics and essayists of the past century, from the dignity of a shelf to themselves, pronounce upon the new comers of the present day; that with ponderous sentences Dr. Johnson silences all pretensions, and occasionally even brow-beats the criticism of his fellow essayists, while Mr. Joseph Addison, in finely periwigged phrases, moralizes upon the vanity and illusion of authorship.

THEATRICAL TALK.

At Maguire's Opera House, Damon and Pythias was produced on Wednesday night, on which occasion Mr. J. B. Studley made his first appearance on the San Francisco stage, assuming the character of "Damon." Mr. Studley may possess talent: if he does, it is talent in the rough—he needs polish sadly. I fancy Mr. Pierpont Thayer would require a considerable increase of salary to induce him to again play "Lucullus" to Mr. Studley's "Damon." I believe, if a chance had been afforded him, he would have run off the stage when Mr. Studley sprang on him with the roar of an enraged bison, and nearly strangled him. Mr. Studley's reading is bad, and he is altogether a very indifferent actor of the melodramatic school. Mrs. Sophie Edwin played "Calanthe" charmingly, and, by her extremely correct reading, gave immense force to the beautiful lines which fell to her. Mr Charles Thorne played "Pythias" well, but he was too much like Mr Frank Mayo, and has adopted that actor's plan of expressing agony of mind—by three winks of both eyelids and a sharp contraction of the brows. Mr. Charles Thorne's original conceptions are, as I said before, far better than his imitations of an actor who certainly has not as much original talent as himself. "Pray you avoid it," Charles. Mr. Aldrich played "Dionysius" very well. Mr. Franks, as "Procles," was as grave as an undertaker, and no one who saw him, for the first time, on Wednesday evening, would have had the least suspicion of how funny he is in his own line of business. On Monday, Mr. Daniel Bandmann, who is spoken very highly of by the Eastern press as a Shakspearian actor, will make his first appearance at Maguire's Opera House, in the drama of Narcisse. Mr. Bandmann will afterwards appear in "Hamlet," as "Shylock," and other Shakspearian characters. Mlle. Vestvali emerges from retirement on Tuesday, appearing as "Lagadere" in The Fool and His Master, a new version of The Duke's Motto, which will be produced with splendid scenic effects. Mlle. Vestvali and Mr. Bandmann will play on alternate nights. This afternoon, a good bill is presented, consisting of the Captain of the Watch and Nobbs will Turn Him Out. This evening Mr. Studley appears in the tragedy of Pizarro, and the performance concludes with Nobbs will Turn Him Out.

On Monday, the long promised drama of Arrah na Pogue, the last, and most people think the best, production of Boucicault, was produced at the Metropolitan Theatre. The building was densely crowded, and has been every evening since. The piece is magnificently put upon the stage, and in that particular surpassed all previous efforts of the kind. Mr. Dowling is entitled to great credit for the perfect manner in which all the details were carried out, and the correctness with which the scenic effects were produced even on the first night. The scenery, which was painted by Mr. Torning, is extremely beautiful. The story of Arrah na Pogue has been published in so many papers in the United States, that, to repeat, would occupy space to no good purpose. Mrs. Sedley Brown, who made her first appearance before the San Francisco public on this occasion, did not fully sustain the encomiums passed upon her by the Eastern press. In the pathetic portions of the play she appears incapable of investing her grief with an air of reality. I fancy the part of "Arrah Meelish" is a little beyond her calibre, and that her forte lies rather in light comedy; in fact, it is in soubrette characters that she has attained the favorable reputation with which she comes here. Mrs. Sedley Brown has a sweet, but not powerful voice, a pleasing stage presence, and is altogether a most acceptable addition to the Metropolitan company. The "Shaun the Post" of Mr. Charles Wheatleigh is perhaps the very best of his impersonations, the artistic skill with which he brings out the fine touches of humor and the shades of pathos with which the part abounds, called forth enthusiastic applause from the audience; all of Boucicault's "points" told. Mr. H. D. Thompson, of whom I have repeatedly had occasion to speak highly as an actor, achieved his crowning triumph in the character of "Michael Feeny," the villainous process-server and Government spy. Mr. Thompson has every reason to feel proud of gaining the hearty hatred of the audience for the character which he represents; his by-play is excellent; his chuckles express the most intense satisfaction, and he never plays to the audience. An equally finely rendered character was the "Colonel Bagenal O'Grady" of Mr. George Pauncefort, who presented one of the best impersonations of the Irish gentleman I have ever witnessed on the stage. The "Major Coffin" of Mr. Shiels was a good, careful piece of acting. Mr. Warwick aggravated his voice so that he roared as gently as any sucking dove, and otherwise tamed himself down to play the character of "Beamish McCoul" in a more creditable manner than anything which he has attempted since his re-appearance on the stage, but the staccato manner in which he blurts out his sentences always makes his reading unpleasant. Miss Belle Divine's lack of animation in her rendition of the character of the sprightly "Fanny Powers" was painful, but, as she evidently did her best, and cannot be expected to produce a flow of animal spirits when occasion requires, without having a well-spring to draw on, the fault did not lie in her. With the exception of these two last mentioned characters, the cast was perfect. Mrs. Yeamans, in the minor character of "Katy Welsh," tried to make herself a little too prominent; she must not let a little praise spoil her, but be content to do no more than is set down for her; her barn door jig is quite a feature in the fourth scene of the first act, and is always much applauded. Mr. Leach plays the "Secretary" very well, and manages the comedy scene in the last act effectively. Mr. Percy causes a good deal of laughter by the manner in which he plays "Winterbottom," the Cockney valet, but I cannot speak favorably of it as a study from nature; the dialect is not skilfully brought out, and the superfluity of h's is accomplished with too visible an effort. Arrah na Pogue, as a whole, is, I suppose, the greatest dramatic success ever achieved in California; the means used to ensure its success were a lavish outlay of money, careful judgment in casting the piece, and frequent rehearsal. Every one is glad that Mr. Wheatleigh is sure to be handsomely rewarded for his display of enterprise, and none more so than

TOUCHSTONE.

NEW BOOKS.

WE are indebted to A. Roman & Co., No. 417 and 419 Montgomery street, for the following new books:

The Story of the Great March. By Brevet-Major George Ward Nichols, Aid-de-Camp to General Sherman. New York: Harper & Brothers.

The story of the "Great March,"—the romantic episode of the war—is compiled from daily notes of the march, taken by the author, and, as a narrative, possesses unusual freshness and novelty, while the chronicle seems to be full, faithful and graphic. Without giving us a dry history of military movements, or technical details of strategy, the author seems to have preserved and depicted all the humor, life and abandon of the great enterprise. The story commences with a sketch of the opening of the campaign and the burning of Atlanta, and concludes with the truce of Johnson. The assault on Fort McAllister is well told, as are the thousand details of the march "from Atlanta to the sea." Altogether, it seems to be the best account of the famous campaign yet given to the public. The following extract, giving a description of "Breaking Camp," preparatory to a day's march, is particularly vivid:

Among the most characteristic features of the soldier's life is the important step of breaking camp, which is at once the close of a season of monotonous inactivity and the preliminary stage of a phase of exciting adventure. The same general details are on such occasions observed throughout the entire army, differing slightly in some of the corps, when the division which was in the centre or rear marches first, taking the place of the division which was in advance the day before.

The order of march is issued by the army commanders the preceding night, from them to the corps commanders, and then passed along until every soldier, teamster, and camp-follower knows that an early start is to be made. "The second division will be on the Milledgeville road promptly at five o'clock" reads an order, by way of instance.

At three o'clock the watch-fires are burning dimly, and, but for the occasional neighing of horses, all is so silent that it is difficult to imagine that twenty thousand men are within a radius of a few miles. The ripple of the brook can be distinctly heard as it breaks over the pebbles, or winds petulantly about the gnarled roots. The wind sweeping gently through the tall pines overhead only serves to lull to deeper repose the slumbering soldier, who in his tent is dreaming of his far-off Northern home.

But in an instant all is changed. From some commanding elevation the clear toned bugle sounds out the reveille, and another and another responds, until the startled echoes double and treble the clarion calls. Intermingled with this comes the beating of drums, often rattling and jarring on unwilling ears. In a few moments the peaceful quiet is replaced by noise and tumult, arising from hill and dale, from field and forest. Camp-fires, hitherto extinct or smouldering in dull gray ashes, awaken to new life and brilliancy, and send forth their sparks high into the morning air. Although no gleam of sunrise blushes in the east, the harmless flames on every side light up the scene, so that there is no disorder or confusion.

The æsthetic aspects of this sudden change do not, however, occupy much of the soldier's time. He is more practically engaged in getting his breakfast ready. The potatoes are frying nicely in the well-larded pan; the chicken is roasting delicately on the red-hot coals, and grateful fumes from steaming coffee-pots delight the nostrils. The animals are not less busy. An ample supply of corn and huge piles of fodder are greedily devoured by these faithful friend of the boys in blue, and any neglect is quickly made known by the pawing of neighing horses and the fearful braying of the mules. Amid all is the busy clatter of tongues and tools—a Babel of sound, forming a contrast to the quiet of the previous hour as marked as that between peace and war.

Then the animals are hitched into the traces, and the droves of cattle relieved from the night's confinement in the corral. Knapsacks are strapped, men seize their trusty weapons, and, as again the bugles sound the note of command, the soldiers fall into line and file out upon the road, to make another stage of their journey—it may be to win fresh laurels in another victory, or perhaps to find a rest which shall only be broken by the reveillé of the last trump.

Letters to Various Persons. By H. D. Thoreau. Boston: Ticknor & Fields.

These "remains"—the disjecta membra of the lamented Thoreau—in the shape of a few characteristic letters, are edited by Emerson and introduced by a brief, and for Mr. Emerson, remarkably lucid preface. The letters are in the best vein of the late open air essayist and peripatetic philosopher, and the volume is closed by a few poems of graceful beauty and outline. We are tempted to make a single extract:

MIST.

Low-anchored cloud,
Newfoundland air,
Fountain-head and source of rivers,
Dew-cloth, dream-drapery,
And napkin spread by fays;
Drifting meadow of the air,
Where bloom the daisied banks and violets,
And in whose feuny labyrinth
The bittern booms and heron wades;
Spirit of lakes and seas and rivers—
Bear only perfumes and the scent
Of healing herbs to just men's fields.

Our Friend from Victoria. A comedy in three acts. By C. H. Webb.

Further criticism, in addition to that evoked by this play during its representation in this city, is hardly necessary here. In its present form some of its defects are exaggerated, some of its charms heightened. The dialogue is crisp and sparkling, as it would naturally be where the characters are represented by four or five "Inigo's," who, however, seem to have no other individuality. As a natural result, the peculiarities of "Witherspoon," "Smithson," and "Julia" excite no interest as characters, and the happy marriage of the lovers and discomfiture of the villain, provoke neither satisfaction nor surprise. As a whole, the play is not up to the standard of Mr. Webb's best "Things," but the author's literary reputation is too justly based to be affected by its success or failure.

"PUCK" FOR OCTOBER.

WE give the following extracts from an advance copy of Puck, our Pacific Punch:

THERE HE GOES WITH HIS EYE OUT.—This saying is of remarkable antiquity, dating back to scriptural times. After Sampson had been deprived of his sight by the Philistines, rude little boys used to mock the unhappy man as he went to work at the mill at Gaza, crying out: "Here is a jolly spree. There's Sampson; there he goes with his eye out!"

MAKE NO BONES ABOUT IT.—This is a corruption of "Break" no bones. We say a man can do such and such a thing, and break no bones about it. The transition is easy from "break no bones" to "make no bones!"

THE FIRST RECORDED CASE OF VENTRILOQUISM.—When Jonah called out from the inside of the whale.

EPITAPH ON A PROSPECTOR.—He's struck the ledge.

HEALTHY RESORT FOR THE BLIND.—The see-side.

THE GREATEST ANT EXT-ANT.—The Eleph-ant.

THE ROPE-WALKER AT THE CLIFF.

When Cooke, on desperate deeds intent,
Gave up his canvas for the rope,
Old Boreas all his storm-clouds sent,
And drenching rains extinguished hope.

And when th' intrepid jester stood
Amid that elemental strife,
Thousands admired his hardihood,
But hoped he would not risk his life.

"How rash 't would be to try his luck
Along that perilous, narrow track;
If he should slip and catch a duck,
He'd wish he had his canvas back."

[For the Californian.]

THE MARIGOLD.

(CALENDULA OFFICINALIS.)

THERE are several handsome species, some of which are shrubby, and some annuals. The common Marigold, (calendula officinalis) and its varieties, and Calendula Stellata, are the handsomest of the annual species.

The Cape Marigolds, (Calendula Phivialis and C. Hybrida) have been removed by Professor De Candolle to a new genus which he calls Dimorphotheca. Both of these species are hardy annual plants with very elegant flowers which close at the withdrawal of the sun, and as they do not open at all when dark heavy clouds foretell the approach of rain, Linnæus called the commonest species Calendula Pluvialis, or the rainy Marigold. The botanical name is supposed to be derived from Calendæ, the Latin term for the first day of every month, because it continues long in flower, whence its Italian name of Fiore d' ogni Mese.

The Marigold, a native of the south of Europe, was cultivated in England in 1597, and is still one of the most common annuals in cottage gardens; its rayed flowerets had formerly much medical virtue attributed to them, but from the habit of closing at sunset, it has gained more lasting poetical fame.

Many of the poetical allusions to this flower turn not only on its closing at night, but also on its opening in the morning with the dew thickly pearled on its petals, a characteristic which it has in common with some other flowers, although, perhaps, it retains the pearly drops longer after sunrise than most. It is this property which led Shakspeare beautifully to describe it as "The Marigold that goes to bed with the sun,

And with him rises weeping."

Madame Lebrun in one of her charming pictures has represented Grief as a young man, pale and languishing; his head appears to be bowed down by the weight of a garland of Marigolds. All the world knows this gilded flower which has been made the emblem of distress of mind, or rather, we should say, of that inquietude which is caused by uncertainty as to the sentiments of the one we love with a peculiar affection.

The mournful signification of the Marigold can be modified in various ways. United with roses it is the emblem of the sweeter pains of love; alone it expresses inquietude or ennui. Woven with other flowers, it represents the inconstant chain of life, ever good and evil interwoven. In the East a bouquet of marigolds and poppies expresses the thought. "I will allay your pain." It is especially by these modifications that the Sentiments of Flowers render the interpretation of our thoughts understood.

Margaret of Orleans, maternal ancestor of Henry IV., had for device a Marigold turning towards the sun, with these words, "Je ne veux suivre que lui seul." That virtuous princess wished to express by this device that all her thoughts and all her affections turned towards heaven, as the Marigold does towards the sun.

"When with a serious musing I behold
The grateful and obsequious Marigold,
How duly every morning she displays
An open breast when Titian spreads his rays;
How she observes him in his daily walk
Still bending towards him her small slender stalk;
How, when he declines, she droops and mourns,
Bedew'd (as 't were) with tears, till he returns;
And how she veils her flowers when he is gone,
As if she scorned to be looked on
By an inferior eye; or did contemn
To wait upon a meaner light than him;
When this I meditate, methinks the flowers
Have spirits far more generous than ours,
And give us fair examples to despise
The servile fawnings and idolatries
Wherewith we court these earthly things below,
Which merit not the service we bestow."

The French Marigold, (Tagetes Patuta,) is deservedly popular from the brilliancy and variegation of its flowers. Some of the improved varieties are exceedingly beautiful, particularly the fine variegated sorts of a rich velvety brown and yellow, distinctly striped or shaded with brown on a yellow ground.

There is nothing more interesting than to have an entire collection of one kind of plants, such as the above, raised from seed and grown in the best manner.

The pleasure of raising plants from seed is very much greater than purchasing them, the daily growth and development and the anxiety of seeing the opening flowers, all give zest to the attention bestowed upon them.

Each plant then has a history of its own, and the cultivator learns the wants of each kind of plants and by care and attention the most common varieties may be improved so that they would be hardly recognized along side of the ordinary kinds. No one will regret trying the experiment with a few choice seeds, for they will be surely rewarded for their care.

LUSK, who shot Billings at Idaho City, has been acquitted on the ground of self-defence.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

THE performance of L'Africaine, at Covent Garden, is the last event of interest. The Musical World says that "the opera" (abridged one-third by Costa, so as to last only four hours) "was received with unanimous favor from beginning to end"—the World always admires Meyerbeer. Other accounts indicate something like a failure.

THE European steamer brings news that Mr. Manager Max Maretzek has engaged the following artistes: soprani, Signora Anna Ticcona, Signorina Elena Bozzati; tenori, Signor Guiseppe Cassetti, Signor Cesare Chiaverini; baritoni, Signor Ettore Cornuti, Signor Chiavacci; bassi, Signor Antonucci, Signor Rovere, and Signor Papini. When these ladies and gentlemen arrive on our shores, Mr. Maretzek will probably inform us who they are.

TAGLIONI, the great composer of ballets, was invited to compose a ballet for the Grand Opera in Paris, but made it a condition to have the music for it written by his old friend, the German composer Hertel. This offer was declined, because it was said that the opera was a "national" institution, and Mr. Taglioni left the city of the world for Milan, where he has made an engagement to produce a grand ballet at the Scala. The management of the opera invited Mr. Leon Delile to compose the music.

Meyerbeer's Africaine is to be produced in Vienna in December. All the arrangements have been made with Madame Meyerbeer, and everything connected with the scenery and machinery is perfectly satisfactory. There are only two bagatelles still wanting: an "Africaine" and a "Vasco di Gama." The management hope to find both among the "stars," male and female, under agreement to appear.

A YOUNG man, who a couple of years ago did errands for Max Maretzek in New York, and whose name is Carlberg, is now undertaking "Symphonic Concerts" in Vienna. The price of admission is about twenty cents, and is in entire conformity with the ability of the conductor.

CARL FORMES is residing at Hyde Park, Chicago, near the city. He is undergoing medical treatment for disease of the throat. His voice is in a much better condition than it has been for some time past. The Opera will probably open some time next month. Mr. Grau promises a new and powerful company.

A CONVERSAZIONE, for the instruction of instrumentalists and the formation of good orchestras, will be opened the first of September, at Stuttgardt. The direction will be confided to Eckert, the Chapel Master, and the lessons will be gratuitous.

MDLLE. CARLOTTA PATTI, with Jaell, Brassin, Vieuxtemps, and Piatti, are to give a series of concerts at St. Petersburgh, organized by Ulmann.

MR. BREWSTER WYLIE has set sail for America. The terms offered him in his Boston engagement are of the most flattering character.

M. BAGIER, director of the Italian Opera in Paris has engaged Signor Arditi, composer of the famous waltz, "Il Bacio," as chef d'orchestre. The waltz was originally sold for 300f. to the publisher, to whom it has realized upwards of 30,000f.

OTTO JAHN is about to publish a popular edition, in one volume, of his life (six vols.) of Mozart. It is to be regretted that the German biographers do not present their works translated into French, for the convenience of the general reading public.

THE Italian Opera of Moscow has yielded up its last sigh. The death warrant was signed by Count Adlerberg, acting upon instructions from the Czar. It appears that the last season left a deficit of 220,000 rubles.

MDLLE. CARLOTTA PATTI has left London for Boulogne-sur-mer.

LA GRANGE and the tenor Morini have sung in Cadiz with immense success.

BRIGNOLI has sung the part of "Ernesto" in Don Pasquale in the place of Mario, who was taken sick suddenly. He was very favorably received.

SIGNOR ARDITI is engaged by M. Bagier as conductor of the Italian Opera at Paris for next season.

HALEVY, it is said, left an opera entitled Noah, which has lately been found among his posthumous papers.

THE manager of the Theatre Italien is in terms with Mdlle. Tietjens for two months.

PLANS have been prepared for a new theatre in Holborn, in which Mr. Sothern and Mr. Sefton Parry have an interest.

JAELL and Vieuxtemps lately gave a concert in Kreuznach.

THE portrait of Mozart, which lately came into the possession of the Director of the Musical Union, painted in 1770 by Batoui, is now in the hands of the engraver.

[New York Review.

A PREDICAMENT.—The following circumstance happened in Cedar county, Iowa: A certain young man being out on a courting expedition one Sunday evening, in order to keep his secret from his young acquaintances, determined to be at home bright and early on Monday morning. Dressed in his fine white summer pants, and other fixins in proportion, he mounted his horse and soon arrived at the residence of his inamorata, where he was kindly received, and the horse properly cared for, being turned into the pasture for the night. Three o'clock was the time for him to depart, so that he might arrive at home before his comrades were stirring. He sallied forth to the pasture to catch his horse; but here was the difficulty—the grass was high and loaded with dew. To venture in with his pantaloons on would rather take the starch out of them, and lead to his detection. It would not do to go in his white unmentionables so he quickly made his resolve. He carefully disrobed himself of his valuable whites, and placed them in safety on the fence, while he gave chase with unscreened pedals through the wet grass, after his horse. Returning to the fence, where he had safely suspended his lily-white unmentionables, oh, mirable dictu! what a sight met his eyes! The field into which his horse had been turned was not only a horse pasture but a calf pasture, too; and the naugaty calves, attracted by the white flag on the fence, had betaken themselves to it, and, calf-like, had eaten them up! Only a few well-chewed fragments of this once valuable portion of the wardrobe remained—only a few threads—just sufficient to indicate what they once had been. What a pickle was this for a nice young man to be in!

It was now daylight, and the farmers were up, and our hero far from home, with no covering for his "travelling apparatus." It would not do to go back to the house of his lady-love, neither to go to town in that plight. There was only one resource left to him; that was, to secrete himself in the bushes for some time: and it may be imagined that his feelings towards the calf-kind were not of the most friendly character in consequence. But ere long his seclusion was destined to be intruded upon. By-and-by the boys, who had been out to feed the calves, returned with the remnants of the identical white garment which had adorned the lower limbs of their late visitor! They were mangled and torn to shreds! An inquest was immediately held over them. Some awful fate had befallen the man. The neighbors were summoned to search for the mangled corpse, and the posse, with dogs and arms, set out with all speed. The pasture was thoroughly scoured, and then the adjacent thickets, when, lo! our hero was driven from his lair by the keen scent of the dogs, all safe and sound, minus the linen! An explanation then ensued at the expense of our hero. But he was successful in the end; he married the lady, and is now living comfortably in one of the flourishing towns of Iowa.

MY REPUTATION, IAGO, MY REPUTATION.—I had not been long in New Orleans, when I was one evening invited by a mutual friend to call on a young lady belonging to one of the best families. On my way to her residence I was prepared by my friend to meet a paragon of female loveliness and culture. I was pleased with the visit, and her real loveliness of manner and sparkling vivacity enabled me to submit patiently and pleasantly to a homily on the resources of the South, not only as regards the products of her soil, but of her intellect, and her independence of the North in that respect. Of course the little beauty was fashionably "secesh," and spoke of the greatness of the South with all of a woman's ardor. After a time the young lady changed her conversation to the subject of music, and, seating herself at the piano, played and sung a ballad or two. Finally, turning to me, she said:

"Have you any favorite song you would like me to sing?"

"Yes," I replied, and named a song.

She replied that she had never heard of it, and wished to know who wrote it.

"William Cullen Bryant, of New York, the great American poet—of course you have heard of him?"

"Oh yes," she replied: "I have heard his minstrels sing!"

How would the venerable, gray-bearded Thanatopsis smile to be taken for the manager of Dan Bryant's minstrels!

UNCERTAINTY OF "CONSUMMATE BLISS!"—An amusing incident occurred at the depot in Manchester, New Hampshire, a few days since; a train had just arrived with a detachment of New Hampshire soldiers. A blooming maiden, who was present, for the purpose of welcoming home her long-absent lover, caught sight of him, and, with out-stretched arms, started to embrace him. Just at that moment the crowd became so great that the soldiers were pressed aside, and the lady, missing her calculations, caught another bronzed hero in her arms, at the same time giving him a rousing "smack." The soldier, who had never retreated on the battle-field, started back with fright, exclaiming, as he did so, "Who in the d—l are you?" The large crowd in attendance, while they sympathized with the lady in her mistake, could not repress a hearty laugh at her expense.

MANY persons complain that they cannot find words for their thoughts; when the real trouble is that they cannot find thoughts for their words.

POCKET-HANDKERCHIEF ART.—When we look around (and in our pockets) at various articles which are made in enormous quantities for the use of particular classes, it seems wonderful, in the first instance, how manufacturers are found who undertake, at a large pecuniary risk, the production of such things; and also, where the purchasers are to be met who render these speculations remunerative.

Amongst many other matters which are curious in their way as examples of the condition and progress of taste, is art as it has been shown for at least fifty years in pocket-handkerchiefs. These are in many ways singular, and deserve a little passing attention. A long time since, we can remember pocket-handkerchiefs for children, on which there were boys and girls at play, cottages, lamps, shepherdesses, and a variety of other devices. And there was no lack of picture pocket-handkerchiefs for those of older years: for sportsmen and others there were printed on these articles representations of fighting-cocks, dog-fights, hunting scenes, stage-coaches, and horses; and even recently, there have been shown in this way ships and steamers of various kinds, and conspicuous amongst them the Great Eastern, in divers positions; groups of sailors with the Union Jack and other devices; soldiers of the cavalry and the line; parties of pitmen, navigators, cotton-spinners, and those who form representative figures of large classes.

In our time we have noticed many peculiar hobbies of collectors, some having bestowed an extraordinary degree of pains and industry in collecting play-bills, election squibs, caricatures, etc. We once knew a collector who had, at considerable expense, purchased little pieces of the ropes by which notorious criminals had been put to death, and the instruments with which murders had been committed. This, however, is, we hope, a rare kind of collecting; but it would not be so singular or objectionable if some persons may have been minded to collect picture handkerchiefs. They would present a curious illustration of passing events. We should find portraits of George III. and the Princess Charlotte, William IV. and Queen Adelaide; Earl Grey, Lord Brougham, and their associates in the passing of the Reform Bill; then of Lord Palmerston, Sir Robert Peel, Bright, the lamented Cobden, Garibaldi, and so on. There would also be representations of Tom Spring, Tom Sayers, and many others who have achieved fame in the fistic line. Thurtell and other murderers have in this way been handed down to detestation; and such events as Ross's voyage to the North Pole, the burning of the Tower of London and the Royal Exchange, the shooting of the elephant in the Strand, which have shared a large amount of public attention; also views of noted buildings and large towns, have all been thus depicted more or less graphically.

Some of these illustrations are printed on humble cotton of various tints, others on silk of an expensive kind; and, no doubt, before the days of illustrated publications, the picture work of this kind was not without its use, however tasteless or objectionable the application of pictorial art in this direction may for the most part have been.—Builder.

TOO MUCH "RESS."—As Artemus Ward protests against "too much mother" in latter day ballads, so do we protest against the mutilation of good old English words to make them apply to the feminine gender. With very questionable taste and correctness, a female actor is called "an actress;" a woman who practices physic is called "a doctress," and in a Minnesota paper we find a Miss Evans who goes around preaching temperance called an "oratress." This "ress" termination is an abomination in the sight of good taste and correct diction. With equal propriety, might Miss Angela Starr King be called a readeress; Harriet Beecher Stowe a noveless; (quite as correct as authoress.) An actor is an actor and a doctor is a doctor, male or female; and this namby-pamby affectation of feminine terminations is of the same vulgarity which prompts a cream cheese preacher to call a woman a lady and a man a gentleman, when performing the marriage ceremony.—Carson Appeal.

JAW-BREAKERS.—In a poem by Hoffman, the German poet who was expelled from the Prussian dominions, and the admission of his works prohibited, the following word appears: "Steuerverweigerungverfassungsmsmassigberechtight," meaning a man who is exempt by the Constitution from paying taxes. We ourselves have heard of a gentleman, a member of the Marrionettenschauspielhanssengesellschaft who was said to be an excellent performer on the Constanti napolitanischedudelsackpfeife.

A SON of Neptune, who was in the habit of quarrelling with his better half, was one day remonstrated with by the minister of the parish, who told him he and his wife ought to live on more amicable terms, as they were both one. "One!" said the old salt, shifting his quid, "if you should come by the house sometimes, blast my tarry toplights, if you wouldn't think we were about twenty."

A NICE old lady up town declares that she thinks it very strange that a little quicksilver in a glass tube can make such awful hot weather by just rising an inch or so.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM

—OF—

WILD CHERRY,

HAS BEEN USED FOR

NEARLY HALF A CENTURY,

With the most astonishing success in curing

Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of

The Throat, Lungs and Chest,

INCLUDING EVEN

CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last-named and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the "medicinal gum" of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaints is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great the popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry, there are commingled with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of

has induced many physicians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

S. H. Finley, M. D., San Francisco, Cal.
E. Boyden, M. D., Exeter, Me.
Alexander Hatch, M. D., China, Me.
R. Fellows, M. D. Hill, N. H.
W. H. Webb, M. D., Cape Vincent, N. Y.
W. B. Lynch, M. D., Auburn, N. Y.
Abraham Skillman, M. D., Boundbrook, N. J.
H. D. Martin, M. D., Mansfield, Pa.

The proprietors have letters from all classes of our fellow-citizens, from the Halls of Congress to the humblest cottage, and even from beyond the seas; for the fame and virtues of WISTAR'S BALSAM have extended to the "uttermost bounds of the earth," without any attempt on our part to introduce it beyond the limits of our own country.

TO CALIFORNIANS AND OREGONIANS.

In future all genuine WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY for the Pacific Coast will be enclosed in a new wrapper which will bear the printed names of both SETH W. FOWLE & CO., Boston, Mass, and JOHN D. PARK Cincinnati, Ohio, as well as fac-simile of the signatures of "I. BUTTS," "SANFORD & PARK," and "H. WISTAR, M. D."

A DAY OF SUNSHINE.

BY H. W. LONGFELLOW.

O GIFT of God! O perfect day:
Whereon shall no man work, but play;
Whereon it is enough for me,
Not to be doing, but to be!

Through every fibre of my brain,
Through every nerve, through every vein,
I feel the electric thrill, the touch
Of life, that seems almost too much.

I hear the wind among the trees
Playing celestial symphonies;
I see the branches downward bent,
Like keys of some great instrument.

And over me unrolls on high
The splendid scenery of the sky,
Where through a sapphire sea the sun
Sails like a golden galleon,

Towards yonder cloud-land in the West,
Towards yonder Islands of the Blest,
Whose steep sierra far uplifts
Its craggy summits white with drifts.

Blow, winds! and waft through all the rooms
The snow-flakes of the cherry-blooms!
Blow, winds! and bend within my reach
The fiery blossoms of the peach!

O Life and Love! O happy throng
Of thoughts whose only speech is song!
O heart of man! canst thou not be
Blithe as the air is, and as free?

WHAT THEY DO AT NEWPORT.

A NEWPORT letter to the Boston Post avers that the following is the order of performances at that celebrated watering place this season:

FOR LADIES.

Rise late. Breakfast. Sit where you can see a great deal, scan everybody that enters or exits, eat what you can get, and, following one of Franklin's golden rules, retire from the table with an appetite. Promenade to the march in Faust, vigorously played by the band. Sit in the corridor and abuse the company. Drive to the beach and bathe, or drive to the beach and not bathe, and wonder how other women can. Return home and wait patiently for the hairdresser. Hair dresser. Grand toilet.

Dinner. Ladies in black silk go to the dinner-table early to see and not be seen. Ladies en grande tenue wait until the second course in order to be seen and not see. Very little eating and a great deal of remarking what other women have on. Promenade to the March in Faust. If you are young and pretty, and have admirers, you begin your flirtations for the day. If you are not young and pretty, but are a coquette, you flirt all the same. If you do the heavy dignity, you sit down in the corridor, learn everybody by heart, and abuse the company. Driving on the avenue, when nobody looks at the sunset and everybody continues to look at everybody else.

Tea. Less eating than at dinner, and more gossip. Retire to emerge in evening costume. Promenade to the march in Faust. Flirtations at their height. A general desire to look at the moon, if there is any; at the stars, if there is no moon. If you don't indulge in flirtations, you watch others, and thereby acquire a fund of information for the next day's gossip. To bed at midnight.

FOR GENTLEMEN.

Rise late and buy a New York paper. Breakfast. Read a very little of the newspaper and look a great deal at the pretty girl opposite. Get an introduction to pretty girl, and promenade. Smoke a cigar on piazza, and talk about the pretty girl and the Saratoga races. Go down to the beach and watch the bathers, ridicule the women and pronounce them frights. Cigars or billiards, or both, or an equivalent. Another cigar and gossip.

Toilet. Dinner. Lounge and watch the ladies. Go in rather late. Gaze unabashed at all the toilets that were invented for the purpose of attraction. Fee the waiter and take what you don't want. Promenade with as many pretty girls as is possible. Talk an infinite deal of nonsense. Invite the prettiest and silliest to drive. Drive and display your horses, or be driven and talk about men that have turnouts extraordinary.

Tea with pretty girl. More nonsense. Cigars on piazza. More talk about horses in general and pretty women in particular. Promenade with pretty girls. Flirtations.

Some gentlemen—those who approve of early hours—are up betimes to visit the "grand moral" men-agerie before referred to. It is also said that the Ocean House proprietors would be bankrupt were it not for the immense receipts taken at what is called "the bar."

NEW PLAYS—ANXIOUS FRENCH DRAMATISTS.

[THE "Continental Correspondent" of the American Literary Gazette, whose regular letters to that periodical are most readable and entertaining, among other literary gossip, gives the following account of the conduct of French dramatists when their productions are undergoing the ordeal of a first appearance:]

WHILE I have M. Dumas's name under my pen, let me tell you a curious anecdote which M. Jules Janin relates of that eccentric, restless man: "One night, when the poet brought out a drama in fourteen tableaux without giving a thought to the stage-boxes, the parquette, the pit, and the tiers, he looked around for the fireman, easily recognized by his brass helmet, and seeing the brilliant flashes of that covering, he said to himself: 'All is well!' The helmet made its appearance in every scene, and the delighted Dumas took the curiosity of the fireman and the applause of the public to boot. All went well to the sixth tableau; applause, praise, tears, and the fireman—nothing was wanting; but during the sixth tableau the fireman scarcely made his appearance; there was not the least glimmer of a helmet, and consequently the bewildered poet ceased to listen to his drama; he disappeared before the end of the sixth tableau, nay, he refused to return to listen to the catastrophe, when fortunately he saw in a 'slip' of the seventh tableau the helmet more attentive than ever. At this sight the author became serene and happy; he was sure his drama would be perfectly successful. It was as successful as he had predicted. After all was over, after the triumph, after the public had left the theatre, Alexandre Dumas, discovering the modest fireman, his judge and his arbiter, seated on the very bank of the verdure where the lover and the sweetheart had cooed, said: 'Halloo! my dear fellow, were you of service in the sixth tableau?' The fireman replied: 'I retired to the back of the slips: the sixth tableau fatigued me.' Alex. Dumas exclaimed: 'I suspected as much!' At this moment the prompter came out of his box with the seven acts under his arm. Dumas took the sixth act, and tore it into a thousand fragments. The actors screamed in tones of despair: 'What are you doing?' Dumas said: 'Don't you see? I am ridding you of the sixth tableau. It fatigued this excellent fireman.' I am sure this is a skilful explanation of the successes of Alexandre Dumas. He has confidence in the ingenuous auditor; he has trust in the fireman. Of a truth, if the fireman is fatigued, one may easily forsee that many other spectators will be fatigued. Therefore the fireman is the exact rule and the true judge of dramatic works. His helmet is a promise, his glance is a recompense. He is the law and the prophet of drama and comedy." M. Janin might have added that Moliere was accustomed to submit his plays to the judgment of his housekeeper, and whatever she failed to applaud he struck out. Sir Walter Scott, in like manner, would appeal to the taste of his humble companions.

While I am in the theatre let me describe the bearing of our authors on the first night of their pieces' performance. The oldest author never overcomes his nervousness on these occasions more than the great orator masters those emotions which shake his body like an aspen leaf whenever he rises to address an assembly. M. Victor Hugo is the only author I know who is unmoved during these hours of travail. By the way, his kinsman, M. Paul Foucher, has given an interesting account of the first (and last) performance of Le Roi s'amuse, which is worth admission in these pages to which Allibone's great-great-great-great grandson will turn when a nine times distant Childs shall prepare to put to press a 200th edition of the Dictionary of English and Foreign Literature. The first act provoked only applause, despite some crude expressions in Triboulet's part, which the will of Ligier forced on the public. These lines, referring to poets—

> "Cinq ou six—c'est toute une écurie, > C'est une académie—une menagérie—"

provoked the approbative hilarity of the noisy representatives of the new school—the enthusiasts of Victor Hugo, Lamartine, and Alexandre Dumas in literature, and of Delacroix, L. Boulanger, and St. Evre in art. The famous line, so severely reproached to the poet: "Je m'en soucie autant qu'un poisson d'une pomme" was not spoken at length on the first performance. Ferrier, who was afraid of it, stopped at the word "poisson." The storm burst in the second act. Mlle. Dupont was there in the meridian of life and in all the éclat of opulent beauty; wore the piquant costume of Maqnelonne, the bandit's sister; she and several of her comrades were repeatedly obliged to recommence the dialogue which the anger of the audience suppressed. Ligier fought to the last moment with a conviction, a loyal energy equalled only by his talents. I remember that, kneeling on the bag in which he believed he had Francis I., he was obliged to repeat four times "M'entends-tu?" with a voice of thunder which scarcely rose above the tumult of the audience. After Victor Hugo's name was given (or the author of the piece) to that seething sea, depression no more changed the poet's countenance than passion had seemed to inflame it during the battle. His Olympian brow had met these furious waves with the rock's resistance. After the curtain fell he expressed thanks and encouragement to his actors, and when the frail Mlle. Anais Aubert—who was able to offer no more resistance to the storm than a straw could have done—expressed her state of prostration to him, the grand combatant quietly replied: "You are alarmed by trifles. 'Twill be far different day after to-morrow." The next day the piece was interdicted.

PREMIUM LIQUORS.—Mr. I. D. Thompson, of No. 321 Montgomery street, received the three first premiums at the late Fair, for fine Whiskies, Native Claret and other liquors. Mr. T. supplies families, parties and clubs, and those who want good articles can rely on procuring them at Thompson's.

ARTEMUS WARD

ON THE CELEBRATION AT BALDINSVILLE, IN HONOR OF THE ATLANTIC CABLE.

[APROPOS of the Atlantic Cable, the New York Saturday Press revives Artemus Ward's article on the subject, written in 1858.]

BALDINSVILLE, Injianny, Sep the onct, 18&58.—I was summund home from Ciusinnaty quite suddin by a letter from the Supervizers of Baldinsville, sayin how grate things was on the Tappis in that air town in refference to selebratin the compleshun of the Sub-Mershine Tellegraph & axin me to be Pressunt. Lockin up my Kaugeroo and wax wurks in a sekure stile I took my departer for Baldinsville, which I got intwo at early kandle litin on the follerin night and just as the sellerbrashun and illumernashun ware commensin.

Baldinsville was trooly in a blaze of glory. Ne'r can I forget the surblime speckticul which met my gase as I alited from the Stage with my umbreller and verlise. The Tarvern was lit up with taller kandles all over & a grate bon fire was burnin in frunt thareof. A Transpiran-y was tied onto the sine post with the follerin wurds—"Giv us Liberty or Deth." Old Tompkinsis groscry was illumernated with 5 tin lantuns and the follerin Transpiracy was in the winder—"The Sub-Mershine Tellergrarph & and the Baldinsville and Stonefield Plank Road—the two grate events of the 19th centerry—may intestine strife never mar their grandjure." Simkinsis shoe shop was all ablase with kandles and lantuns. A American Eagle was painted onto a flag in a winder; also these wurds, viz—"The Constitooshun must be Preserved." The Skool house was lited up in grate stile and the winders was filld with mottoes, among which I notised the follerin: "Trooth smashed to erth shall rize again—YOU CAN'T STOP HER." "The Boy stood on the Burnin Deck whense awl but him had Fled." "Prokrastinashun is the theef of Time." "Be virtoous & you will be Happy." "Intemperunse has cawsed a heap of trubble—shun the Bole," and the follerin sentimunt written by the skool master, who graduated at Hudson Kollige, "Baldinsville sends greetin to Her Magisty the Queen, and hopes all hard feelins which has heretofore previs biu felt between the Supervizers of Baldinsville and the British Parliament, if such there has been, may now be forever wiped from our Escutchuns. Baldinsville this night rejoises over the gerlorious event which sementz 2 grate nashuns onto one another by means of a elecktric wire under the roarin billers of the Nasty Deep. QUOSQUE TANTEUM, A BUTTER, CATERLINY, PATENT NOSTRUM!" Squire Smith's house was lited up regardless of expense. His little son William Henry stood upon the roof firin orf crackers. The old 'Squire hisself was dressed up in soljer clothes and stood on his doarstep, pintin his sword sollumly to a American flag which was suspendid on top of a pole in frunt of his house. Frequently he would take orf his cocked hat and wave it round in a impressive stile. His oldest darter, Mis Isabeller Smith, who has just cum home from the Perkinsville Female Instertoot, appeared at the frunt winder in the West room as the goddis of liberty, & sung "I see them on their windin way." Booteus I, sed I to myself, you air a angil & nothin shorter. N. Boneparte Smith, the Squire's oldest sun, drest hisself up as Venus, the God of Wars and red the Declaracion of Inderpendence from the left chamber winder. The Squire's wife didn't jine in the festiverties. She sed it was the tarnalest nonsense she ever seed. Sez she to the Squire, "Cum into the house and go to bed you old fool, you. Tomorrer you'll be goin round half-ded with the rumertism & won't gin us a minit's peace till you get well." Sez the Squire, "Betsy, you little appresiate the importance of the event which I this nite commemerate." "Commemerate a cat's tail—cum into the house this instant, you pesky old critter." "Betsy," sez the Squire, wavin his sword, "retire." This made her just as mad as she could stick. She retired, but cum out again putty quick with a pailfull of Bilin hot water which she throwed all over the Squire, & Surs, you wood have split your sides larfin to see the old man jump and holler & run into the house. Except this unpropishous circumstance, all went as merry as a carringe bell, as Lord Byrun sez. Doctor Hutchinsis office was likewise lited up, and a Transpirancy on which was painted the Queen in the act of drinkin sum of "Hutchinsis invigorater," was stuck into one of the winders. The Baldinsville Bugle of Liberty noospaper offiss was also illumernated, & the follerin mottoes stuck out: "The Press is the Arkermejian leaver which moves the world." "Vote Early." "Buckle on yer Armer." "Now is the time to Subscribe." "Franklin, Morse & Field." "Terms $1 50 a year; liberal reduckshuns to clubs." In short the village of Baldinsville was in a perfect fewroar. I never seed so many peple thar belonr in my born days. Ile not attemp to describe the scenes of that grate nite. Wurds wood fale me ef I should try to do it.

ECONOMY.—Half the cost and labor of washing may be saved by using the "California Washing Extract," in place of soap. Thayer, the chemist, testifies that it is free from acid or any substance injurious to clothing. It acts like a charm, doing away with all the scrubbing, pounding, and wearing out of clothes. Read the advertisement, and try it.

RAILROAD MEETING.—The Stockholders of the Front street, Mission, and Ocean Railroad Company are to hold a meeting of importance on Tuesday night. See advertisement.

AN INTERESTING LETTER.

Very few persons, even among physicians, would have been willing upon any terms to have been in the condition of the writer of the following letter on the 14th of February last. I will anticipate somewhat his report of the facts, by saying that on the 15th August, 1865, he made me a visit, "the very picture of health." Time, which tries and proves all things, has sufficiently tested this case, and shown that neither relapse or collapse having followed, the cure is perfect, and can be cited among the scores of similar cases, the result of my improved mode of treating disease without medicine.

G. M. BOURNE,
Water Cure Physician,
No. 10, Masonic Temple, Post street.
August 27, 1865.

Sacramento, April 30, 1865.

Dr. G. M. Bourne—Dear Sir: It is with pleasure and satisfaction that I now let you know of my good health. Looking back on what I have passed through, it seems as if I was lifted from the grave, and I think it my duty to acknowledge to you and the world the benefit I derived from water treatment as administered by you in your celebrated baths. It was in August, 1864, when disease developed itself with a severe cough. I then took medicines getting worse, with chills, fevers, loss of strength, and was pronounced consumptive. This set me to thinking, and finally I determined to leave my business and go to the Sandwich Islands, having been informed that I could not be cured here. I went to San Francisco, and while waiting for a ship, called upon Dr. Bourne, who stated that a trip to the Sandwich Islands would probably result disastrously, was wholly unnecessary, as I could then be speedily cured at his establishment. I placed myself under his treatment, and in one week was so much improved that I thought I could risk returning home and to my duty as Engineer on the Central Pacific Railroad. The doctor objected; but I thought I knew better, and returned to my duty. In about two weeks my cough returned, and I kept getting worse, and, contrary to Dr. Bourne's injunction never to take medicine again, committed that folly, and soon was so completely run down that I could scarcely walk; so, as a last resort, I concluded once more to try the Water Cure. I went to San Francisco—few of my friends expected me to return; in fact, I thought my return doubtful. On arriving at Dr. Bourne's establishment (February 14, 1865,) I was not able to get into the bath without assistance, but in a few days I began to gain. I remained with him only six weeks, when I left, "a wiser and a better man," without the aid of medicine. I have now been at work several weeks, and find that I am gaining every day, and at present bid fair to be stouter than ever before. Persons visiting the Doctor's establishment will find it just what it should be, in both Ladies' and Gentlemen's Departments, and I cannot say too much in praise of the Doctor's kind attention to his patients.

This letter I write for the benefit of the afflicted, to be used as the Doctor decides, and should it be the means of directing any one to his care and treatment who (as they assuredly will) find relief, I will be paid for my trouble. Your obedient servant,

JAMES CAMPBELL,
Engineer Central Pacific Railroad.

San Francisco, August 25, 1865.

Advised by the undersigned, Mr. James Campbell, of the Central Pacific Railroad (who was then in a most deplorable state of ill health,) placed himself under the care of Dr. Bourne, the Water Cure Physician. Some six months or more afterward he visited this city, when I accidentally met him at Dr. Bourne's establishment, and, I am happy to say, restored to the enjoyment of good health and in fine spirits. JOHN SULLIVAN.

☞ Dr. Bourne treats all diseases of the throat, chest, and lungs—which includes diptheria, bronchitis, incipient consumption, pleurisy, croup, etc.—with the greatest success. Great relief is afforded in advanced stages of consumption. Rheumatism, paralysis, neuralgia, fever and ague, dropsy, etc., etc., are also cured quickly, pleasantly, and economically. No medicine whatever.

Visit Haskell's Mammoth Tea Store, and examine the splendid display of choicest Teas, Wines and Greceries, now selling at greatly reduced prices, at Wholesale and Retail.

Store fronts on Market and Sutter streets, below the Market House. Open every evening until seven o'clock, and on Saturdays until ten P. M

Home Manufactures.—It is the duty of every Californian to give encouragement to the productions of our own State, and, all other things being equal, preference should be shown to our manufactures. Now, in the matter of cloth, things are at least equal, and when we examine the fine suits of fashionable clothing for sale at Quincy Hall, we incline to the idea that our productions have the advantage. This is the pioneer establishment in manufacturing clothing from California cloth, having commenced it in April last. Their work gives general satisfaction, and we are pleased to learn that their business in this line is steadily increasing. Our advice to our readers is, to call and examine for themselves at Nos. 545, 557 and 549 Washington street.—Call.

A Lady at the Fair.—We always find a crowd gathered about the show-case of Mrs. Read, whose Skirt Supporters and Chest Expanders are in extensive use wherever fashion reigns or health is an object to be desired. Specimens of her work in this branch of art, remarkable for perfection and finish, are exhibited by her, and also supporters for Hernia and Rupture, which, it seems, are extensively in demand. All these are more or less appliances for the preservation of health; but the cynosure of all eyes is the "Bust," an article indispensable to a lady's toilet. These and other objects and curiosities, it is generally conceded, richly entitle Mrs. Read to a premium.—San Francisco Sunday Mercury.

A TRUE STORY.

DEDICATED TO THE SICK.

There dwelt in Sacramento a pale, bilious mechanic,
His muscles were strengthless, his blood it was chill;
And the wife of his bosom believed, in her panic,
The husband she worshipped was hopelessly ill.
Seeking daily for help, in her wifely devotion,
All vainly she tried pill, powder and potion—
Till at last, when a prey to grief's wildest emotion,
Of HOSTETTER'S BITTERS she heard from a friend.

She purchased the cordial, half hoping, half fearing,
A prayer on her lip and a tear in her eye;
And taking his hand, with words kindly and cheering,
Besought him the tonic for her sake to try.
As he drank, a new life through his system seemed stealing,
Each following draft did its mission of healing,
Until, strong in health and most grateful in feeling,
He told the "true story" here twined into song.

It is also proper to state that the Bitters are sold exclusively in glass, and never, under any circumstances, by the gallon or barrel. Imposters and imitators are abroad, and the only safeguard the public have against them is to see that the Bitters they buy have the engraved label and note of hand of Messrs. Hostetter & Smith, and their proprietary stamp over the cork of the bottle.

The Connecticut Life Insurance Company organized in 1847, with a guaranteed capital of $50,000; Eliphalet A. Bulkley was its first President, and Guy R. Phelps, Secretary. This company has been successful from the first, and has grown to be, in the number of its policy-holders, the largest company in the world, and its business for the past year was greater than that of any other Life Insurance Company in the world. The whole number of policies issued is 43,386, of which 24,054 are now in force, covering an aggregate risk of over $60,000,000. It has paid in losses, on 1,729 lives, the sum of $3,952,762; and in dividends, $2,812,904. Its capital and assets, February 1st, were $7,918,896, nearly eight millions. During the year ending February 1st, 8,115 policies were issued, $482,387 were paid in losses, on 201 lives, and $343,767 in dividends; its receipts for premiums were $2,381,954, and for interest on investments $556,608, making total receipts for the year, $2,938,562, nearly three millions. During the past four years, its interest on investments has been more than sufficient to pay the losses. The present officers of the Connecticut Mutual Life are, James Goodwin, President; Guy R. Phelps, Secretary.

Trimmings.—Mrs. Norcross, No. 5 Masonic Temple, Montgomery street, is prepared to fill orders for civic and military at the shortest notice; also, invites the ladies to call and examine trimmings for Opera Cloaks received per steamer from New York. Mrs. Norcross has a Show Case on exhibition at the Fair, containing goods which for elegance and taste are not surpassed by any other establishment on the Pacific coast.—San Francisco Leader, Sept. 16th.

Dr. C. W. Moore's Medical and Surgical Institute.—In speaking of this Institution, the Sunday Mercury says: "Aside from the most skilful treatment and nursing, the large, airy and elegantly-furnished rooms, will enable the patients to enjoy all the comforts and luxuries of a home. All in all, we regard Dr. Moore and his Institute a most valuable acquisition to the Pacific Coast—the need of which we have long since felt." See advertisement.

Many of the Diseases which hitherto baffled and defied the highest medical skill, are now speedily cured by Dr. H. A. Benton, whose processes of applying electricity receive the approbation of all prominent physicians. The nerves are directly reached, and patients suffering from chronic complaints find almost immediate relief, and rapidly recover their former healthy condition. Dr. Benton is a physician of excellent reputation, and as a Medical Electrician occupies the front rank in his profession.—Golden Era.

READ WHAT THE PRESS SAYS OF THE CALIFORNIAN.

The style is that of charming repose, easy address, and delicacy of perception. There are many original thoughts scattered throughout its columns; but the chief merit of the paper lies not so much in this as the thoroughly graceful style in which they are conveyed to the reader.—Call.

It will be found a welcome visitor in every house, and we wish it success. It is readable and interesting, and cannot fail making friends.—Alta.

The paper contains sixteen pages, is conducted with marked ability, grace and dignity, and presents a remarkably handsome appearance. It promises to become one of the best literary journals in the country.—Monitor.

In size and general appearance it resembles the New York Round Table. The contents, original and selected, establish the presence of editorial taste and the command of intellectual resources to insure a literary success, at least.—Sacramento Daily Union.

From what we have seen of its contents, we believe it will be a welcome visitor to the fireside. It is not of the wishy-washy, sentimental, sickly order of publications, but one which we hope Californians will be proud to recognize as one of the productions of our coast.—Marysville Express.

It presents a beautiful typographical appearance, and we may safely say is the neatest printed paper printed in California. It promises to be a popular and successful publication, and we add our quota of recommendation most cheerfully to this end.—Marysville Appeal.

The Californian is the best-looking paper ever printed in the State, and is well-filled with good reading matter.—Sacramento Daily Bee.

It is by far the handsomest journal of its character on the Pacific coast. The people of California are in need of just such a paper as the Californian.—Napa County Reporter.

It is in convenient form for binding, and we conclude the editor will make its contents sufficiently valuable for preservation.—Territorial Enterprise.

We have read its contents with considerable pleasure, for its originality and versatility are alike commendable. It will supply a void in literary circles, which has long been felt in the community.—Police Gazette.

The Californian seems to be receiving golden opinions from the press in all parts of the State, and from the specimen before us we are satisfied they are well deserved. It is evidently destined to fill a high place in the ranks of journalism on the Pacific coast.—Sonoma County Democrat.

We find it well filled with reading matter, original and selected, of the highest order.—Mountain Messenger.

The Californian is a high-toned literary publication, and of such a character as should receive a liberal support from the people of the Pacific coast.—Herald, Suisun.

We can assure our readers that the Californian is a first class literary and family journal, full of interesting matter and ably edited. It is established on a permanent basis, and Californians should take pride in extending its circulation.—Grass Valley National.

The Californian is a journal of high literary character, and will undoubtedly become popular.—Nevada Transcript.

It is the best literary paper published on the Pacific coast. The matter it contains is carefully prepared, well-digested, and worthy of perusal.—Nevada Gazette.

It is a handsome paper of sixteen pages, about the size of the Round Table before it was cut down, and not unlike that journal in character and scope. If such a journal can be sustained in California it is certainly a good token for the literary taste of the land of gold.—Boston Transcript.

It is enlivened with a vein of humor, that promises for it a position in the first rank of our native publications.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

A weekly journal, made up of editorial and selected matter indicating ability and excellent judgment.—Boston Post.

The paper is published in handsome quarto form, is very lively, and shows a disposition to redeem its promise to devote itself to the "best interests of California;" it deserves success.—N. Y. Eve. Post.

It contains an immense quantity of matter, selected with exquisite taste, varied, instructive, amusing, and always worthy of attention.—N. Y. Review.

Many of the above notices were given by our contemporaries during the publication of our first volume. With pride and pleasure we remark evidences of continued good will and approval in the columns of home and Eastern journals. No literary paper in California is copied by first-class Atlantic publications to one-tenth the extent that honors the CALIFORNIAN. By a firm adherence to the course we have hitherto pursued—fearlessness in condemning what we believe to be wrong (especially in regard to literary pretension where no merit exists,) by always preferring a good "selection" to an indifferent "contribution," by encouraging talent where it unmistakably has a germ, and utterly refusing to foist upon our readers the namby-pamby productions of brainless "space-annihilators," we feel confident we shall consult the wishes of the better class of readers, and that a rapid increase in its circulation will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to demonstrate the good taste of the people of the Pacific States.

RATES OF POSTAGE.

Valuable letters may be registered on application at the office of mailing, and the payment of 20 cents registration fee.

Transient newspapers, periodicals, blanks, proof-sheets, book manuscripts, pamphlets, and all mailable printed matter, except circulars and books, 2 cents for each and every 4 ounces. Double these rates are charged for books.

FLOWERS! FLOWERS!!

The attention of the Public is invited to

The Floral Repository,

Of C. B. MILLER, Bush street, opposite Cosmopolitan Hotel.

Mr. MILLER keeps constantly on hand the rarest and choicest flowers that the season or the market affords, and will furnish parties or private houses with floral decorations at the shortest notice. Bouquets made to order, and sent to their destination with promptness. Mr. Miller would invite attention to some curious specimens of the Orchis family which his collection affords, and he would be pleased to have a call from all lovers of Flowers, whether they wish to purchase or not.

"HOME, SWEET HOME!"

No home of taste is complete without Aquaria, Gold Fish, Birds, Fern Cases, new and rare Plants, Bulbs and Seeds, Cut Flowers and Bouquets for Weddings, Hanging Baskets, Rustic Stands, Shells, Minerals, etc.

A long experience at the East justifies Mr. Miller in promising to please the patrons who may favor him with a trial. He will also be happy at all times to furnish those who take an interest in flowers with any information relative to their care and culture that may be desired.

A NEW INVENTION!

LEWIS'S

Self-Acting Wagon Brake!

By means of this invention, the wheels of a wagon are made to lock themselves when going down hill, certainly and effectively, and are released the moment there is any strain on the horses, without attention on the part of the driver.

It is already in use in many parts of the East, and has everywhere given satisfaction.

It will lock a wheel so that it CANNOT REVOLVE, the efforts of the wheel to turn making the lock tighter.

It operates in an instant, locking or unlocking as necessary.

It needs no care and requires no exertion,

It cannot fail to work, and is easier on the team than the common brake.

Simple in its construction, and costing no more than the common lock, it gives perfect security, and a child may drive the heaviest wagon over the steepest roads.

It can be used in the same way as the common hand or foot brake: A touch on the lever will effectually lock the wheels, and

RUNAWAYS ARE IMPOSSIBLE.

JUPITER AND SQUARZA.

[AFTER BON GAULTIER.]

"TAKE away this clammy nectar!"
Said the king of gods and men;
"Never at Olympus' table
Let that trash be served again.
Ho, Lyæus, thou, the beery!
Quick—invent some other drink;
Or, in a brace of shakes, thou standest
On Cocytus sulphury brink!"

Terror shook the limbs of Bacchus,
Palely grew his pimpled nose,
And already in his rearward
Felt he Jove's tremendous toes;
When a bright idea struck him—
"Dash my thyrsus in the lunch!"
For you never were in Frisco,
And you know not Squarza's Punch!"

"Bring it!" quoth the Cloud-compeller;
And the wine-god brought the liquor—
"Campagne and nectar are nought to it!
Bring me more, Bac.! come, be quicker!"
And Saturnius drank and nodded,
Winking with his lightning eyes;
And amidst the constellations
Did the star of SQUARZA rise!

TO THE LADIES OF CALIFORNIA.

IT IS A FACT, which all should know, that

Washing may be Done for Half the Cost,

and in half the time, required by pursuing the method now in use. An enormous waste of time and materials attends the old and ordinary process. And this is not because a better method is not known, but because housewives persist in treading in the beaten track followed by their mothers and grandmothers before them, opposing every change, and refusing even TO MAKE A FAIR TRIAL of those new inventions which scientific research has produced.

If the housekeepers of San Francisco and of the State will try the

California Washing Extract,

simply by way of experiment, they will be amazed to find how much unnecessary labor may be saved by its use. It may be obtained at all the principal Groceries of the city, or in quantities of the Agents, HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN.

The use of the EXTRACT renders "rubbing," "pounding," "washboards," and all the severe drudgery of the usual method quite unnecessary. It thoroughly cleanses, without injuring the clothes. In short, it works such wonders as no one will credit without witnessing them. All that the inventor asks of any doubting housewife is

A SINGLE TRIAL.

The following certificate from the State Assayer, furnished after an analysis of the EXTRACT, speaks for itself:

A. A. ENQUOIS—Dear Sir: I have examined the sample of liquid handed me, and find it free from acid or any substance that would be injurious to clothing.

Very respectfully, B. B. THAYER.

HAMLET—Act III., Scene 2.

NOTHING enlarges the mind so much as foreign travel. We appreciate the truth of this oft-repeated statement. We have returned with an enlarged mind from the city of Oakland, During a stay of some fifteen hours in that delightfully verdant town, we endeavored to gather as many facts as possible, bearing on the manners, customs, and amusements of the inhabitants. Perhaps, the most pleasing feature is the religious air of the denizens of Oakland: they are moral in a high degree; the pale cast of thought is visible on each brow; a profane bust is utterly unknown. The Oaklanders indulge in dissipation, but it is religious dissipation. The religious excitement of the last two weeks was a Methodist marriage, which our informant, who, we fear extremely, was a vessel of wrath, observed, "drew the best house of the season." One can scarcely account for this ceremony causing excitement; there was but little of romance about the affair; the bridegroom was a stalwart son of toil—his name was Smith. The fact, however, that Methodists are in the habit of performing their marriage ceremony, like other good deeds, in secret, may in some measure explain why this marriage, which was solemnized in the full blaze of gas-light, attracted a full congregation The religious store-keepers of Oakland are not without their trials. Last year, the proprietor of one of the chief hotels took in a minister to board: the ungodly aver, for the purpose of attracting a religious class of customers to his house. This year, he has opened a grog-shop, which is termed the "Gospel Grog Shop" by the unholy ones of Oakland, and, sad to say, the spirits denominated "brandy," "rum," "gin," and "whiskey" have attracted more customers than the spiritual out pourings of the minister. We only state this exception to prove the rule that Oakland is a gracious place. An enlightened place, after dark, it is not. The Broad-way which leadeth many to destruction, by the liquid snares which are set in gaily-colored bottles, to tempt those who are athirst to imbibe, is ablaze with gas; but the sylvan shades are left in utter darkness, without even a glow-worm to guide the traveller on his way. A Sabbath stillness pervades the streets of Oakland, even at mid-day; and naught disturbs the holy calm, save the church-going bell, which calls the inhabitants from their homes, to take a slight lunch of spiritual food—to refresh their souls amid the cares of business; or the loud clanging dinner bell, pealing forth a summons, which reminds them to take care of their poor perishable bodies. Our impression of Oakland is, that it is a dull, but virtuous city; if evil deeds are committed, they are kept shady in the primeval forests. Better far to be dull than sinful.

THE telegraph brings news that Arrah-na-Pogue is forbidden to be played in any part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Some people say this is an act of tyranny towards the Irish on the part of the English Government. They don't understand the motives which influenced it. The fact is that the suspension of the performance of this play by law is an act of kind consideration on the part of the Government for the feelings of the Fenians. "Michael Feeny" is such a villainous character that it was feared that the Fenians might think it a reflection on their founder; besides, the rebellion on which some of the scenes of Boucicault's drama are founded, was pretty effectually squelched, and the thought of that might make the Fenians uncomfortable. We think the English Government deserves great credit for its consideration. It is not right to make fun of Irish rebellions.

MANY ill-natured things have been said in the Californian about the correspondents of the Alta. In consequence of this, it is the more incumbent on the MOUSE-TRAP to see that jus ice is done, and true genius acknowledged. The following we clip from the Mattole correspondence of the paper in question:

"Oh! the awful earthquake, my senses are bewildered! See the crooked trace of my pen and the blotted ink, for the shock rolled me upon the desk, and the heavy weight of my inclination broke my pen upon the paper. It is just nine o'clock, Sunday morn, the first day of October. I wonder if it reached you, certainly I hope not, for such a terrible shock would demolish half the buildings of brick in San Francisco. Everybody rushed out of doors into the middle of the streets—there aghast they stood—palsied, as it were, for a moment, with protruding eyes, watching the reeling houses, in expectation of their sudden crash to the ground. The sinking feeling and the relaxing and fluttering pulsation, and the weakening tendencies which at that fearful moment seized the human form, language is inadequate to portray. The most stubborn heart was made penitent in a moment, for the great day of His wrath was thought to have come. I am now beginning to recover my senses again."

That correspondent understands his business. That "crooked trace of my pen and the blotted ink" show art. Imperfect—but still art. It presupposes that the correspondent was, at the instant the shock occurred, seated at his table, engaged in writing a description of the earthquake about to take place, for the Alta. The letter is earthquakey throughout: "It is just nine o'clock, Sunday morn, the first day of October. I wonder if it reached you." There are two distinct sharp, jerky shocks, to give the impression that the correspondent was too much shaken to write connectedly. It is a powerful description; the harrowing picture drawn of the inhabitants of a whole city standing, "palsied as it were, for the moment, with protruding eyes," is a marvel of word printing. This earthquake reporter says: "the weakening tendencies which at that fearful moment seized the human form language is inadequate to convey." His language shows signs of weakness here. How could he wind up this thrilling description by expressing his conviction that the most stubborn heart could be made penitent, in a moment, by an earthquake, and then coolly say: "I am now beginning to recover my senses?" We doubt if even the Reverend Doctor Scudder, who differs with us and the Home Missionary as to the holiness of the city of San Francisco, and thinks missionaries are needed here, would be content to see these missionaries come in the form of earthquakes. We do not believe in sudden conversions. We are inclined to believe that a stubborn heart would be more thoroughly softened by rheumatic gout than by an earthquake. Our hypothesis is sustained by the experience of this correspondent. The earthquake had scarcely ceased, and yet he was beginning to recover his senses, or, in other words, his heart, temporarily softened by the earthquake, was beginning to harden again. If an earthquake will soften the most stubborn heart, may not it also have a similar effect on the head?

WE admire genius wherever we see it. The proprietor of the Willows has a full appreciation of the power of words. On the occasion of Mlle. Rosa Siegrist's walking the tight-rope, the American Flag devoted half a foot of nonpareil to proving that the feat was a humbug. The Flag pronounced it an infamous fraud upon the public, as, if the little girl fell she would probably not suffer more severe injury than a broken arm or leg, the rope being only twenty-five feet from the ground. The proprietor of the Willows, instead of following the example of some managers, and publishing half-column "cards," explaining that the girl was a delicate girl, and, consequently, a slighter fall would kill her than one more robust, and assuring the public that he would on the next occasion of the performance of this female funambulating feat, arrange that the rope should be imperfectly secured. and thus, by increasing the chance of a fatal accident, compensate them for the base fraud perpetrated on them by placing the rope at the moderate height of twenty-five feet from the ground, did better. He did not offer to give an extra dangerous performance for the benefit and satisfaction of the American Flag; no, he simply inserted the two simple lines in the Call:

"The manager of the Willows does not advertise in the Daily American Flag. Nuff ced."

There is true eloquence. A volume in two lines!

THE "Fenian Sisterhood" gave a ball at St. Louis on September 12th. The Fenian sisters do not, we understand, intend to fight; their mission is to be sisters to the Fenian brothers. Miss Ann Jane Mooney is the Directress of the sisterhood—they acknowledge no mistress. General Blair, in trying to make a complimentary speech, put his foot into it, he said:

"'He did not claim to be an Irishman—only about half a one, but when the time came he would say, let the 'Finnegans' go for them.' At this point of the General's speech, a stentorian voice yelled out, 'That is wrong, Blair; our name is Fenian, not Finnegan, as some try to ridicule us.'"

We don't see anything ridiculous in the name of "Finnegan." Finnegan is a good name—a much better name than Feeny. Success to the Miss Finnegans of the Fenian Sisterhood!

ONE of the morning papers of this city in one of its amusement notices, remarked that Bandmann was an Anglo-Germanic Tragedian, and had made but one step from the German to the English stage; that is to say, he laid down the use of his native tongue and took up the foreign language without any sort of trouble or difficulty, in fact, so adept was he in the use of the English words—understood so well their meaning—that he came upon the boards and spoke "Shakspeare" like a "native." A great many people—who mean very well by the by—doubt the statement of the morning paper. They imagine Bandmann breaks his English horribly; and that "Hamlet's" famous soliloquy on Death would proceed from his mouth somewhat in the following style:

"Too be, or not too be, dat ees de gwestion;—
Vetter teesh better in de mind too sooffer
Der schlings unt arros ofe utrageous fortun;
Or too dake aarms against a sea of trubbles,
Unt by opbosing ent dem? Too die,—too schleep,—
No more:—unt by a schleep too say we ent
Der haart ache unt der tousand natural zhocks
Dat vlesh ees heir too—teesh a gonsummation
Devontly too be wished; too die—too schleep—
Too schleep, parechanuce too dreem, ay, deres der rub,
For in dat schleep of det, what dreems may com,
Ven we half shuffled off dis mortal coil,
Musht gif us paws. Dere ees de respee
Dut maks calamity ofe so long life;
For who would bear der whips unt scons ofe time.
Der oppressor's wrong—der proud man's contumely,
Der paungs ofe dispise lof—der law's delay,
Der eensolence ofe offeece, mit der spurus
Dat pasheut merit ofe der unwordy dakes,
Ven he heemself might hees quietus mak
Mit a bare bodkin? Who vould faardels bear,
Too grunt unt schvet unter a weary life,
But dat der dret ofe someting after det,
De undiscovered gountry, from whose bourn
No trabbler returns—puzzles der weel;
Unt maks us drader bear doze eels we half,
Dan phly to odders, we uix for stay!"

It is entirely a matter of supererogation to inform people that their idea of Bandmann's style of reading is erroneous. He reads not only fluently but elegantly, wonderfully, powerfully, free from the marring influences of a native education in the German tongue. If the people aforesaid are still inclined to be skeptical, let them go and hear him with their own ears.

WE really hoped when we noticed that the Alta had by dead-heading a really clever fellow to New York on his way to England secured his services as a London correspondent, that its English news would in future be correct; but, alas! if there is the slightest possibility of making an error, the Alta will do so. In its issue of Tuesday last it publishes the following statement of facts which is likely to inflict an incalculable injury on the dentists of this and every other city: "A dentist has been fined in London for pulling the wrong tooth." This is perfectly untrue, a dentist has not been fined in London for pulling the wrong tooth. The facts in the case are these: a dentist sued a man for payment for services rendered, namely, the extraction of a tooth; the defendant refused payment of the bill on the ground that the dentist had extracted a sound tooth instead of the one which ached; he put in a sworn statement to this effect, and the dentist was non-suited. The Alta ought to be aware that criminal proceedings could not be instituted on such grounds as those which it alleges. There is no law against pulling a man's teeth at his own request, and consequently a mistake of this character does not constitute a crime liable to punishment by fine or imprisonment. We rely upon the Alta's sense of justice, and trust that it will immediately publish a full retraction of its incorrect statement concerning the extraction of this tooth which it published to the detraction of the dentist, and explain that the substraction of a sound tooth by mistake, instead of an aching one, which nearly drove the patient to distraction, which the dentist found not, did not cause him to be fined.

A MORNING paper which is noted for the reliability of its statements regarding theatrical matters, says of Madame Anna Bishop: "Her appearance was the signal for earnest applause, which was prolonged for ten minutes, and repeated at every subsequent part of the concert." The reporter omits to state that Madame Anna Bishop went behind the scenes, and, bringing out a chair, sat down during the "ten minutes" the audience were applauding her, which would be equally true.

THE country papers are exercising their pens in abusing Gottschalk as a "foreigner," and sneering at the popularity "foreign professors" achieve in San Francisco. As Gottschalk is a full-blooded American citizen, having been born in New Orleans, the point of these remarkable efforts of genius is lost.

TREM.

A GUEST FOR THE NIGHT.

THIRTEEN years ago this very month—I am not likely to forget the date of the event I am about to describe—I lived in a quiet respectable street in the Faubourg Schaerbeek, in Brussels, and I was a student of the Hospital de St. Pierre, attending lectures there, and studying medicine, with the full conviction that I could never make a surgeon while I lived. A constitutional horror of blood, and a reluctance to approach a dead body, which no amount of use had been able to weaken, were sufficient indications that Nature had not destined me for the profession to which I found myself devoted. Why I continued to listen to lectures from which I scarcely carried away a single fact, and to read books upon which I strove in vain to fix my attention, is not necessary to be told here. It is enough to say that I saw no escape; that my fate had willed that I should be a surgeon, or nothing. All this made me, after awhile, gloomy; then reckless; then gloomy again. I had taken to painting—first, as an amusement, and then with the hope of becoming a painter. But what was there left of faces or landscapes unpainted in the land of Teniers—that laborious genius who would sketch and finish a picture between dawn and bedtime. I saw that I was born in too late an age. I had ventured upon literature, and failed. I had devoted myself to chemistry for a while; had almost discovered a new way of staining glass a brilliant ruby; but something balked me in the moment of success. This was the history of all my attempts. I resolved to be careless of the future; took to cultivating geraniums, playing on the pianoforte, and reading metaphysics.

The house in which I lived was an old Flemish mansion with two wings, and a wall; a row of trees hiding it from the street. My sitting-room was so wide and lofty, that no number of candles on the table at night would drive the darkness out of the corners. Half the rooms in the house being invariably empty, the lodge-keeper had offered me this, at a rent little exceeding the rent of a garret in England, and my fondness for geraniums contributed to decide me to accept his offer; for the folding window of the room opened on to the flat leads of the porter's house, and in this space I determined to make a flower-garden.

It was on an afternoon late in the autumn; there had been rain nearly all day; the sky was still dark with clouds, and the air was so cold that I had lighted my fire. I had been out walking upon the leads, plucking the yellow leaves from my geraniums, and enjoying the sweet scent of leaf and blossom washed in the showers. The crimson of their flowers looked brighter than usual, and the silvery drops of rain hung on the hair of their stalks, and on the tips of their leaves. "What need," thought I, "to strive for distinction, when so slight a thing serves to delight me?" But, as I stepped up into my room again, a shadow came over my happy mood, and I thought of all that had been said by poets and others about the man who lives alone and dies unloved. There was my neighbor, Vandermere, who had just bid me "good day" from his window; I used to chat with him sometimes, when out attending to my garden, for one of his rooms opened also on to these leads on the opposite side. He, too, was a painter, and had begun to study, with thoughts of rivalling the greatest masters; had married and got a family; had given up all dreams of fame, content to copy pictures for his customers in the Museum; which, to do him justice, were hardly distinguishable from the originals. He did not talk of disappointed hopes. If ever there a happy man, he was one. "Domestic life," said I, "is the true consolation for the disappointments of ambition. It is a wife that I want." But of all my discoveries, this was the most impracticable, for half-a dozen reasons; all so powerful that if I could have removed any five of them, the remaining one would have made marriage at that time utterly impossible to me.

I walked to and fro, and then stood at the window; against which a long branch of the vine, blown from the side of the house, was tapping as the wind lifted it up and down. Drops of rain were swept down from the edges of the roof with every gust, and the sky was growing darker. Vandermere, the painter, had gone from his window, and his light had disappeared. Altogether the aspect out of doors was by no means cheering to a solitary man.

Neither was there anything cheerful in the aspect of my great room. My chemical apparatus and my easels reminded me of time thrown away in efforts lost, because abandoned too early. I considered my past career, and found it all unprofitable. Six months previously I had given up some dissipated companions, and determined never again to visit a gaming-table, for which I had begun to feel a kind of inclination. Yet what progress had I made since? My spirit was less; for my hopes, which were new then, were now worn out. My future was more aimless than ever. I knew that my mind required employment, but I lacked resolution to apply myself to anything. I could think of no occupation that might serve to amuse me that evening. I took out my case of instruments, polished them for awhile, and then shut them up, and flung them away. Even my old favorite author, the Count Xavier de Maistre, could not help me. I could do nothing but sit in my low elbow-chair before the fire, and dream away the time.

A circumstance which had happened some months before, and of which I had not lately been thinking, coming suddenly into my head without any apparent cause, led me to meditate upon the manner in which ideas are connected in our minds. I strove to trace this idea back, from link to link. But so secret and rapid are the operations of the mind, that I could in no way trace the recollection to its origin.

Yet remembering that the most trivial circumstances will sometimes give rise to a train of thought, leading us by circuitous ways—though with the swiftness of light—to ideas which have no apparent relation to those from which we started, I fancied that some object near me, some noise, either of the wind or the rain that was beginning to beat again upon the window, or of voices which I might have involuntarily noted—or that the time and situation in which I found myself, or even the weather—might be in some way connected with this reminiscence; and taking several of these things in succession, I amused myself by diverging from each by every chain of association which my fancy could suggest, in the hope that I should thus discover in what way this circumstance had been brought into my mind.

I had been long absorbed in these solitary reveries, when I became aware that I had been unconsciously uttering some of my reasonings aloud. The sound of my own voice startled me, as if it had come from another part of the room. The solitude and stillness to me, awakening from my dreaming mood, impressed me with a strange, uneasy feeling. It was quite dark. I could not distinguish my piano, my easels, or my paintings on the wall; until the log upon the fire, suddenly bubbling and sending out smoke, caught in a jet of flame, lighted the room a moment, and went out. After that, I sat with my face resting on my hands, looking down into the fire, and wondering at the stillness in the house. I listened for some minutes, and could hear no one speaking or moving in any of the rooms, or any footsteps on the stairs. Once I heard laughter at a distance, where a door had been opened; but the door was shut again instantly, and I heard it no longer. I had but lately recovered from an illness, and my physical weakness made me feel more strongly the loneliness of my situation. Strange notions, such as at other times I should have laughed away, held my mind with the power of realities. I fancied that I heard a stealthy footstep creeping up near me; and, next, that some one was standing close behind my chair. So impressed was I with the latter fancy, that at last I sprang upon my feet; and, turning round, stretched out my hand to assure myself that I was mistaken. Nor was it until I had struck the burning logs with the tongs, and made a flame which lighted the room, that I could entirely banish these notions. Wondering that I could be so moved by such imaginations, and led by my pride to think of moments when I had found myself not wanting in courage in the presence of real danger, I sat down again, and watched the fire—playing on the wood, and gradually diminishing, until only one little flame was left hovering on the tip of a wreath of smoke—going out and coming in again, until it was finally extinguished, and only thin clouds of smoke and steam were left to trail up the wide chimney. I stirred the logs again until they were burnt through, and watched them until, covered with an ash, the red glow sank into the crevices made by the fire. Then the current of my thoughts seemed to lose itself—absorbed into vacancy, like a rivulet in the sands—and I sat idly looking at the dark hearth.

It was just at this moment that I was aroused by a tapping at the door. I had fancied that I heard it once before; but having previously heard no footsteps mounting the stairs, I had concluded that I was mistaken. I felt for my lamp upon the table, and hastened to light it before answering the summons. While I was vainly endeavoring to blow the last spark into a flame, the tapping was repeated more loudly, and I proceeded to open the door in the dark.

"Who's there?" I exclaimed, seeing no one on the dark landing.

"It is I," said a voice. "You will scarcely have expected me."

"M. Falck!" I said; for I recognized the voice. "This is very remarkable."

The unexpected visit of this man, connected as he was with the subject of my previous reveries, reminded me of stories of people who have supposed themselves visited by persons they have known; and have even held long conversations with the objects of their imagination. I had always disliked him. Many months before, I had parted from him in anger, and had not met him since. He had never visited me at home at any period; and I could not imagine his object in coming to me now.

"You have something to say to me, M. Falck?" I asked.

"Let us have a light," said he, "and I will explain."

"Bidding him come in and shut the door, I struck a light, and set my lamp upon the table. My visitor flung himself upon a chair, and threw back his cloak, which was half-saturated with the rain. He was so strangely changed since I had last seen him, that, but for his voice, I should not have felt sure that it was he. His face was thinner and paler; his eyes were rimmed and sunken; a slight baldness had increased so much that his forehead seemed to have doubled in height. Such hair as he had was closely cropped, and his beard and moustache were shaved off.

"You would not have recognized me in the street?" he said, catching my eye upon him.

"I think not," I answered.

He passed his hand over his forehead, as if at a loss to continue; and then added, abruptly:

We parted on bad terms, the last time we were together."

"We did."

"You must not think anything more of that. I have no heart to rake up old quarrels now. I come to you, to ask a shelter to night, because I have not a friend of whom I care to ask it; and it does not suit me to seek a lodging among strangers. I am not the man you knew me once. I have had a run of misfortune for some time—not in play only, for I never was a thorough gambler—everything has gone wrong. I am a broken man; broken in purse, and broken in spirits, or I would not come here to ask you to shelter me, this rough night. Honorine—You knew Honorine?"—

"Your wife?"

"Aye: you might call her so," he continued. "Never did a man love a wife more tenderly; or treat one with more kindness, while he had means—"

He paused for a moment; then, as if he had forgotten what he was about to say, applied his hand to his forehead again; and sat thus, for a few seconds, looking down.

"Yes," he continued. "Never mind now. When, at all hours and times, by night and day, a certain thing haunts you, it is natural to talk about it, and to forget that your affairs do not interest others as they interest yourself."

"You seem in trouble," I said, as soothingly as I could.

"Yes," he answered, "things were desperate enough before the crowning misfortune came. People will say it is my own fault. Perhaps it is. But I never saw life as I see it now. Accident set me on the wrong road before I knew the difference between right and wrong; and one thing and another served to push me on the same way. It is hard to get out of old habits. If I had to begin life again, I would act differently. But the lessons of experience come too late to be of any use. And yet there is no mercy for errors; though it is often hard enough, amidst all the hubbub of opinions in the world, to find the right—especially for a young man. He goes on sometimes blundering, and growing familiar with evil, until his sense is blunted, he excuses everything, and cannot bring himself to believe that he is become what the world calls a scoundrel." His tone and manner were so abject that I could not help pitying him. Perhaps my previous loneliness made me feel a satisfaction in any kind of companionship. I saw that he was suffering from some recent misfortune, and I attributed his self-accusations to the tone of despondency thus wrought in his mind. I even reproached myself with my old antipathy to him, and thought how few men would bate each other, perhaps, if the minds of all were laid bare.

"Come," I said, "let us not look at troubles until we are half blinded. Turn away from them to-night, and to-morrow you will see your way the clearer."

"I am worn out, Valentine, said he. "This is no thing of to-day nor of yesterday. I have held up, and have kept a careless outside, with such things in my heart as would have driven any other man mad: but I cannot hold up any longer. I have been hunted about like a runaway slave—turning this way and that—and finding myself baulked on every side. I have determined," he said, rising up suddenly, "to be hunted no more."

"Well, said I, "no more of this now. Let us make a fire and be cheerful this stormy weather."

Casting on some additional logs, and fanning the embers until they ignited and began to blaze, I sat down, and bade him also bring a chair up to the fire.

"I am as wet and cold as a dog's nose," said he, spreading his hands over the blaze.

"You have been in the country," I remarked, seeing some clay upon his boots.

"I have walked some ten leagues to-day. This rainy, windy, weather is enough to blow and drench a man's life out of him; and the cloudy sky wears upon my spirits, as if I were buried alive in lead."

"You have only just returned to Brussels?"

"I arrived here this afternoon from Paris, and have been walking about the muddy streets ever since, to no purpose. I thought I had a friend or two here; but I find I have not! It is my own fault. I chose my own acquaintances, and might have known what they would be to me, when such a time as this should arrive. Yet," he continued, looking at the fire, "there was one from whom I hoped something better. Never mind now! After the conduct of Honorine, I need not have looked for honesty in the world. This friend never lived under my roof, as she did, for years—sharing my prosperity, and swearing every day that it was all for love of me. May she die in a hospital!"

Several times I essayed to divert our conversation into new channels, but he invariably returned to the same subject; and at length I let him speak on without interrupting him. After a while his anger seemed to have spent itself, and he lapsed into a silence, which lasted for some minutes.

"I am poor, Falek," said I, pulling out my purse—

"No," he said, stopping me with a motion of the hand; "it is not money I want. If you will give me a shelter to-night, I will promise never to trouble you any more. This is as much as you, or any man, can do for me now."

I would have asked him more particularly the nature of his troubles, in the hope of being able to advise or assist him; but his abrupt manner and manifest irritability restrained me. I determined to wait and see whether this would pass away. I watched him as he sat with his back turned to the lamp, and noticed the changes of expression in his features, corresponding to the succession of thoughts in his mind; and, giving way again to my fanciful mood, I interpreted them in my own way, until I had built up a theory of his misfortunes, satisfactory to myself. At length, the singularity of his manner, and his long silence, took so strong a hold upon my mind, that I began to feel his presence irksome and to repent of having admitted him. The recollection that I had been unaccountably led to think of him, when sitting alone; and to call to mind the manner in which we had last parted; the words he had used, and how in the height of my passion I had threatened him in a public room; coupled with the fact of his being now actually sitting before me; perplexed me anew. Wilder fancies than any I had had before followed each other swiftly through my mind like the blood globules in the veins. He seemed to my imagination, after looking intently at him for some time, to begin to grow taller, and then gradually to shrink to his original form again, like the Afrite before the fisherman. The fire-light beginning to flicker, gave to his features the appearance of a succession of strange grimaces, which annoyed me. I would gladly have invented some means of getting rid of him—but it was already late, and I could hear the rain still falling out of doors.

"Will you eat anything, Falek?" said I, seeking a pretext for breaking the silence.

"If you have a glass of Schiedam," he said, "or anything that would raise a man's spirits—"

"A bottle of Rhine wine?" I said, rising from my chair to fetch it.

My visitor nodded assent; and I set the bottle before him. Hastily filling a goblet, he drained it off. "You will drink with me?" said he. "Let us have another glass. This has a good rough smack with it that feels honest. Drink! I think I will take your advice, and ponder no more on troubles to-night. Let us be merry. Play me some of the lively melodies of 'Le Nozze,' or 'Il Barbiere.' Yet no," he added abruptly, "music makes me thoughtful, no matter how lively. Have you a set of dice?"

"I have determined never to gamble," said I.

"So have I. You cannot have better reason to hate a dice-box than I have. Don't think I want to gamble. Let our stakes be pebbles, if you will. I want to pass an hour or two lightly."

Yielding to his explanation, I searched for and found my dice; and my visitor and I seated ourselves facing each other at the end of the table in the middle of the room, and began to play.

"Did ever gamester have such luck!" he exclaimed, after several throws. "I might have won a fortune to-night. Strange! I knew a man—a Russian—in Darmstadt, who would play for nothing, and beat all the world; and yet, if he staked a kreutzer, anybody might win it from him. Again! Tell me—for you have a turn for thinking—do you fancy I might have gone elsewhere and thrown the same casts?"

"Numberless minute things contribute to the result of every throw," I answered; "as, for example, the position of your arm, the number of times you have shaken the box, the force with which you cast the dice, the roughness or smoothness of its edges, the angles at which they strike the table. Any of these things might have been modified at any other moment. The simplest result is connected with a chain of causes running back to all eternity; and the slightest derangement in any link of them might have prevented it."

"True," replied my visitor. "Let us drink another glass, and throw again."

"The game does not interest me," I said.

"Very well: I will play against myself, for an experiment. See, my luck holds nearly the same. And yet I have sometimes been 'throwing out' a whole night. Diable! I could knock my head against the wall."

My visitor, at this point, cast down the dice-box violently: walked to and fro muttering: then returned to the table, and began to throw again. Sitting facing him, in an easy chair, I watched his movements, listening to his exclamations, and the quick rattle and click of the dice, until I began to feel sleepy. I resisted my drowsiness, however, for some time; for I felt a kind of fear of falling asleep while he sat there. But the influence of the wine I had drunk, and the monotony of sounds, drew me gradually into slumber: the light of the lamp began to glimmer, the face of my companion became like many faces, the rattle of the dice-box followed me as I sank into wild and painful dreams, and became wholly oblivions of time and place.

I have since so often recalled the events of that evening, that no single circumstance or shade of thought then passing over my mind has faded from my memory, after thirteen years. I slept for several hours, and remember distinctly what I was dreaming of when the chilliness of the room began to awaken me. A sensation of coldness penetrated into my dreams; I became conscious of some external power gradually drawing me out of my slumber; and I instinctively resisted it, clinging to sleep to the last. But the recollection of where I was slowly returned, with a comfortless sense of a dark fireless room, and a depression of spirits. My eyes opened gradually, and, although the lamp was extinguished, I saw, by the faint light of the window, the countenance of my companion staring intently at me from the opposite side of the table. His arms were lying upon the table, and his chin resting upon them; his eyes were almost on a level with mine, as I sat in the low chair. The idea that he had been about to attack me, and that, while closely scrutinizing my features to see if I were asleep, he had been suddenly arrested by my eyes opening, struck me in an instant, and I started to my feet.

"What!" I said, "sitting awake, without fire or light?"

My companion did not answer.

"Brooding over troubles again?" I continued, in an assumed tone of raillery. "Forgetting that you are in the dark, and how cold it is?"

He still kept silent, and without making the slightest movement.

I stooped down to the hearth and raked the embers with a match; they were mere ashes. Taking my lamp from the table, I struck a light and endeavored to ignite it; but the wick was burnt away, and the oil exhausted. The match going out, left me again in darkness. I called my companion by name, without arousing him. With a dread of going nearer to him, I stood undecided. "He is in a fit; it may save his life to bleed him," said I, temporising with myself. "I will search for my lancets," and I groped my way about, and felt among my apparatus for some time, before I remembered having left my case upon the table before cleaning them.

Then came a conviction that my visitor had destroyed himself. I hastened to arouse the house; but stopped suddenly, and closed the door again, for the idea that I might be accused of murder occurred to me. Under different circumstances I might at once have rejected such an apprehension; but, weakened by long illness, depressed by previous excitement, and overwrought by superstitious fancies, I saw it almost as a certainty. I knew how ingeniously the law will sometimes turn the slightest evidence against the accused, and I recollected the unhappy circumstance of my having threatened him with vengeance, in the presence of many who, no doubt, remembered the fact.

I approached the table again. There was just sufficient light to distinguish an object quite close; and as I went near to him upon the side next the window, I saw immediately the truth of my suspicion. He had inflicted upon himself a deep wound in the side of the neck; and his arms sinking on the table, his chin had fallen upon them, in the attitude in which I had first seen him. I found my instrument-case upon the table; and, raising him slightly, I discovered one of my lancets open in his hand. His face and hands were cold. Setting him up in the chair, I felt for his pulse, and found it stopped.

In this terrible situation, and while still sustaining him in my arms, the danger which threatened me presented itself so vividly that I became half paralyzed. The previous quarrel, the instrument being my property, the wound itself being of an unusual kind, and such as one only acquainted with surgery would be supposed to inflict—all this seemed to me evidence sufficient to convict me. How many murders have been committed from apparently weaker motives? A murder is in itself a monstrosity in the history of humanity, and supposes in its author a man not governed by common principles of reason. Is the folly of the act ever taken as an argument of innocence? Most men, judging from their own natures, as they are accustomed to do in ordinary matters, would decide every murder to be improbable; but they know, notwithstanding, that such crimes are frequent, and will readily believe them, however unnatural. These were my thoughts as I stood there at that moment. But I had unconsciously added a sign of guilt still more to be feared than I had considered: in my agitation I had taken no care to avoid contact with blood; and I now discovered that one of my cuffs was wet, and I did not doubt that there were traces of blood on other parts of my clothes.

To give an alarm now, and, agitated as I was, to maintain the truth of my strange story, seemed in my imagination to be certain destruction. My fear urged me irresistibly to fly. I did not know what was the hour: the glimmer of light might be the first indication of dawn, or the light of the moon behind the clouds. My wild intention was to select as many necessary articles as I could carry, to lock my door, and to depart at once, in the hope of reaching the frontier on foot, and getting next perhaps to England, where I could learn the result of the discovery of the body.

But, in that moment, as I stood hesitating, I suddenly felt that the window was darkened; and, looking round, I saw with terror, at only a few yards distance, the figure of a man, intently watching me through the glass. I could not be mistaken: for the sky behind made his outline distinctly visible. He remained still for a moment, then moved from one side to the other, as if trying to ascertain what object I concealed behind me: but, in spite of my alarm, I moved slightly each time to right and left, in order to intercept his view. I suspected that it was my opposite neighbor, the painter; but the figure seemed taller than his; and I could not imagine any reason he could have for looking through my window at that hour. Whoever it might be, I could scarcely doubt that his suspicions were aroused by something that had attracted his notice. He might have been there some minutes before I observed him; perhaps he had seen me leaning over the body, with the instrument in my hand. I knew that it was difficult, from without, to distinguish anything in a dark room; but, if he had seen nothing, how could I account for the evident eagerness of his scrutiny?

The figure stood still again; then, I saw it apparently listening; lastly, I heard it tap sharply with its nails upon the glass. With the faint hope that I had not been seen, I determined to remain still. The tapping was repeated after a minute or two; but soon after, to my great relief, I saw the figure disappear down the steps leading to the leads.

The idea that the man was gone to give an alarm and to have me arrested, struck me with the force and the suddenness of a musket bullet. I went to the window and looked out, but I could see no one, nor any light at the opposite house. Finding that the sash was unfastened, I drove in the pin-bolt that hung at the side, and pulled down the blind. Then I changed my coat for another, and seizing a stick only, took the key away, and crept down stairs. Crossing the square yard, I called, in a voice as unlike my own as I could make it, to the porter to pull the string of the gate; which the inhabitants of the house were accustomed to do, sometimes at late hours. The door opened, and, without looking behind me, I closed it after me and hurried away.

The clocks were striking three as I hurried along the Boulevards. A man at the Barriere de Hal asked me where I was going. I said I was a surgeon, and that I was called to attend a patient outside the Barriere; and he let me pass. I hoped to reach Valenciennes across the frontier. I walked all night, and rested in the morning at a little village near Bramé. After this, I was compelled to avoid the high-road, and to lose much time by circuitous routes; for I knew that my flight had increased my danger tenfold. What story could I tell now, if I were taken; when, to the supposed evidences of guilt which fate had accumulated against me, were added the facts that I had precipitately quitted my lodging in the night, leaving all my property behind; that I had given a false story at the Barriere; and that I had since been hastening, on foot, towards the frontier? It was no use regretting, then, my indecision in not avowing the truth, and trusting to my innocence. I knew that I had staked all upon the chances of escape, and that was my only hope of safety.

I had lost so much time in going out of my way, that it was not until the third day that I crossed the frontier, and passed Valenciennes without going through the town. On the fourth day, having arrived at Arras, much wearied with my day's walk, and tempted by curiosity to see some newspaper, and ascertain if it contained any allusion to my flight and its cause, I decided to abandon my usual prudence, and to enter the town. It was dusk, and I kept in narrow streets until I found a small cabaret. I entered and asked for some refreshments. A noisy party of men in blouses were playing at dominoes as I came in; but they ceased their game and regarded me with a scrutiny that made me repent of my rashness. I took my seat in a corner alone, and afterwards timidly asked for the latest newspaper—glancing over at the men in blouses to mark if my request attracted their notice; but they were all intent upon their game. The paper was the Gazette du Nord, a French journal. Keeping it beside me, for a moment, with a dread of betraying my intense curiosity, I unfolded it at length, and ran my eye quickly down its columns.

Glancing at the items entitled "Various Facts," I stopped immediately at a paragraph headed, "Suicide et disparition mystérieuse," and tremblingly read as follows:

"On Friday last, the Sieur Louis Claes, Concierge of the house No. 6, Rue Renaix, Faubourg Schaerbeek, Brussels, knocking at the door of a lodger named Valentine, residing on the first floor, was surprised to find that he had not yet risen, although it was past mid-day. At a later hour he became alarmed, and procured a false key to open the door. On entering the room, a terrible spectacle presented itself. Seated on a chair near the table was the dead body of a stranger, covered with blood from a wound in the neck. A sharp surgical instrument, spotted with blood, was upon the table. Searching in the pockets of the deceased, it was ascertained that his name was Falck, and other clues to his identity were obtained. Nothing else remarkable was found. There were no evidences of a struggle; but from the mysterious absence of the lodger, suspicion fastened upon him. The Concierge remembered the deceased's inquiring for M. Valentine on the previous evening, and having directed him to his room. He also remembered letting out some one at a late hour, whom he supposed to be the same person, but who was now imagined to have been the lodger. M. Vandermere, an artist residing in the next house, stated that he was a friend of M. Valentine; that he had seen him at his window on the evening in question; that he had observed a light in his room after midnight: and that his (M. Vaudermere's) daughter happening afterwards to complain of illness, he crossed the leads leading to the chamber of M. Valentine (who was a medical student,) for the purpose of asking his assistance; that he then found the light gone, and could distinguish nothing in the room; that he next tapped at the window, and receiving no answer, concluded that his friend was absent. This was at half-past two o'clock in the morning. The supposition of murder has, however, since been disproved, by the discovery that the deceased had addressed a letter to a friend in Brussels, on Thursday, informing him of his intention to commit suicide that night. Losses at the gambling-table, and the dread of apprehension for a forgery committed in Paris, are supposed to have led to the act. The cause of the disappearance of M. Valentine, however, is still enveloped in mystery."

It was not enveloped in mystery long, I thank God; for, with my heart lightened of my heavy load, I returned and made my statement. But I never more ate, drank, or slept, in that terrible room.

A CAPITAL STORY.

SOME years since, an eccentric old genius, whom we will call Barnes, was employed by a farmer living in a town some six or seven miles westerly from the Penobscot river. Me., to dig a well. The soil and substratum being mostly sand, old Barnes, after having progressed downward about forty feet, found one morning, upon going out to work, that the well had essentially caved in, and was full nearly to the top. So, having the desire which men have, of knowing what will be said of them after they are dead, and no one being yet astir, he concealed himself in a rank growth of burdocks by the side of a board fence near the mouth of the well, having first left his frock and hat upon the windlass over the well. At length, breakfast being ready, a boy was despatched to call him to his meal, when lo! and behold! it was seen that Barnes was buried in the grave unconsciously dug by his own hands. The alarm being given, and the family assembled, it was decided to first eat breakfast, and then send for the coroner, the minister, and his wife and children. Such apathy did not flatter Barnes' self-esteem a bit, but he waited patiently, determined to hear what would be said, and see what was to be seen.

Presently, all parties arrived and began "prospecting" the scene of the catastrophe, as people usually do in such cases. At length they drew together to exchange opinions as to what should be done. The minister at once gave it as his opinion that they had better level up the well and let Barnes remain; "for," he said, "he is now beyond the temptation to sin, and in the day of judgment it will make no difference whether he is buried five feet under the ground or fifty, for he is bound to come forth in either case." The coroner likewise agreed that it would be a needless expense to his family or the town to disinter him when he was effectually buried, and, therefore, coincided with the minister. His wife thought that, as "he had left his hat and frock, it would hardly be worth while to dig him out for the rest of his clothes," and so it was settled to let him remain. But poor old Barnes, who had no breakfast, and was not at all pleased with the result of the inquest, lay quiet until the shades of evening stole over the landscape, when he departed to parts unknown.

After remaining incognito for about three years, one morning he suddenly appeared (hatless and frockless as he went) at the door of the farmer for whom he had agreed to dig the unfortunate well. To say that an avalanche of questions were rained upon him as to his mysterious reappearance, etc., would convey but a feeble idea of the excitement which his bodily presence created. But the old man bore it all quietly, and at length informed them that, on finding himself buried, he waited for them to dig him out again, until his patience was exhausted, when he set to work to dig himself out, and only the day before succeeded, for his ideas being somewhat confused by the pressure of the earth at the time he was buried, he had dug very much at random, and, instead of coming directly to the surface, he came out in the town of Holden, six miles east of the Penobscot river.

No further explanations were asked for by those who were so distressed and sorrowful over his supposed final resting place.

THE "buoy," which is reported to have been seen near the supposed unfortunate end of the Atlantic cable, was doubtless the "old boy," to whom the submarine wire has probably gone.—Nevada Transcript.

OBITUARY.

THOMAS BRIDGES, Esq., Fellow of the Linnean and of the Zoological Societies of London, in returning from a scientific expedition to Nicaragua, died on the passage of the steamer Moses Taylor on the 9th September.

Mr. Bridges was a native of Hertfordshire, England, and was in his fifty-ninth year. Few, if any, more useful lives have passed away as martyrs to science during the present century. At an early day, Mr. Bridges devoted himself to the exploration of Chile, Peru, and Bolivia, collecting new and valuable plants, and transmitting them to his native country. The works of Sir William Hooker bear evidence of the research and industry of Mr. Bridges, not only in this vast field, but also at Panama, in California, and in British Columbia. As a botanist, he will be remembered and honored, not simply as a discoverer, but as a rich contributor to the parks and forests of Europe, by his thousands of arboreal monuments erected therein in the form of sequoia gigantea, and other noble and graceful trees introduced through his agency. In Bolivia he encountered that magnificent water lily, the then unknown Victoria regia, and secured the seeds which subsequently germinated at Kew Gardens, near London. In the Botanical Magazine, of 1847, is an account of the finding of this magnificent aquatic, by Mr. Bridges; he says: "During my stay in the Indian town of Santa Anna, in June and July, 1845, I made daily shooting excursions in the vicinity, and on one occasion I had the good fortune, while riding along the wooded banks of the Tacuma, a tributary of the Mamore, to arrive suddenly at a beautiful pond, or rather small lake, embosomed in the forest, when, to my delight and surprise, I descried for the first time the queen of aquatics, Victoria regia! There were at least fifty flowers in view, and Belzoni could not have been more enraptured with his Egyptian discoveries than I was, on beholding this beautiful and novel sight, which few of my countrymen can have witnessed. Fain would I have plunged into the lake to obtain specimens of the flowers and foliage, but the knowledge that these waters abounded with alligators, and the advice of my guide, deterred me. I turned over in my mind how I could secure these treasures, and I clearly saw that a canoe was necessary. Therefore, I promptly returned to the town, and, communicating my discovery and my wishes to the corregidor, or governor, he kindly sent Indians with a yoke of oxen, for the purpose of drawing a canoe from the River Yacumna to the lake. As soon as it was ready, I set off, accompanied by several Indians, to aid in bringing home the expected prize of leaves and blossoms. The canoe was so small that it would carry but three persons—myself in the middle, and an Indian at either end. In this tottering little craft, we rowed among the magnificent flowers and foliage, unavoidably crushing some, and selecting only such as pleased me. The leaves were so enormous, that but two could be stowed in the canoe—one before me, and the other behind. Their fragility rendered extreme care necessary, so that we had to make several trips in the canoe before I could obtain as many as I wanted. The load of blossoms, leaves, and ripe seed-vessels, being collected, I next mused how they might be safely carried away, and I decided upon suspending them upon long poles, by small cords attached to the stalks. Two Indians, each bearing on his shoulder the end of a pole, conveyed them into the town, the poor creatures wondering the while why I should take so much trouble to get at flowers, and for what object they were destined by me. The Victoria grows in from four to six feet of water; each plant generally sends up but four or five leaves to the surface. Yet, these cover the water in those parts where the plant abounds, touching one another so closely, that I observed a beautiful aquatic bird (Parra sp.) walking with perfect ease from leaf to leaf; and many of the muscicapadæ find food and a resting-place upon them. Except a few small water plants, among which I noticed a beautiful Utricularia, the Victoria usurps the entire possession of the lake. Its blossoms rise about half a foot above the surface of the water, and expand first in the evening; they are then pure white, but they change by exposure to the sun to a most lively pink or rose color. Flowers may be seen at the same time partaking of every intermediate tinge: the recently opened being white, and the adult rosy; the latter almost sinking under the water to ripen the seed, and produce a new race of plants, when required."

The honor of the first discovery of the plant lies between Baron Schomburgk and Mr. Bridges, but the latter must be accorded the credit of introducing it into the civilized world.

The subject of the obituary was not limited to this one department. Every branch of Natural History has been enriched by his energy and careful study. Works on ornithology, entomology, and conchology, are filled with acknowledgements of his contributions to these various sciences. His papers in the Zoological Proceedings of London, on "Quadrupeds and Their Habits," show an earnest and careful appreciation of this branch of study.

With a cultivated mind, and a kindly and most generous disposition, he could not fail in making warm friends, who could appreciate his merits. To these, we must in part attribute the faithful attendance and kindly sympathy awarded him in his last illness among comparative strangers. Captain Blethen of the Moses Taylor, and his officers, are entitled to the thanks of the whole community for their kind offices to the deceased. His remains were brought here, and interred in Lone Mountain Cemetery. C. B. M.

SCENE 3.—Home of Mrs. H. Lewis.

Enter ASHLEY.

Ashley—There is no food in the house, and I am dismissed. Good heavens how virtuous I am!

Enter EBURNE.

Eburne—I have stolen a watch from Phillips.

Ashley—(decisively)—That was wrong.

Eburne—Shall I give it back?

Ashley—Yes, I will write you a confession. (Writes him a confession.)

Eburne—(putting confession and watch into Ashley's pocket)—The deed is done! (Exit Eburne.)

Enter MRS. LEWIS.

Mrs. Lewis—My son!

Ashley—I am ruined because I would not tell a lie!

Mrs. Lewis (with some acerbity, for she never intended her moral precepts to be acted on to such an extent as this)—Oh, you were perfectly right. Never tell a lie. Oh, dear no! Not on any account.

Enter PHILLIPS and OFFICERS.

Phillips and Officers—Seize the culprit! (They seize poor Ashley.)

Ashley—What have I done?

Ph. and Off.—You have stolen this, and here is your confession. (Handing out watch and confession,)

Ashley—Horrible! Mother, I am innocent!

Mrs. Lewis (by the kind permission of Paul Bedford)—I believe you, my boy. (Embrace. Audience laugh.)

THE LAMENT OF THE BALLAD-WRITER.

AIR—"JUST BEFORE THE BATTLE, MOTHER."

NOW the battle 's over, mother,
And your tears no longer start,
Really, it is my opinion
You and I had better part;
Farewell mother, if forever,
Your affection I resign;
Gone the days when just your blessing
Brought me fifty cents a line.

Farewell, oh, Maternal Fiction!
Thou whose far parental sigh
Home has brought the youthful soldier
Time and time again to die;
Farewell mother, you may never,
In the future, peaceful years,
Bring a sob from private boxes—
Steep a dress circle in tears.

Farewell, oh, thou Gentle Sister!
Thou who in my cunning hand
Didst deliver pious sermons,
Mild, inocuous, and bland;
Never more for thee I 'll borrow
Moral sentiments to preach,
Nor shall "morrow" rhyme with "sorrow,"
In thy bitter parting speech.

Farewell, oh, devoted Maiden!
Thou, who for thy country, true,
Sacrified not only lover,
But thy Lindley Murray too;
Incoherent was thy logic,
Wild and vague thy words, I fear,
Yet the pit would still encore thee,
And the galleries would cheer.

Farewell, all ye facile phrases,
Gags and sentimental cant!
Names that took the place of ideas—
Sherman, Sheridan, and Grant;
Gone the days when school-boy jingles
Took the place of manly talk,
When the "thought that breathed" was puffy,
And the "word that burned"—burnt cork.

Just before the battle, mother,
Then my cheapest figure told;
While the rebel stood before us,
Then my glitter looked like gold.
Now this "cruel war" is over,
All inflated things must fall;
Mother dear, your boy must beneeforth
Write sound sense or not at all.

A POISON RING.—The following story is going the rounds of the French papers: A gentleman who had purchased some objects of art in the Rue Ste. Honore, was engaged in examining an ancient ring, when he gave himself a scratch in the hand with the sharp part of it. He continued talking with the dealer for a short time, when he suddenly felt an indescribable seusation over his whole body, which appeared to paralyze all his faculties, and he soon became so seriously ill that it was considered necessary to send for a medical man. The doctor immediately discovered every symptom of poisoning by some mineral substance. He applied some strong antidotes, and in a short time the gentleman was in a measure recovered. The ring in question having been examined by the medical man, who had long resided in Venice, was found to be what was formerly called a "death ring," in use in Italy when acts of poisoning were frequent, about the seventeenth century. Attached to its inside were two claws of a lion made of the sharpest steel, and having clefts in them filled with a virulent poison. In a crowded assembly, or in a hall, the wearer of this fatal ring, wishing to exercise revenge on any person, would take their hand, and, when pressing it, the sharp claw would be sure to inflict a slight scratch on the skin. This was enough, for, on the following morning, the victim would be snre to be found dead. Notwithstanding the many years since which the poison on the ring had been placed there, it retained its strength sufficiently to cause great inconvenience to the gentleman, as stated.

TASTE FOR GARDENING.

IT is difficult to conceive of either an elegant or happy home which has not at least some extent of garden attached. It would doubtless be a libel on the character and capabilities of the inhabitants of our towns to say that without the help of a garden it is impossible to cultivate chaste ideas and refining feelings; but it is certain that the more we are called into the green world about us, and invited to the observation and culture of things that grow and change with the seasons, the more do our minds expand in the appreciation of what is true and good and beautiful, and the better traits of our humanity expand and by degrees obliterate whatever harshness and asperities may lurk within us. In fact, none but the most sordid and abandoned are utterly destitute either of a garden or the best substitute that can be had for one. Where the necessities of life compel men to immure themselves in the midst of "The dust and din and steam of town,"

we find a hundred devices resorted to, to keep the soul freshened in the thirst for something living to lavish its love upon. Flowers in pots, boxes of mignonette, Wardian-cases, aquariums, pet birds and animals, are severally adopted to ignore the eternal brick and dust and noise that are so foreign to the innate love of life and beauty, and these are cherished because they continually remind their fond possessors of the larger life that lies beyond them in the region of tangled woods and garden.

Now, though it would not be fair to say that a tasteful home cannot be created, except in the vicinity of a garden, it is certain that a garden is a very essential feature of such a home. It has always been so; for at the birthday of the world, "the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he had formed:" and "The Lord God took the man and put him into the garden of Eden, to dress it and to keep it;" for until this first of men and first of gardeners received "into his nostrils the breath of life," "there was not a man to till the ground."

So far, then, from the tilling of the ground being a special part of the curse of the fall, it was from the first an occupation sanctioned by Divine command; and though man's highest duty was to love and worship the Father of all things, he was nevertheless made to till the ground, created ab initio a gardener. Nor did the Almighty spare his mercy when the fall brought on "the mau" a merited punishment. The joy of gardening was still vouchsafed to him, and the eternal penance of himself and his race was to be tempered mercifully; for when he went forth from the garden of Eden, his first sweet task was renewed to him, to till the ground, from whence he was taken.

"To deck the shapely knoll
That, softly swelled and gaily dressed, appears
A flowery island, from the dark green lawn
Emerging, must be deemed a labor due
To no mean hand, and ask the touch of Taste."

[Cowper.

Through every succeeding period of human history, the culture of plants has taken prominence among the sober occupations as well as among the amusements of mankind, and this "iron age" finds a strong contrast to its harsh commercial tendencies in the increasing love of flowers and the expansion of taste in their arrangement and cultivation. Gardening is now one of the completest of the arts, for it is an art as well as a pursuit, subject to rules as definite as those which control its sister arts of painting, sculpture, and poetry, and to which, indeed, it furnishes innumerable materials, and acts at once as nurse, teacher, and standard of comparisou. Cowper says:

"He who would see his flowers disposed
Sightly and in just order, ere he gives
The beds the trusted treasure of their seeds,
Forecasts the future whole; that when the scene
Shall break into its preconceived display,
Each for itself, and all as with one voice
Conspiring, may attest his bright design."

LOCOMOTIVES FOR THE CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.—We understand that the Pacific Railroad Company have four freight locomotives now on the way to California, called Utah, Nevada, Humboldt, and Truckee, and have four more in process of construction at the East, in addition to the one in San Francisco, which is nearly completed. Orders have been sent East for four others. When all these come to hand the company will have twenty locomotives ready for work. They are thus preparing for the next season's business, which will undoubtedly be very large, as the road is far enough up the mountains to secure the over-mountain freight, and will be still farther eastward by the commencement of travel in the Spring.—Sacramento Union.

A TEMPERANCE lecturer, descanting on the essential and purifying qualities of cold water, remarked as a knock-down argument: "When the word had become so corrupt that the Lord could do nothing with it, he was obliged to give it a thorough sousing in cold water." "Yes," replied a toper, "but it killed every darned critter on the face of the earth."

WOMAN, AS SEEN BY WOMAN.—A beauty unmade-up, in bed of a morning, is thus described by a new novelist in London Magazine: "She turned her head suddenly on the pillow, and burst into a harsh jeering laugh. 'Miss,' she repeated over and over again, with the venemously-pointed emphasis of the most merciless of all human forms of contempt—the contempt of one woman of another." * * * "Mrs. Milroy turned slowly and wearily on her bed, when she was left by herself again, and let the light from the window fall on her face. It was the face of a woman who had once been handsome, and who was still, so far as years went, in the prime of life. Long-continued suffering of body, and long-continued irritation of mind, had worn her away—in the roughly-expressive popular phrase—to skin and bone. The utter wreck of her beauty was made a wreck horrible to behold, by her desperate efforts to conceal the sight of it from her own eyes, from the eyes of her husband and child, from the eyes of even the doctor who attended her, and whose business it was to penetrate to the truth. Her head, from which the greater part of the hair had fallen off, would have been less shocking to see than the hideously youthful wig by which she tried to hide the loss. No deterioration of her complexion, no wrinkling of her skin, could have been so dreadful to look at as the rouge that lay thick on her cheeks, and the white enamel plastered on her forehead. The delicate lace, and the bright trimming on her dressing-gown; the ribbous in her cap, and the rings on her bony fingers, all intended to draw the eye away from the change that had passed over her, directed the eye to it, on the contrary; emphasized it; made it, by sheer force of contrast, more hopeless and more horrible than it really was. An illustrated book of the fashions, in which women were represented exhibiting their finery by means of the free use of their limbs, lay on the bed from which she had not moved, for years, without being lifted by her nurse. A hand-glass was placed with the book so that she could reach it easily. She took up the glass, after her attendant had left the room, and looked at her face with an unblushing interest and attention."

ASTOUNDING AERIAL FEAT.—Our city was startled from its usual composure yesterday afternoon by a most astonishing aerial feat, performed by a member of the Buislay family. A balloon ascension and trapeze performance in the air had been previously announced, but had been postponed on account of bad weather. Yesterday afternoon it was announced that the ascension would be made at about four o'clock, from the vacant lot at the northeast corner of Sixth and L streets. Before the hour named an immense crowd of men, women and children collected in the neighborhood, filling sidewalks, balconies, windows and the open space surrounding the balloon. The balloon, which was about thirty-three feet in diameter, was made of colored cottou canvas. For the purpose of inflating it, it was sustained in an upright position by a rope run from one pole to another, at a distance of about forty feet from the ground. Heated air was used for the purpose of inflation, instead of the usual element, gas. Acronauts generally ascend in a basket or car, which affords a comparatively safe and comfortable resting-place during the ride; but August Buislay seemed to regard such a fixture as a useless appendage, and had provided nothing of the kind. The only appendage visible was the trapeze, which consisted of a single wooden bar, about two inches in diameter and thirty inches in length, suspended horizontally and sustained by a cord or rope at each end attached to the balloou. Buislay prepared for the ascension by divesting himself of all his clothing except his "tights," evidently designing to keep himself warm by physical exercise, rather than through the temperature of the atmosphere in the upper regions. Between four and five o'clock the word was given and the lines were cast off. As the balloon rose up a feeling of horror ran through the audience, as Buislay rose with it, holding on to the bar with his two hands. While many shouted at the top of their voices, others gazed in breathless suspense. As the balloon rose, Buislay commenced his astonishing performances on the bar, with as much freedom and fearlessness as though he had been in a gymnasium or circus. At one time he hung by his hands; then by his feet; then balanced on the bar; then revolved around it. At one time he poised himself on it and struck out with arms and legs, as though swimming. He continued these exercises until he attained the height of about a mile, when his form became so indistinct that his movements were scarcely perceptible. The balloon ascended nearly perpendicularly, as there was scarcely a breath of wind stirring. It soon began to descend, and the adventurer lit again about two blocks from the starting point, coming down in the yard of a house on the south side of L street near Fourth. He had been in the air about fifteen minutes. The Buislay troupe are natives of France. They have made repeated ascensions in Europe and South America, but never in the United States before. There are ten of them, and each in turn makes his ascension and performs on the trapeze. A collection was taken up by them when the balloon was in the air.—Sacramento Union, October 4th.

WAGNER'S "TRISTAN AND ISOLDE."

THE LIBRETTO.

THIS Libretto, in small octavo, 110 pages, was published in 1859, in Leipzig, by Breitkopf and Hartel. From a severe review of it by Prof. L. Bischoff, which appeared at that time in the Lower Rhine Musik-Zeitung, we take the following abstract of the plot :

In the very first scene, as in Tannhauser and Lohengrin, Wagner gives evidence of his great talent as a stage-manager and scenic artist. The stage represents the forecastle of a ship—a tent-like apartment, closed at the back by curtains. Isolde is lying on a sofa with "her face buried in the cushions." Near her is Brangane, her confidante. The song "of a young seaman is heard in the air, as if from the mast." The sailor yearns for his "Irish child," and at once gives us a specimen of the poetic bombast, and the mis-use of the German language, which we meet all through the poem.

Isolde now starts up, and, cursing the coast of Cornwall, on which she would willingly never land, implores the winds to dash the vessel to pieces. On her expressing a wish for air, Brangane opens the curtains at the back, and thus exposes to our view the entire deck to the stern of the vessel, with the sea, stretching to the horizon, beyond it. Around the mast are stretched the crew, and behind them, knights and squires. At a slight distance from them is Tristan, gazing down on the sea, while his companion, Kurwenal, is lying at his feet. The song of the young sailor is again heard from the mast. This is admirable! Well merited applause cannot fail to be obtained by this scenic effect.

Isolde now despatches a message, couched in the peculiar and exceedingly eccentric German of the "Future," for Tristan to come to her. He refuses, however, very politely, to accede to her request, and kindly seizes the occasion to inform us that he is conducting her, as a bride, to King Marke. But Kurwenal, who, it would seem, is not so refined in his manners, answers the bearer of the message, Brangane, rather coarsely, or, to use a familiar expression, sends her back "with a flea in her ear." Besides this, "he sings after the confidante, as she hesitatingly leaves, with all his strength," a sarcastic ditty on a certain Morold, deceased, who once entered the lists for Isolde, and was killed by Tristan.

Brangane returns to the forepart of the vessel, and draws the curtains close. Isolde, "on the point of the most fearful outburst," restrains herself, and questions her attendant The latter replies, in the eccentric lingo to which we have already alluded, that Tristan would rather be excused. Hereupon Isolde tells her that Tristan is the same "party" who killed her betrothed, Morold, and then fell into her hands. The sword which menaced him she, however, let fall, and cured his wounds, that he might be restored to health, return home, and not annoy her any more with his presence. In return for all this, Tristan, she goes on to inform us, expressed his gratitude and swore fidelity to her, and recommended her to King Marke as a wife. This slight narrative takes up eighty lines! Hence her hatred, her torment :

> "Unbeloved, this man of men > Always near so see!"

The "unbeloved" applying to Isolde, and not to Tristan.

Brangane represents to her mistress that the match with King Marke is a very good one after all. With regard to Tristan's dreaded coldness, the faithful maid observes that she is sure there must be some remedy against it among the potions which Isolde's mother, who is skilled in all magical arts, has given them!

But Isolde selects from the "shrine," or, in other words, her family medicine-chest, a drink of death. She determines to pledge Tristan in this, and perish with him. As the vessel is now approaching the shore, she sends for him to share the "draught of reconciliation." After a long dialogue, spiced with dialectical beauties, and inextricably entangled in a labyrinth of constructions, compared to which the most crabbed unintelligible style of ordinary writers is a clear crystal stream—on what is past, and on the reconciliation which is, in consequence, needed, Isolde imperiously commands Brangane to fill the golden goblet with the fatal potion, and hands it to Tristan. He drinks. As, however, he does not fall down dead, Isolde exclaims : "What! treachery here, too? The half is mine! Traitor, I drink to thee!"

Upon this, Wagner favors us with the following : ("She drinks and flings away the goblet. Both, seized with affright, gaze, with the greatest emotion, but with fixed glance, and without moving, into each other's eyes, in the expression of which the defiance of death soon gives way to the glow of love. They are seized with a fit of trembling. They put their hands convulsively to their hearts, and then pass them over their foreheads.—They next seek each other with their glances. They cast down their eyes confusedly, but, afterwards, fix them with increasing desire on each other. ISOLDE (with trembling voice) : Tristan!——TRISTAN (gushingly) : Isolde!——SHE (sinking on his breast) : Faithless beauteous one!——HE (encircling her with warmth) : Most blessed woman! (They remain in a dumb embrace.")

Trumpets are heard without. The vessel has reached the land, and King Marke approaches. The curtains are suddenly drawn on one side. The deck is filled with men. At the back is a new scene : "The coast, with a castle crowning the summit of the cliff." The lovers, who have just sung a duet, concluding : "Joy in the breast | exultant pleasure! | Isolde! Tristan! | Tristan! Isolde : | Rescued from the world! | Thou art won for me!" start up, and Isolde exclaims : "Ha! what draught was this?——BRANGANE (in despair) : "The love draught."——Isolde faints, and the sailors cry : "Hail to the king!" Great tumult and activity ; some disappear over the side, some run out on a bridge. What will happen when the king comes on board?——That is a mere trifle——"The curtain falls rapidly," and certainly it was high time it should.

During the space between the acts, all has settled calmly down again. Isolde is King Marke's wedded wife. In the second act, we behold her, in the garden before her chamber, with Brangane. It is a pleasant summer's night. Hunting sounds, that die away. They come from a "nightly hunt," to which the king is proceeding with Melot, his own friend and Tristan's.

Tristan is awaiting the signal agreed on : the extinguishing of the torch burning at the entrance to the garden. Brangane warns her mistress against Melot's treachery : "O, leave the warning wick! let it show you the danger! O, do not put it out to-day, at least!" It is all in vain! Isolde's glowing passion conquers, and she extinguishes the torch. Brangane mounts a watch-tower behind the scenes.

Tristan "rushes in"—"glowing embrace." Both now pour out their hearts, by speaking or singing their feelings, at one time in the form of a duet and then in solos, to a text of one-and-twenty pages, uninterrupted save by a short cry of warning from Brangane (behind the scenes) of thirteen lines, during which a "long, silent embrace, with heads sunk backwards," on a flowery bank, is prescribed, in the stage directions, to the lovers.

This long, lyrical scene is, in every respect, so unpleasant and disagreeable as to be actually disgusting. The sentiments and language are artificial and stilted, and, when this is not the case, immeasurably flat and common-place. The affectation of old German terms is as repulsive as the abuse of the language is offensive. The toying with antithesis of "far" and "long," "near" and "far," of "day" and "night," in which love pours out all its pretty sayings for seven dreary pages, in order to calumniate the day and exalt the night (the lovers call themselves "Night-hallowed,") the playing with the "sweet wordlet and" ("Is not our love called Tristan and Isolde?") the everlasting subtleties, surpassing in emptiness and vapidity the most insipid poetical scribbling of the later troubadours, the forced ornamentation and affected artificiality of thought—all this is not only incapable of supplying the deficiency of real feeling and imagination, but absolutely shows it in the most glaring light. All this is presented, moreover, in a form so unshackled and slovenly that it is distinguished from the most insipid prose only by the employment of rhymes generally trivial, frequently false, and, here and there, consisting of mere assonances. Every page offers proof of what is now asserted.

The "one-conscious" lovers, as Wagner terms them, are disturbed by the king and his retinue, conducted to the spot by Melot. Isolde feels ashamed "involuntarily ;" Tristan stretches out his cloak, "also involuntarily" (sic!) before her. Marke, an honest old fellow, first proves dialectically to Melot that the latter is mistaken if he supposes his advice has saved the royal honor, for the "freest deed (!) of Tristan's" truth has touched his heart. He now, for the first time, addresses Tristan : "To me—this? this, Tristan, to me?" Hereupon he favors him with a mild sermon of four pages, concluding with the question : "Why this disgrace to me?"

Tristan, "in whose mien there is perceptible gradual-increasing grief" (indeed?), answers very poetically : "O, King, that—I cannot tell you." He then asks Isolde whether she will follow him into the "magic realms of night," appending to his query four lines which are unintelligible to ordinary mortals. Isolde answers in the affirmative, with similar mysterious circumlocution. Good old Marke says nothing, but Melot bursts out. "Tristan rushes on him. As Melot stretches out his sword against him, Tristan lets his fall, and sinks down wounded. Isolde flings herself on his breast, while Marke holds back Melot—the curtain falls rapidly.

The third act shows us the garden of Tristan's castle. The sea is visible over the wall. "A plaintive pastoral tune is heard on a shepherd's pipe."

Tristan is lying, as if without life, on a couch. His faithful Kurwenal—who, by the way, is the only characteristically treated figure in the whole drama—has conveyed him to the place, and now stands behind him. He has, also, despatched a trusty sailor "to the only physician-ess that is of any good." Tristan awakes. His honest companion does all he can to make Tristan recognize his home, but Tristan's thoughts are roaming in other regions. "I was where I always have been, whither I go forever—where only one knowing is ours : divine-eternal, ever-forgetting!" The poor "day," of course, comes second best off again." Kurwenal announces to the enthusiastic dreamer that he has sent for Isolde. This rouses him up, but, as the shepherd boy still continues playing upon his pipe the mournful strain—as a sign that no bark is visible—Tristan relapses into his melancholy fit, and, what is more, faints. But he recovers : a merry strain is heard. "The ship! the ship!" He is unable to contain himself. Isolde approaches. Even while behind the scenes she exclaims : "Tristan! beloved!" He springs up : "how do I hear the light!" (!) rushes into her arms, and sinks, lifeless, at her feet.

This scenes takes up in the book twenty-three pages, the rest extending over eleven more. It will, we should say, be a rather tough job for the singer, since Tristan is not, like Taunhauser, in the last act, shattered merely internally, but bodily wounded to the death. The narrative, too, in Tannhauser, possesses more variety and interest than the dreamy, mystical expression of one and the same sentiment, although Wagner has, with a certain amount of skill, endeavored to relieve the monotony by the sounds of the shepherd's song, and, also, by making Kurwenal observe and describe, from the watch-tower, the course of the vessel, and the danger it runs from the rocks that line the shore.

Isolde's grief bursts forth : the mode in which it is expressed is pervaded by a strain of real feeling and true poetry. She falls, in a fainting state, upon the corpse.

"Tumult and clashing of weapons heard from the shore below." King Marke, having landed, forces his way up. Behind the scenes the voices of Brangane and Melot. Kurwenal, placing himself at the castle-gate (at the back,) cuts down Melot and rushes on and informs her that she has confessed to the King "the secret of the drink," and that he has come to renounce her and give her in marriage to Tristan! The good old Marke, also, speaks a few words, which commence with his favorite mode of address : "Why, Isolde, why this to me?" In conformity with Wagner's dramaturgical code, he resigns himself to a miracle, to magic, but it is too late. Isolde listens to all that is said, without taking any interest in it, and breathes out her soul in a state of enthusiastic clairvoyance, which concludes as follows :

> "In the joy-sea's
> Surging swell,
> In the fragrance-billow's
> Resounding tone,
> In the world's-breath's
> Waving all—
> To drown—
> To sink—
> Unconscious—
> Supreme bliss!"

"She sinks, as though transfigured, upon Tristan's corpse. Great emotion and transport among the bystanders ; Marke blesses the bodies. The curtain falls slowly."

THE GHOST-RAISER.

MY Uncle Beagley, who commenced his commercial career very early in the present century as a bagman, will tell stories. Among them, he tells his Single Ghost story so often, that I am heartily tired of it. In self-defence, therefore, I publish the tale in order that when next the good, kind old gentleman offers to bore us with it, everybody may say they know it. I remember every word of it.

One fine autumn evening, about forty years ago, I was travelling on horseback from Shrewsbury to Chester. I felt tolerably tired, and was beginning to look out for some snug wayside inn, where I might pass the night, when a sudden and violent thunder-storm came on. My horse, terrified by the lightning, fairly took the bridle between his teeth, and started off with me at full gallop through lanes and cross-roads, until at length I managed to pull him up just near the door of a neat-looking country inn.

"Well," thought I, "there was wit in your madness, old boy, since it brought us to this comfortable refuge." And alighting, I gave him in charge to the stout farmer's boy who acted as ostler. The inn-kitchen, which was also the guest-room, was large, clean, neat, and comfortable, very like the pleasant hostelry described by Izaak Walton. There were several travellers already in the room—probably, like myself, driven there for shelter—and they were all warming themselves by the blazing fire while waiting for supper. I joined the party. Presently, being summoned by the hostess, we all sat down, twelve in number, to a smoking repast of bacon and eggs, corned beef and carrots, and stewed hare.

The conversation naturally turned on the mishaps occasioned by the storm, of which every one seemed to have had his full share. One had been thrown off his horse ; another, driving in a gig, had been upset into a muddy dyke ; all had got a thorough wetting, and agreed unanimously that it was dreadful weather—a regular witches' sabbath!

"Witches and ghosts prefer for their sabbath a fine moonlight night to such weather as this!"

These words were uttered in a solemn tone, and with strange emphasis, by one of the company. He was a tall dark-looking man, and I had set him down in my own mind as a travelling merchant or pedlar. My next neighbor was a gay, well-looking, fashionably-dressed young man, who, bursting into a peal of laughter, said :

"You must know the manners and customs of ghosts very well, to be able to tell that they dislike getting wet or muddy."

The first speaker giving him a dark fierce look, said :

"Young man, speak not so lightly of things above your comprehension."

"Do you mean to imply that there are such things as ghosts?"

"Perhaps there are, if you had courage to look at them."

The young man stood up, flushed with anger. But presently resuming his seat, he said, calmly :

"That taunt should cost you dear, if it were not such a foolish one."

"A foolish one!" exclaimed the merchant, throwing on the table a heavy leathern purse. "There are fifty guineas. I am content to lose them, if, before the hour is ended, I do not succeed in showing you, who are so obstinately prejudiced, the form of any one of your deceased friends; and if, after you have recognized him, you allow him to kiss your lips."

We all looked at each other, but my young neighbor, still in the same mocking manner, replied :

"You will do that, will you?"

"Yes," said the other—"I will stake these fifty guineas, on condition that you will pay a similar sum, if you lose."

After a short silence, the young man said, gaily :

"Fifty guineas, my worthy sorcerer, are more than a poor college sizar ever possessed; but here are five, which, if you are satisfied, I shall be most willing to wager."

The other took up his purse, saying, in a contemptuous tone :

"Young gentleman, you wish to draw back?"

"I draw back!" exclaimed the student. "Well! if I had the fifty guineas, you should see whether I wish to draw back!"

"Here," said I, "are four guineas, which I will stake on your wager."

No sooner had I made this proposition than the rest of the company, attracted by the singularity of the affair, came forward to lay down their money; and in a minute or two the fifty guineas were subscribed. The merchant appeared so sure of winning, that he placed all the stakes in the student's hands, and prepared for his experiment. We selected for the purpose a small summer-house in the garden, perfectly isolated, and having no means of exit but a window and a door, which we carefully fastened, after placing the young man within. We put writing materials on a small table in the summer-house, and took away the candles. We remained outside, with the pedlar amongst us. In a low, solemn voice he began to chant the following lines :

"What riseth slow from the ocean caves
And the stormy surf?
The phantom pale sets his blackened foot
On the fresh green turf."

Then, raising his voice solemnly, he said :

"You asked to see your friend, Francis Villiers, who was drowned, three years ago, off the coast of South America—what do you see?"

"I see," replied the student, "a white light arising near the window; but it has no form; it is like an uncertain cloud."

We—the spectators—remained profoundly silent.

"Are you afraid?" asked the merchant, in a loud voice.

"I am not," replied the student, firmly.

After a moment's silence, the pedlar stamped three times on the ground, and sang :

"And the phantom white, whose clay-cold face
Was once so fair,
Dries with his shroud his clinging vest
And his sea-tossed hair."

Once more the solemn question :

"You, who would see revealed the mysteries of the tomb—what do you see now?"

The student answered in a calm voice, but like that of a man describing things as they pass before him :

"I see the cloud taking the form of a phantom; its head is covered with a long veil—it stands still!"

"Are you afraid?"

"I am not!"

We looked at each other in horror-stricken silence, while the merchant, raising his arms above his head, chanted, in a sepulchral voice :

"And the phantom said, as he rose from the wave,
He shall know me in sooth!
I will go to my friend, gay, smiling, and fond,
As in our first youth!"

"What do you see?" said he.

"I see the phantom advance; he lifts his veil—'tis Francis Villiers! he approaches the table—he writes!—'tis his signature!"

"Are you afraid?"

A fearful moment of silence ensued; then the student replied, but in an altered voice :

"I am not."

With strange and frantic gestures, the merchant then sang :

"And the phantom said to the mocking seer,
I come from the South;
Put thy hand on my hand—thy heart on my heart—
Thy mouth on my mouth!"

"What do you see?"

"He comes—he approaches—he pursues me—he is stretching out his arms—he will have me! Help! help! Save me!"

"Are you afraid, now?" asked the merchant, in a mocking voice.

A piercing cry, and then a stifled groan, were the only reply to this terrible question.

"Help that rash youth!" said the merchant, bitterly. "I have, I think, won the wager; but it is sufficient for me to have given him a lesson. Let him keep his money, and be wiser for the future."

He walked rapidly away. We opened the door of the summer-house, and found the student in convulsions. A paper, signed with the name "Francis Villiers," was on the table. As soon as the student's senses were restored, he asked vehemently where was the vile sorcerer who had subjected him to such a horrible ordeal—he would kill him! He sought him throughout the inn in vain; then, with the speed of a madman, he dashed off across the fields in pursuit of him—and we never saw either of them again. That, children, is my Ghost Story!

"And how is it, Uncle, that after that, you don't believe in ghosts?" said I, the first time I heard it.

"Because, my boy," replied my Uncle, "neither the student nor the merchant ever returned; and the forty-five guineas, belonging to me and the other travellers, continued equally invisible. Those two swindlers carried them off, after having acted a farce, which we, like ninnies, believed to be real."

FRENCH SOLDIERS UNDER FIRE.

EACH regiment, as it reached the other bank, formed square, standing at ease. Towards 5 o'clock the whole division had passed. The sun was dispersing the mist, and we saw about three quarters of a league off to our right an old town, with pointed roofs, a church tower like a ball covered with slate, and a cross upon it, and further east a chateau. It was Weissenfels. Between us and the town was a deep depression in the ground. Marshal Ney, who had just arrived, wanted very much to know what was in this hollow, so two companies of the 27th were sent out as skirmishers, and the squares began to advance in slow time; officers, sappers, and drummers inside the squares, the cannon in the intervals, and the caissons behind the rear rank. Nobody liked that hollow; above all, as the day before we had seen a mass of cavalry which could not have got beyond the large plain which we could command on all sides. It was impossible, and I never felt such misgiving in my life before. I was sure something was going to happen. In spite of this, to see us well in line, with our muskets loaded, our colors flying in front, and our generals full of confidence behind us, to see us march through without hurrying, and to hear us marking the step in mass, made us very brave. I said to myself, "Perhaps if they see us they will run away; that would be, after all, the best they could do for themselves as well as for us." I was in the rear rank behind Zebédé, and how I did open my eyes! From time to time I looked over towards the other square, which advanced on the same line, and I saw the marshal with his staff in the midst of it. All stretched their necks to see what was passing in the distance. The skirmishers arrived just then near the edge of the ravine, which was covered with brushwood and lined with a hedge. Already a little before I had seen on the other side something move and glitter, and the idea struck me that the Russians might possibly be there but still I could hardly believe it. But the moment our skirmishers approached the heath, and as the firing began in several points, I saw clearly that they were Lancers. Almost at the same moment we saw a flash before us and the cannons roared. These Russians had cannon, and they had fired upon us. I don't know what noise made me turn round, and I saw in the ranks to the left a gap. At the same time I heard Colonel Zapfel call out quickly, "Close up the ranks;" and Captain Florentin repeated "Close up the ranks." All this passed so quickly that I had no time for reflection. But 50 yards further on there was another flash, and a similar noise in the ranks—something like a gust of wind that passes—and there was another gap—this time on the right. And as after each cannon shot of the Russians the colonel called out "Close up the ranks," I guessed that each time there was a gap. This thought rather upset me; but there was no help, we had to march on. I did not dare to think of this, and tried to think of something else, when General Chemineau, who had just entered into our square, exclaimed "Halt." Then I looked and saw the Russians coming on in masses. "Front rank—kneel down—fix bayonets," shouted the General. As Zebédé had knelt down, I was as it were in the front rank. I can still see, advancing in line, that mass of horsemen and the Russians leaning forward, and I can still hear the General command behind as if on drill—"Attention, Ready, Fire!" All the four squares had fired at the same time, and it was as if the Heavens were coming down. Scarcely had the smoke cleared a little when we saw the Russians running away, but our cannon thundered away and our shot went faster than their horses. "Load," called out the General. I never felt such pleasure in my life. "Holloa, they are running," I said to myself. And on all sides resounded the shout, "Vive l'Empereur." In my joy I shouted like all the others. That lasted about a minute. The squares again advanced, and we thought all was over; but a few hundred yards from the ravine there was a great noise, and for the second time the General called out, "Halt—kneel—fix bayonets." The Russians rushed out of the hollow like a whirlwind. They came all in a mass, and the earth shook. We could no longer hear the words of command; but the good sense of the French soldiers taught them to fire into the crowd, and the file firing rolled on like the sound of the drums at great reviews. Those who have never heard this cannot form an idea of it. Some of those Russians came quite close upon us, we saw them rise out of the smoke, and then nothing more was to be seen. After a few moments, as we did nothing but load and fire, the terrible voice of General Chemineau was again heard shouting, "Cease firing." We scarcely dared to obey; every one hastened to have another shot; but the smoke having cleared away we saw that crowd of horsemen hastening up on the other side of the ravine. We opened out the squares to march in column. The drummers beat the "charge;" and the cannon thundered. Forward, forward, "Vive l'Empereur." The moment we approached the gardens of the town their cannon, which they had taken with them, turned round behind a kind of orchard, and sent their shot among us. One of them broke the hatchet of the Sapper Merlin, having carried away his head. Corporal Thoan, of the Sappers, had his arm broken by a piece of the hatchet. They had to cut off his arm at Weissenfels. Then, how we did run upon the guns, for the sooner you got there the less time they have to fire, that is clear enough. When we were again in line, the Marshal Prince de la Moskowa passed in front of our battalion, and said to us with a joyful face—"Well done! well done! I am satisfied with you. The Emperor shall hear of it." He could not help laughing, because he had seen us running so hard upon the guns. And as General Souham said, "They will do," he answered, "To be sure, it is in the blood." I was delighted at having escaped so well from the affair.—Histoire d'un Conscrit de 1813.

UP A TREE.—Artemus Aristottle's patriotism broke out demonstratively upon his receipt of the news of the fall of Richmond. He'd have the biggest spar-spangled banner and the tallest flagstaff in Berks county—that's what he would, and he told Aunt Hannah so.

So Aris rushed down to Philladelphia by express train, purchased a forty feet flag, and rushed home again by next express. Then Aris set about achieving the longest liberty pole in Berks, out of a straight, hundred and sixty feet—more or less—pine tree, standing on a knoll back of the house. With the big bunting lashed about his shoulders, and armed with a hatchet, he up-ended the long hay-ladder against the pine, scrambled in among the lower branches, and began cutting his course upwards, trimming close to the trunk every knot and branch as he progressed.

Having cut his way to the tip-top of the tall pine, Arte flung his flag to the breeze, lashed it hard and fast to the staff, hurrayed lustily for Grant, "tigered" for Sheridan, and then made the discovery that he had cut off his retreat. There he was, a hundred and fifty feet in the air, and every individual thing that he could have climbed down by, cut off smooth. Arte's enthusiasm collapsed in a second, and he hailed the house :

"Hannah! O—Hannah! I say—Hannah! Come out here"

Out came Hannah, and seeing her husband humped up into a ball, away up there under the "flag of the free," the old lady piped out at him in key major :

"Why, sake o' me! What is it, Arte?"

"Dod dern it, Hannah! I'm up a tree! Can't ye take that ar' musket and shoot my dinner up here?"

"Why, dear me, Arte, how will you ever get down from there?"

"Dunno, Hannah, 'less ye git somebody to chop the derned tree down, an that would eenamost kill me. Dod blast the luck!"

Aris clung to his perch just about as long as he could, and then clasping his legs and arms about the trunk, he began to slide down stern foremost like a bear, ripping, scraping, and tearing over the rough surface in a way that by the time he touched terra firma, it was about an even question which had lost the most bark—Artemus or the tree.

"I'll be dod blamed! if ever I go to cut another tree into a flag-staff, I'll begin at the upper eend," Arte swore, as Aunt Hannah led him away ragged and bleeding.

ON one occasion, Curran was associated with a barrister, who was remarkably tall and slender, and who had originally intended to take holy orders. The Judge who presided, observed that the question under consideration involved a question of ecclesiastical law. "Then," said Curran, "I can refer your lordship to a high authority behind me, who was once intended for the church, though"—in a whisper to a friend beside him—"in my opinion he was better fitted for the steep'e."

MODERN LANGUAGES IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

An essay on the subject of the introduction of foreign lauguages into the curriculum of public school instruction was delivered before the State Teachers' Institute, at its late meeting here, by Mr. Ralph Keeler, a gentleman connected with the educational interests of the city. The effort of the speaker was received with a warm interest on the part of the audience, which the style and argument offered well deserved. As a matter of literary progress, we think that the gentleman has placed before the public, for consideration, a matter of great practical necessity to us, as we are, in point of population, at present constituted.

The drift of the argument was to the end that three schools should be established by the Board of Education, pari gradu with the present grammar establishments, in which, respectively, French, German, and Spanish should be taught and used as the languages of instruction. Mr. Keeler very properly contends that by sending pupils to these schools, the ordinary branches of education would be duly respected, while at the same time the scholars would have the great advantage of youth to help them in gaining correctness of accent and fluency of utterance in languages more or less necessary to them in business of a commercial or literary character.

It is a foregone conclusion with all sound American teachers of to-day that modern languages should have a prominent place in our schools. Cornelius O'Dowd, who, by the way, should hardly have been quoted as authority on so grave a subject, as has been done by Mr. Keeler, may not fancy the social character of the polyglot pedant, but his objections can hardly be considered as touching men whose learning and wit are possibly superior to the Blackwood essayist.

Books are a daily comfort, luxury, and necessity to most men. Literary taste is a cosmopolite; it does not ask in what tongue a poem or essay is written. It demands the book, and trusts to its own energy to get at its ideas. As a means, then, the educated man requires philological training. His research is limited without it. The mathematician makes an awkward mistake, if he allows a foreign book on Astronomy to lie unread because he has not a knowledge of the language. The critic who halts because he cannot pursue his victim into his own vernacular lair is a boggler of the worst description. The editor who leaves a paper containing news to lie on his table unread, out of his own sheer ignorance, hardly deserves credit for enterprise; and any man who strains over a botched translation of a favorite author, out of intellectual laziness, cannot be considered as endowed with much mental vigor. Lingual accomplishments are not the highest marks of intellectual power. Men may be able to talk, parrot-like, many tongues with no very definite ideas to express in any of them; young ladies may chatter "full fetishly and well," "Stratford-atte-Bowe" French, who would be tiresome in any tongue and by means of any tongue; but we must not abuse the coach because the people who travel by it are stupid. It may run through a pleasant country, well worthy a visit by us, and we would be foolish indeed to stay at home, carping at the tales of these same travellers, because of the trouble of the journey.

Everybody in America desires to be able to take any position, and enjoy any advantages of life. Our average man feels hurt, if he cannot comprehend the Life of Cæsar; is disgusted if his inability to read a foreign tongue keeps him out of the enjoyment of any good thing. It is his right to be made comfortable in his search after happiness, by the proper education in youth. If that education requires instruction in a foreign language, the American citizen is deprived of a right, when the requirement is not satisfied. It was, doubtless, well enough to talk about "knowing English well" in days when teachers were paid ten dollars a month, and "boarded around;" but the day of such barbarous treatment of pedagogue and pupil has long gone by. Ten dollars a month was too much for many of the teachers of those times, and too little for others. We can afford to pay better, and we should not haggle over a good article. A well conducted German or French school would be a priceless blessing to many of our citizens, and ten years hence we would reap a reward well worth the expenditure of a few paltry thousands to-day.

We trust that the Board of Education will read and consider well Mr. Keeler's essay, and make an immediate movement, in the direction advised therein, that will be free from any shade of pecuniary or educational penuriousness.

THEATRICAL TALK.

On Monday Daniel E. Bandmann made his first appearance at Maguire's Opera House, in the character of "Narcisse," in the play of that name. Mr. Bandmann met with as flattering a reception as has ever been accorded to any actor who has visited this city, the applause on his entrance on the stage continuing several minutes. Mr. Bandmann's "Narcisse" is one of the most finished, and at the same time original, pieces of acting ever presented on the stage. The character is a difficult one to present faithfully, and one which, in unskilful hands, would be made unendurable. I could not help breathing a sigh of thankfulness at the infliction the public had been spared. Narcisse was some time ago underlined for production at the Opera House, at a time when the part of "Narcisse" would have been played by Mr. Frank Mayo. Now, anything more terrible than Mr. Frank Mayo in the character of "Narcisse" I cannot imagine; it is just one of those parts for which he would have been utterly unsuited. Mr. Bandmann's "Narcisse" is manly in his grief, wise even in his foolery, and terribly powerful in his rage. I use the terms, "Mr. Bandmann's," instead of "Brachenvogel's," as the actor in this instance has made the character so thoroughly his own, that no one would care to see it attempted by any other after witnessing his wonderful performance of it. "Narcisse" is a French musician; his wife, to whom he was devotedly attached, left him on account of his poverty; by her desertion he is rendered cynical—but certainly not mad; he has lost his faith in the existence of good in the human race; he has a scorn for mankind, and an utter disregard as to what opinion they may have of him; they call him a fool: he confesses he is a fool, but he knows them to be fools equally with himself. "Narcisse" will not conform to the usages of society, therefore he is called crazy; he believes mankind to be one vast mutual admiration society, and prefers, instead of shaping his follies to accord with theirs, to make the follies of the many afford him food for mirth, while they, in their turn, laugh at the fool who is eccentrically original. There is no madness in "Narcisse." The woman who loved him, but whose love was not sufficient to make her satisfied to endure the discomforts attendant on poverty, becomes first the mistress of a rich man, to whom she sells herself to gain wealth, and finally becomes the "Marchioness de Pompadour," the mistress of the King of France. "Narcisse" is used as a tool to accomplish the downfall of "the Pompadour," whom he knows only by reputation as the curse of France. The "Duke de Choisseul" (Mr. Charles Thorne,) who is at first a friend of "the Pompadour," enters into a plot with her enemies to accomplish her ruin, or even cause her death; it is anticipated that any sudden shock will kill her; she has, on seeing "Narcisse," while driving on the Boulevards, fainted; "De Choisseul" supposes that "Narcisse" bears a resemblance to the first husband of "the Pompadour," and that her emotion at the sight of him is caused by this; a play is arranged which is to be represented before "the Pompadour,"—"Narcisse," under the name of "M. Leotard," taking the character of a wronged husband who suddenly appears to his faithless wife, personated by "Mlle. Doris Quinault" (played by Mrs. Sophie Edwin, with much skill and power), and hurls reproaches on her head. "The Pompadour" consents to a rehearsal of this play. When "Narcisse," habited as a beggar, appears, he is cut short in his imprecations on his wife in the play by a shriek from his real wife, the "Marchioness de Pompadour," who, at the sound of his voice, exclaims: "Narcisse!" He—like a fool—forgets her falsehood, rushes to her, and throwing his arms round her, embraces her passionately, forgetting everything save that he has again found his wife. She is overjoyed to see him; all her love for him returns; she is content to resign her hopes of being Queen of France, which high position she is on the eve of obtaining, and will retire to some obscure spot with her husband. Turning round to the "Duke de Choisseul" who is confounded by the failure of his plot and exclaims "She will not die," the Marchioness drawing herself up with the dignity of a queen answers, "No, I will not die, I will live," and upbraids "Duke de Choisseul" with his base treachery. She then turns to caress "Narcisse;" he having remained plunged in thought during the time the Marchioness has been engaged in loading the treacherous "De Choisseul" with reproaches, on her touching him realizes that he sees before him, not his fond loving wife, but "Pompadour" the courtezan, the mistress of the King, the oppressor of the starving poor of Paris, the curse of France; shrinking from her with loathing, he curses her, pouring forth a torrent of the most fearful imprecations on the now trembling and conscience-stricken woman who at length falls exhausted into her chair; the sudden shock has done its work, her heart is paralyzed, she falls back dead; "Narcisse" his eyes glaring with the light of madness—his eccentricity has now become madness perhaps—utters an impassioned harangue, prophetic of the ills yet to come upon France, and at its close falls on the ground a corpse. The loving husband and the false wife are both dead; the curtain falls. Mr. Bandmann is a really wonderful actor; he is natural without effort; he is the character which he presents more than any actor I have ever seen. Mrs. Stewart's impersonation of the "Pompadour" was a perfect triumph of art, and exhibited power which many thought she had lost; her reading was beautifully correct, and her acting throughout, grand and impressive. Mrs. Sophie Edwin played the character of "Mlle. Doris Quinault" excellently well, and in the last scene was particularly fine. Mr. Charles Thorne played the "Duke de Choisseul" with great care, and his rendition was evidently the result of an attentive study of the part, of which he had formed a perfect conception. The other characters were well up in their parts, and played well. The piece was put on the stage with a careful regard to detail, which added much to the effectiveness of its representation.

On Wednesday, Mr. Bandmann took a night's rest, for the sake of his voice, which had suffered slightly by change of climate. Last night, he appeared in the character of "Shylock," which the Eastern press declare to be his masterpiece. The Californian going to press on that evening, I am compelled to defer my notice of his impersonation of that character until next week. Hamlet will probably be produced during the latter part of the coming week; I cannot imagine a greater treat than Mr. Bandmann's rendition of that part will afford. Those who have seen his "Narcisse" can form some idea of how he will play "Hamlet." This afternoon, The Workmen of San Francisco will be played; in the evening, Mr. Bandmann appears in the Merchant of Venice. Mlle. Vestvali, who has been suffering severely from cold, is announced to reappear on Tuesday evening next, in the character of "Bianca," in Fazio, or The Italian Wife." Judging from the manner in which she played "Gamea," I imagine that Mlle. Vestvali will achieve a great success in this character; she is holding back a large trump card: her "Romeo," in Romeo and Juliet, has been spoken of by the press of the East and England as her finest effort.

At the Metropolitan Theatre, Arrah na Pogue is still running most successfully. The house has been crowded every night during the week, and there appears great probability of its drawing full houses for a week or two longer.

The people of San Francisco, when entertainments worthy of patronage are presented, support theatrical managers liberally. Both theatres have been crowded during the week; the intellectual element having seen Arrah na Pogue, have made way for the masses, and are now enjoying Bandmann's wonderful acting, while the lovers of Auld Ireland make every effort to keep up the Arrah na Pogue excitement, and with perfect success. Touchstone.

"Pleasantly," "Cordially," "Calmly."—The Placerville Democrat of the 30th ult., in a style which would seem quite as appropriate in depicting a case of cheerfully accepted martyrdom as in describing an instance of retributive justice, states the fact of the execution of a murderer in that city. We do not know what causes contributed to produce so much calmness and resignation; but certainly the fraternity of which the deceased was a member cannot complain that he was not "pleasantly" paragraphed upon his demise; and perhaps, when "robbing a stage" and "killing a Deputy Sheriff" hereafter, they will derive some satisfaction from the thought that ample justice will be rendered them in the newspapers if they "swing" for their little indiscretions:

"Precisely at 12 o'clock yesterday, Thomas B. Poole, implicated in the stage robbery and the killing of Deputy Sheriff Staples, in this county, in July, 1864, suffered the extreme penalty of the law. Calmly he ascended the scaffold, pleasantly conversed with the officers having him in charge and the Rev. Mr. Wallace, cordially shook each by the hand, and fearlessly resigned his spirit to its God. He smiled on all, and seemed perfectly resigned. He made no public address. While the cap was drawn over his face and his arms and legs were being pinioned, he stood perfectly composed. He died without a struggle and in a few seconds."

Madme Bishop's Concert.—Madame Anna Bishop's first concert, on Wednesday evening, at the Academy of Music, was very well attended. She was warmly welcomed by her old California friends and admirers, and her efforts throughout the evening met with enthusiastic applause. The voice of this celebrated cantatrice does not seem to have lost any of its olden purity and sweetness, and certainly its effect upon the audience was fully equal to her former triumphs. M. Charles Lascelles made an extremely favorable first impression, which will not easily be effaced. He possesses a remarkable voice, which enables him, in "Robin Ruff," to sustain alternately the tenor and basso parts with equal purity and facility. Last evening, the second and last concert took place, which we were unable to report, owing to the lateness of the hour.

The Grace Cathedral Festival.—The ladies of this congregation have been holding a festival in aid of the church, at Platt's Hall during the week, with great success. The Hall was beautifully decorated with garlands of foliage and flowers, and its usually demure aspect was enlivened with tableaux, charades, music, and scores of beautiful ladies. The festival proved both creditable and profitable, and a source of pleasure to all who attended. Musical and literary exercises, this evening, will close this pleasant series of entertainments.

MARY McGILLUP.

A SOUTHERN NOVEL.

BY "BRET," THE CALIFORNIAN'S CONDENSED NOVELIST.

AFTER BELLE BOYD.

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY G. A S-LA.

INTRODUCTION.

"WILL you write me up?"

The scene was near Temple Bar. The speaker was the famous rebel Mary McGillup—a young girl of fragile frame and long, lustrous black hair. I must confess that the question was a peculiar one, and under the circumstances, somewhat puzzling. It was true that I had been kindly treated by the Northerners, and, though prejudiced against them, was to some extent, under obligations to them. It was true that I knew little or nothing of American politics, history, or geography. But when did an English writer ever weigh such trifles? Turning to the speaker, I enquired with some caution the amount of pecuniary compensation offered for the work.

"Sir!" she said, drawing her fragile form to its full height. "You insult me—you insult the South."

"But look ye here, dye see—the tiu—the blunt—the ready—the stiff, you know. Don't ye see, we can't do without that, you know!"

"It shall be contingent on the success of the story," she answered haughtily. "In the meantime take this precious gem," and drawing a diamond ring from her finger, she placed it with a roll of MSS. in my hands and vanished.

Although unable to procure more than £1, 2s., 6d. from an intelligent pawnbroker to whom I stated the circumstances and with whom I pledged the ring, my sympathies with the cause of a down-trodden and chivalrous people were at once enlisted. I could not help wondering that in rich England, the home of the oppressed and the free, a young and lovely woman like the fair author of those pages should be obliged to thus pawn her jewels—her marriage gift—for the means to procure her bread! With the exception of the English aristocracy—who much resemble them—I do not know of a class of people that I so much admire as the Southern planters. May I become better acquainted with both.

Since writing the above, the news of Mr. Lincoln's assassination has reached me. It is enough for me to say that I am dissatisfied with the result. I do not attempt to excuse the assassin. Yet there will be men who will charge this act upon the chivalrous South. This leads me to repeat a remark once before made by me in this connection, which has become justly celebrated. It is this:

"It is usual, in cases of murder, to look for the criminal among those who expect to be benefited by the crime. In the death of Lincoln, his immediate successor in office alone receives 'the benefit of his dying.'"

If Her Majesty Queen Victoria were assassinated, which Heaven forbid, the one most benefited by her decease would, of course, be His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, her immediate successor. It would be unnecessary to state that suspicion would at once point to the real culprit, which would, of course, be His Royal Highness. This is logic.

But I have done. After having thus stated my opinion in favor of the South, I would merely remark that there is One who judgeth all things—who weigheth the cause between brother and brother—and awardeth the perfect retribution; and whose ultimate decision, I, as a British subject, have only anticipated. G. A. S.

CHAPTER I.

EVERY reader of Belle Boyd's narrative will remember an allusion to a "lovely, fragile looking girl of nineteen," who rivalled Belle Boyd in devotion to the Southern cause, and who, like her, earned the enviable distinction of being a "rebel spy."

I am that "fragile" young creature. Although on friendly terms with the late Miss Boyd, now Mrs. Hardinge, candor compels me to state that nothing but our common politics prevents me from exposing the ungenerous spirit she has displayed in this allusion. To be dismissed in a single paragraph after years of—but I anticipate. To put up with this feeble and forced acknowledgement of services rendered would be a confession of a craven spirit, which, thank God, though "fragile" and only "nineteen," I do not possess. I may not have the "blood of a Howard" in my veins, as some people, who I shall not disgrace myself by naming, claim to have, but I have yet to learn that the race of McGillup ever yet brooked slight or insult. I shall not say that attention in certain quarters seems to have turned some people's heads; nor that it would have been more delicate if certain folks had kept quiet on the subject of their courtship, and the rejection of certain offers, when it is known that their forward conduct was all that procured them a husband! Thank Heaven, the South has some daughters who are above such base considerations. While nothing shall tempt me to reveal the promises to share equally the fame of certain enterprises, which were made by one who shall now be nameless, I have deemed it only just to myself to put my own adventures upon record. If they are not equal to those of another individual, it is because, though "fragile," my education has taught me to have some consideration for the truth. I am done.

CHAPTER II.

I WAS born in Missouri. My dislike for the Northern scum was inherent. This was shown, at an early age, in the extreme distaste I exhibited for Webster's spelling book—the work of a well-known Eastern Abolitionist. I cannot be too grateful for the consideration shown by my chivalrous father—a gentleman of the old school—who resisted to the last an attempt to introduce Mitchell's Astronomy and Geography into the public school of our district. When I state that this same Mitchell became afterward a hireling helot in the Yankee Army, every intelligent reader will appreciate the prophetic discrimination of this true son of the South.

I was eight years old when I struck the first blow for Southern freedom against the Northern tyrant. It is hardly necessary to state that in this instance the oppressor was a pale over-worked New England "school-marm." The principle for which I was contending, I felt, however, to be the same. Resenting an affront put upon me, I one day heaved a rock * at the head of the Vandal schoolmistress. I was seized and overpowered. My pen falters as I reach the climax. English readers will not give credit to this sickening story—the civilized world will avert its head—but I, Mary McGillup, was publicly SPANKED!

CHAPTER III.

BUT the chaotic vortex of civil war approached, and fell destruction, often procrastinated, brooded in the storm.† As the English people may like to know what was really the origin of the Rebellion, I have no hesitation in giving them the true and only cause. Slavery had nothing to do with it, although the violation of the Declaration of Independence, in the disregard by the North of the Fugitive Slave Law,‡ might have well provoked a less fiery people than the Southrons. At the inception of the struggle a large amount of Southern indebtness was held by the people of the North. To force payment from the generous but insolvent debtor—to obtain liquidation from the Southern Planter—was really the soulless and mercenary object of the craven Northerners. Let the common people of England look to this. Let the improvident literary hack; the starved and impecunious Grub street debtor; the newspaper frequenter of sponging houses, remember this in their criticisms of the vile and slavish Yankee.

CHAPTER IV.

THE roasting of an Abolitionist, by a greatly infuriated community, was my first taste of the horrors of civil war. Heavens! Why will the North persist in this fratricidal warfare? The expulsion of several Union refugees, which soon followed, now fairly plunged my beloved State in the seething vortex.

I was sitting at the piano one afternoon, singing that stirring refrain, so justly celebrated, but which a craven spirit, unworthy of England, has excluded from some of her principal restaurants, and was dwelling with some enthusiasm on the following line:

"Huzza! she spurns the Northern scum!"

when a fragment of that scum, clothed in that detestable blue uniform which is the symbol of oppression, entered the apartment. "I have the honor of addressing the celebrated rebel spy, Miss McGillup," said the Vandal officer.

In a moment I was perfectly calm. With the exception of slightly expectorating twice in the face of the minion, I did not betray my agitation. Haughtily, yet firmly, I replied:

"I am."

"You looked as if you might be," the brute replied, as he turned on his heel to leave the apartment.

In an instant I threw myself before him. "You shall not leave here thus," I shrieked, grappling him with an energy which no one, seeing my frail figure, would have believed. "I know the reputation of your hireling crew. I read your dreadful purpose in your eye. Tell me not that your designs are not sinister. You came here to insult me—to kiss me, perhaps. You shan't—you naughty man. Go away!"

The blush of conscious degredation rose to the cheek of the Lincoln hireling as he turned his face away from mine.

In an instant I drew my pistol from my belt, which, in anticipation of some such outrage, I always carried, and shot him.

CHAPTER V.

"THY forte was less to act than speak,
Maryland!
Thy politics were changed each week,
Maryland!
With Northern Vandals thou was't meek,
With sympathizers thou wouldst shriek,
I know thee—O 'twas like thy cheek!
Maryland! my Maryland!"

After committing the act described in the preceding chapter, which every English reader will pardon, I went up stairs, put on a clean pair of stocking, and, placing a rose in my lustrous black hair, proceeded at once to the camp of Generals Price and Mosby to put them in possession of information which would lead to the destruction of a portion of the Federal army. During a great part of my flight I was exposed to a running fire from the Federal pickets of such coarse expressions as, "Go it, Sally Reb," "Dust it, my Confederate beauty," but succeeded in reaching the glorious Southern camp uninjured.

In a week afterwards I was arrested, by a lettre de cachet of Mr. Stanton, and placed in the Bastile. British readers of my story will express surprise at these terms, but I assure them that not only these articles but tumbrils, guillotines and conciergeries were in active use among the Federals. If substantiation be required, I refer to the Charleston Mercury, the only reliable organ, next to the New York Daily News, published in the country. At the Bastile I made the acquaintance of the accomplished and elegant author of Guy Livingstone, ‖ to whom I presented a curiously carved thigh bone of a Union officer, and from whom I received the following beautiful acknowledgement:

"Demoiselle: Should I ever 'win hame to my ain countrie,' I make mine avow to enshrine in my reliquaire this elegant bijouterie and offering of La Belle Rebelle. Nay, methinks this fraction of man's anatomy were some compensation for the rib lost by the 'grand old gardener,' Adam."

CHAPTER VI.

RELEASED at last from durance vile and placed on board of an Erie canal boat, on my way to Canada, I for a moment breathed the sweets of liberty. Perhaps the interval gave me opportunity to indulge in certain reveries which I had hitherto sternly dismissed. Henry Breckinridge Folair, a consistent Copperhead, captain of the canal boat, again and again pressed that suit I had so often rejected.

It was a lovely moonlight night. We sat on the deck of the gliding craft. The moonbeam and the lash of the driver fell softly on the flanks of the off-horse, and only the surging of the tow-rope broke the silence. Folair's arm clasped my waist. I suffered it to remain. Placing in my lap a small but not ungrateful roll of Checkerberry lozenges, he took the occasion to repeat softly in my ear the words of a motto he had just unwrapped—with its graceful covering of tissue paper—from a sugar almond. The heart of the wicked little rebel, Mary McGellup, was won!

The story of Mary McGillup is done. I might have added the journal of my husband, Henry Breckinridge Folair, but as it refers chiefly to his freights, and a schedule of his passengers, I have been obliged, reluctantly, to suppress it.

It is due to my friends to say that I have been requested not to write this book. Expressions have reached my ears, the reverse of complimentary. I have been told that its publication will probably ensure my banishment for life. Be it so. If the causes for which I labored have been subserved, I am content.

LONDON, May, 1865.

* NOTE, BY G. A. S.—In the Southwest, any stone larger than a pea is termed "a rock."

† I make no pretension to fine writing, but perhaps Mrs. Hardinge can lay over that. Oh, of course! M. McG.

‡ The Declaration of Independence grants to each subject "the pursuit of life, liberty and happiness." A fugitive slave may be said to personify "life, liberty and happiness." Hence his pursuit is really legal. This is logic. G. A. S.

‖ The recent conduct of Mr. Livingstone renders him unworthy of my notice. His disgusting praise of Belle Boyd and complete ignoring of my claims, show the artfulness of some females and the puppyism of some men. M. McG.

A YOUNG lady in Nevada, Cal., has two lovers, either of whom she is willing to accept as a partner for life. Unwilling to offend either and unable to choose between them, she has proposed that they throw dice to decide the question. They are now, says the Union, deliberating on the proposal, neither being willing to lose the coveted prize, and both fearing to "take the chances." Why can't one of the gentlemen oblige the other by dy-ing at once? Let them abide the hazard of the die, without throwing—if the young lady (who seems quite considerate) will agree not to "throw" them both meantime.

A SHOOTING AFFRAY.—Frank Kelly, bar-keeper at the Willows, was shot in the back of the head, at that place, last Sunday, while endeavoring to prevent a difficulty between James Kelly and Wm. F. Mullins. He had interposed himself between the parties, and had hold of Kelly, when he was shot, it is supposed, by Mullins. Mullins and Kelly immediately left in their buggy for the city. Both were subsequently arrested. Kelly's wound, it is hoped, will not prove mortal.

PARADE.—The Irish Regiment held their regimental parade on the Old Pioneer Race Track on the 1st inst. They went through the usual evolutions of forming into squads, deploying, forming in line of battle, changing front, and firing by file, battalion, and company, in the most creditable manner. The exercises of the regiment were closely observed, but the Colonel, W. C. Smith, was particularly watched, being presented with one of Tucker's best on the occasion.

ENOCH EARL, an elderly gentleman died suddenly in this city, September 29th, of heart disease. He was arranging for the funeral of a deceased friend at the time, and was stricken down without a moment's warning.

THE Fenian Brotherhood held an immense meeting at Union Hall, on Thursday evening last; the most lively enthusiasm prevailed, and subscriptions amounting to nearly $8,000 were recorded.

SANDALPHON.

BY H. W. LONGFELLOW.

HAVE you read in the Talmud of old,
In the Legends the Rabbins have told
Of the limitless realms of the air—
Have you read it—the marvellous story
Of Sandalphon, the Aogel of Glory,
Sandalphon, the Angel of Prayer?

How, erect, at the outermost gates
Of the City Celestial he waits,
With his feet on the ladder of light,
That crowded with angels unnumbered,
By Jacob was seen as he slumbered
Alone in the desert at night?

The Angels of Wind and of Fire
Chaunt only one hymn, and expire
With the song's irresistible stress;
Expire in their raptnre and wonder,
As harp-strings are broken asunder
By music they throb to express.

But serene in the rapturous throng,
Unmoved by the rush of the song,
With eyes unimpassioned and slow,
Among the dead angels, the deathless
Sandalphon stands listening breathless
To sounds that ascend from below;

From the spirits on earth that adore,
From the souls that entreat and implore
In the fervor and passion of prayer;
From the hearts that are broken with losses,
And weary with dragging the crosses
Too heavy for mortals to bear.

And he gathers the prayers as he stands,
And they change into flowers in his hands,
Into garlands of purple and red;
And beneath the great arch of the portal,
Through the streets of the City Immortal
Is wafted the fragrance they shed.

It is but a legend, I know—
A fable, a phantom, a show,
Of the ancient Rabbinical lore:
Yet the old mediæval tradition,
The beautiful, strange superstition,
But haunts me and holds me the more.

When I look from my window at night,
And the welkin above is all white,
All throbbing and panting with stars,
Among them majestic is standing
Sandalphon the angel, expanding
His pinions in nebulous bars.

And the legend, I find, is a part
Of the hunger and thirst of the heart,
The frenzy and fire of the brain,
That grasps at the fruitage forbidden,
The golden pomegranates of Eden,
To quiet its fever and pain.

BRITISH CREDULITY AS REGARDS THE UNITED STATES.—At a party I was invited to in England, soon after my return from the States, I was questioned at great length as to what I thought of the country, how I liked the people, what language they spoke, and if I was not afraid of their revolvers and bowie-knives, etc. This was all very well, and I replied accordingly. But, after dinner, when we rejoined the fair sex in the drawing-room, an old lady laid siege to me, and poured in such a volley of inquiries, that it became past all endurance—so, thinking I had better settle the matter at once, by relating the fearful state of anxiety and danger under which I sometimes had to give my entertainment, I said that I gave a musical evening in one of the cities on the Mississippi, where the society was so outrageous and revengeful, that, "if I had uttered a word which could be construed into a national insult, my life would have been immediately sacrificed." "What a dreadful situation!" the old thing said. "Accordingly, I prepared for the worst. Having hired a square pianoforte, I had it so placed that I faced the audience, and could see all that was going on when I either spoke or sung. I placed a large bowie-knife, ready drawn, on each side of the pianoforte, as well as a couple of six-barrelled revolvers, all ready loaded; and, to render my position still more secure, I had a tolerably-sized cannon between my legs, under the pianoforte, loaded to the muzzle. So, if the five hundred persons present had risen in revolt, I could have blown the instrument to pieces, shot many persons, and, in the midst of the smoke and confusion, made my escape!" The old lady was astounded, as well she might—said she had no idea America was so bad as all that—left me, and communicated the dreadful intelligence to frightened and panic-stricken groups in every corner of the room. She believed it all. Her father had been captain of the marines at Woolwich for many years.—Prof. H. Phillips' Musical and Personal Recollections.

"ATTIC WIT" AT THE ROYAL DRAMATIC COLLEGE IN ENGLAND.

BELOW we give a few specimens of what is called "Attic wit," contributed by a party of well-known English writers to a recent fair for the benefit of the Royal Dramatic College:

A FIRE OF SMALL JOKES.

The papers state that somebody has been chipping pieces off the monumental bust of Bunyan. What of it? Destroying a bunion must of course be a great help to the pilgrim's progress.

The reason why policemen are never run over is that they are never in the way.

A young lady's first love-kiss has the same effect on her as being electrified. It's a great shock, but soon over.

Warning to Ladies—Tattle begins with T.

New Definition—Masculine, millionaire; feminine, millionheiress.

May not a bird who sleeps upon the wing, be said to occupy a feather bed?

What is the use of sighing and weeping as we float down the stream of Time? Why make the voyage of life a wailing voyage?

Human existence hinges upon trifles. What would beauty be without soap?

We often hear of "fashionable marriages," but never of fashionable deaths.

ON SOME ACKNOWLEDGED FACTS—AN ESSAY—BY OUR OWN SKEPTIC.

"Two and two are four." Are they? That shows how much you know about it. I saw a young ladies' school out walking the other day. They were "two and two," and I counted them. They were forty!

"Two wrongs don't make one right." Don't they? What ridiculous statements are received as axioms. Two wrongs—such, for instance, as finding a railway train some hours behind its time, and then being swindled at the railway hotel, where you are in consequence compelled to pass the night—are the very things to "make one write"—to the Times, or other court of appeal.

"It's a long lane that has no turning." Ridiculous nonsense! I walked the other day, on purpose to ascertain the fact, the whole length of "Long Lane," Smithfield. It had at least fourteen "turnings" out of it. I counted them.

"All's fair in love." Not a bit. Or how on earth would the brunettes, who are by no means "fair," ever get sweethearts? which they do to my certain knowledge—and frequently.

"The whole is greater than a part." No such thing. I have known a few leading actors in my time, and have generally found that a "part" is deemed of considerable more importance than the completeness of "the whole."

"The shortest way between any two points is in a straight line." All I have to say regarding this grossly absurd axiom is, that the propounder of it never attempted to walk home after a dinner at the Freemasons'—or he wouldn't talk so glibly about a "straight line." I have personally made the experiment, and found—but this is nothing to the purpose. From the Freemasons' Tavern—home—is not a straight line, and never was since I have known it. Q. E. D.

CONUNDRUMS.

What is the difference between the Dramatic College Fair and other fairs? In the latter you find the stalls in the fair, whereas in the former you find the fair in the stalls.

"Tell me, where is fancy bred?" Fancy bread is in the refreshment room, if it is not all gone.

If I asked you for one thousand pounds, what would you wish? Wish I might get it.

What conundrums are always at home? Those that are never found out.

A DECIDED BITE.—While walking down B—— street one Sunday evening, "the subscriber" came up with two boys, aged respectively ten and fifteen years. The younger one carried an apple in his hand, and the elder one was using all his eloquence to obtain "just one bite of it."

"Well," said the younger one, finally, "I'll give you jes' one bite; but don't you take mor'n jes' one bite."

The larger one took the apple, opened a mouth that would have been creditable to a hundred and fifty pound catfish, leaving a very small share on the outside.

"Jim," said the little one, looking up at the operation with astonishment, "you take the apple and give me the bite."

A STORY is told of a belated traveller, who put up for the night in the thatched cottage of a peasant in a benighted part of Scotland. In the morning, he was awoke by the guid-man and his wife, who were endeavoring to hoist the cow to the roof of the cottage in order that she might eat the grass that was growing there. On being told that it would be much easier to cut the grass and bring it down to the old cow, the guid-wife answered, "Weel! weel! to think o' that ye maun had been lucket up at the college o' Glasgow!"

THE GOOD OLD TIMES IN ENGLAND.

A PRETTY young girl, dwelling with her widowed mother near the village of Wyeombe, loved and was beloved by a young farmer, whose croft adjoined her mother's little field. The young and happy pair looked forward to wedlock at no distant date, when, one evil day—a day too of sudden storm and rain—there came to the mother's door a wealthy suitor, who placed his money-bags and his station in rivalry against the youth and manly beauty of the favored swain. 'Twas Justice Parr, an aged but unrighteous Boaz, who had seen this poor Ruth gleaning in his wheat-field, and resolved to win her for his wife. The mother, tempted by the golden prospect, sent the old man to her daughter, who with simple earnestness told him the story of her love for the young farmer, and besought him to think of her no more. This would have melted many a heart; it hardened his; and pondering in his wicked brain, he hatched a scheme of revenge. Half hints of witchcraft in the town turned adrift so cunningly upon the breeze of gossip that none knew whence they came, began to make the timid pale. A child fell ill with a pining disease; and the maiden was known to have sat hours long by the bed of the flushed and tossing sufferer, soothing its fever and cooling its dry lips with a grateful acid. This alone was ground for suspicion; for most childish ailments were then ignorantly ascribed to witchcraft. Suspicion became certainty, when a witch-finder—not the infamous Hopkins, who flourished a year or two later, but a wretch of similar kind, brought to the village and fed with a good round sum by the relentless justice—discovered in the damsel indubitable marks of witchcraft. He said there was something superhuman in her beauty. (Had she been a hag of eighty he would have drawn the same conclusion from her ugliness.) She had a mole on the left cheek. Her mother kept a cat, which was known to wander abroad at night. Upon these and equally miserable pretexts, the poor girl was rudely seized and carried, shrieking, to the Witches' Lake, that she might there undergo the usual ordeal. With her thumbs and her great toes tied together, she was brought in a boat to the centre of a pool, and flung pitilessly in. A splash—a shriek or two, quenched in bubbling spasms—a troubling of the surface for some seconds, as if deadly strife was going on below—and then all was still. Her innocence was proved; but at what price! Next day the white garments and whiter face of the dead girl floated up amid the water-lilies, in whose trailing stalks her wet black hair was all entwined. The cords were loose—snapped in the struggle; but alas! too late! The equity of tragic sequence would seem to demand the instant death of Parr at her furious lover's hands: but—ah! for the weakness of humanity enthralled by superstition—that very lover, convinced of her guilt by the unanswerable reasoning of the witch-finder, stood among the crowd that saw her committed to the lake, and thanked Heaven for having delivered him from wedlock with a sorceress.—From "Pictures of the Periods," by W. F. Collier, LL.D

AN amusing instance of sharp practice occurred in one of the Newark justice courts the other afternoon. A suit was brought in trover for the recovery of a gold chain worth $60, which had been pledged for the return of a loan of $28, the lender having refused to give up the chain when the plaintiff was ready to redeem it. The plaintiff's lawyer had the article in question brought into court by way of evidence, and then requested him to state whether that was his property. The owner picked up the chain, looked at it, and declared it to be his. "Then," said the lawyer, "I would advise you to put it in your pocket." This being done, the lawyer remarked to the justice that as his client had recovered his property, further proceedings would be unnecessary, and the suit was accordingly discontinued.

IT is stated, by the Turkish correspondent of a Paris newspaper, that doctors having the care of cholera patients, at Alexandria, have tried a curious experiment, the object of which was to ascertain whether that disease is caused by the peculiar state of the air, as has been supposed. They sent up two balloons, one from a village, as yet untainted by the epidemic, and the other from Alexandria. A quarter of fresh beef was suspended to each balloon, which was allowed to float, for a certain time, in the air. On making these balloons descend, the meat which had floated over Alexandria was completely putrified, whereas that which had been suspended over the healthy village was perfectly fresh.

PIGEON RACE.—An extraordinary match of carrier-pigeons has recently taken place at Brussels. Not less than five hundred and thirty-eight of these winged messengers, which had been sent to Toulouse for the purpose, were released there to contend for prizes, amounting in number to eighty-two. The first pigeon arrived at Brussels in fourteen hours. The distance being three hundred leagues, it must have flown at the speed of twenty-two leagues an hour.

IT is stated, on excellent authority, that the sale of "Enoch Arden," up to the present time, has produced, to Mr. Tennyson, the sum of £11,500.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM
—OF—
WILD CHERRY,

HAS BEEN USED FOR

NEARLY HALF A CENTURY,

With the most astonishing success in curing

Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of

The Throat, Lungs and Chest,

INCLUDING EVEN

CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last named and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the "medicinal gum" of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaints is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great the popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry, there are commingled with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of

has induced many physcians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

Abraham Skillman, M. D., Boundbrook, N. J.
H. D. Martin, M.D., Mansfield, Pa.

The proprietors have letters from all classes of our fellow-citizens, from the Halls of Congress to the humblest cottage, and even from beyond the seas; for the fame and virtues of WISTAR'S BALSAM have extended to the "uttermost bounds of the earth," without any attempt on our part to introduce it beyond the limits of our own country

TO CALIFORNIANS AND OREGONIANS.

INTERIOR ITEMS.

The editor of the Denver Gazette, F. G. Stanton, made a murderous assault upon Wm. N. Byers, of the News, recently, with a bludgeon. Stanton avers that he was insane at the time, but the statement is discredited by the citizens, who have visited upon the offender marks of their unqalified condemnation, in the withdrawal of patronage from the Gazette. A long and bitter controversy had been going on between the parties, in their respective newspapers.

An engineer named Stinzer was injured at the Mohawk quartz mine, Nevada, a few days since. He was oiling the machinery, when his coat sleeve was caught in the cogs. The workmeu were absent at dinner, the engine was running with only enough steam to pump the water. He put out his foot, stopped the engine, and was finally rescued with the loss of his arm.

It is estimated that within six miles of either side of the Mokelumne, there is not less than 1,000,000 cords of wood now standing which must find its market in San Francisco, leaving an equal or greater amount for home consumption. Bordering and accessible to the Mokelumne there are three hundred square miles of wood lands, containing, by careful estimate, not less than 5,000,000 cords.—Marysville Appeal.

Among the incidents of the late "target shoot" at Oroville, says the Record, was a race between two hundred men agrinst one hare. After the hare had made his escape, and the boys cooled off, Captain Winkley allowed "it wasn't much of a rabbit, nohow; and, moreover, his company was not organized for bushwhacking."

Under the appropriate head, says the Santa Cruz Sentinel, is announced the death of three little children, sons of Mr. William Roach, an old Pioneer, residing near Watsonville. We also learn that a little daughter died this week, with the same fatal disease—diptheria—and that another, and now the only child, is sick and not expected to recover.

A correspordent of the Nevada Gazette says that some fifteen or twenty men "jumped" the plaza at Summit City, Nevada county, Cal., (a new mining locality which is attracting considerable attention of late;) they enclosed the plaza with a fence during the night. In the morning the citizens pulled down the feuce; a row was the consequence.

The Santa Cruz Sentinel says: Among the seven or eight oil wells, now opened, or being bored, is the "Santa Cruz Petroleum Oil Works Company," yielding the pure rectified article, at the rate of seventy-five gallons per day, worth in this market $1 50 per gallon.

The Jackson Ledger says a large and apparently a rich lede of quartz was found a few days since in Ohio Hill, near Jackson. This locality wns once noted for its rich placer mines.

GAMBLING AT HOMBURG.

IS it Humboldt, in his Cosmos, who says that every separate atom possesses in itself all the natural properties nnd forces of this agglomeration of atoms on which man sells and buys, marries, and makes his last will and testament? Well, Homburg is no more than an atom. A particle cohering to the totality of the great human system by the central attraction of civilization, exactly as a grain of sand gravitates to the earth's centre. And just as mites betray their existence, with all its fit couditions, upon the grain of sand, so is human society in all its phases, and under all its aspects, visible on the larger atom—Homburg. The evil aspects predominate; but so they would everywhere, if mortal intelligence could take cognizance of the doings and seemings of the whole human family. Homburg is a microcosm; Gulliver could see a vast deal more in Lilliput than he could in Brobdignag. Turn your eyes upon that group of people pressed one against the other to watch those two Frenchmen who are playing in concert at the roulette table. By the way, one of the players is he who was condemned the other day par contumace, as the absolutist tribunals in France call it, to several years' penal servitude for the most flagitious cheating at the Paris clubs. Well, within that group are to be found representatives of most of the classes into which nature, employment, or necessity has forced the flood of humauity to diverge. Can you recognize any of the spectators? No. You see that little man, so short that even on tiptoe he can scarcely look over the shoulders of those in front?—he with the green ribbon in his button hole. A beholder cannot remember what his face is like, because it is so difficult to get beyond his eyes. What a glance there is in those deep, dark optics: how unwinkingly they meet one—the windows of his brain whence his thought looks out: he is one of the great clocks of finance; when he strikes the money-mougers set their watches by him. He is great on the Danube—vast at Vienna, and has solved the problem of extracting riches from poverty—entendu, that of the Austrian exchequer. The man whose broad shoulders intercept his view spends a fortune in advertising a quack medicine; the advertisement sheet of every newspaper in Great Britain undergoes a course of his pills. Near him again, is an oddity; the old, old man in the brown coat with a cape to it. He was at the Duchess's ball at Brussels on that memorable summer night in —15. The British treasury has paid him half-pay for fifty years, which he has regularly lost at roulette; he spends his life in compiling systems of play, in the belief that the bank is to be broken by arithmetic. What a lovely face! that girl's who has just handed a florin to the croupier to stake for her. Where are we to find the blue with which her eyes are painted? So young, so beautiful, so innocent; for crime itself would be found not guilty if detected in such guise. Mercy upon us, what a sham the world is! She is Fraulein ——, la sylphide des sylphides of the ballet at Berlin, and that gentlemaa who has just arrested her hand in the act of passing another stake to the croupier is the Herzog von ——, her protector. The embryo Redpaths and Robsons of society are there too, looking with sickening heart at the rake of the croupier, pitilessly overtaking the gold diverted from its legitimate destination, and feeling the damp shade of the prison creeping over the glittering saloons—the "coming event casting its shadow before." Certainly it was not philanthropy which built the Casino in Homburg. The town itself possesses neither attraction nor interest. The neighborhood is charming, but far less so than the Valley of the Lahn, or the banks of the Neckar, and would not attract or retain the crowd of strangers that resorts to it but for the lure of the Casino. Of course it will be advanced by its defenders, that the benefit the town derives from the influx of visitors is nt once the motive and justification of the establishment, and that the insignificancy of the town, apart from it, adds cogency to the justification. The objections that suggest themselves to this theory are, the manifest incongruity of subsidizing the sovereign of a state enormously for permission to improve his dominions; the municipal regulations, prohibiting all participation of the subjects of the Landgrave in the pursuits of the Casino, and the oft-recurring enactments by which the Government finds it necessary to exercise pressure on the Direction, to wring from them their unwilling contributions towards the maintenance of the town.—Cornhill Magazine.

A BUFFALO DRIVE.

MR. R. H. HOWSLEY, Secretary of the American Union Cattle Association, whose headquarters are at Leavenworth, Kansas, sends us the prospectus of the said Association for a grand "Buffalo Drive" upon the plains west of the Missouri river. The purpose of the Association is to go upon the plains with a party of a hundred and twenty men, to collect and herd for a while, and thus tame, not less than ten thousand buffaloes, which are to be subsequently driven to the States for a market. This is a very pretty plan, and we have no doubt of its feasibility, so far as the buffaloes and the "market" are concerned. The difficulty will probably be in the collecting, herding, taming, and driving to the States. Nevertheless, we are told that the plan has been maturing for six years, nnd is "believed to be perfect, promising certain success." We can believe this ourselves, if the plan is to herd a hundred and twenty calves, instead of "ten thousand buffaloes." Every volunteer of the one hundred and twenty is to pay to the Association two hundred dollars, by way of subscription, and to furnish his own horse, personal outfit, and arms. But then if the plan succeeds, and "fair calculations are realized," each two hundred dollars will draw of the net profits of the expedition three thousand dollars, besides the pay of the volunteer for the time he is out, expected to be from eighty to one hundred days, at the rate of three dollars per day, and a bonus of fifty dollars Now, this calculation of the net profits will be very satisfactory to those who believe that any net will hold ten thousand buffaloes, while they are being herded, tamed, and driven to the States for a market. To be sure, the $3.000 will only be payable if the plan succeeds; and though there is much virtue in an "if," there is also much of uncertainty and possible dissappointment. The prospectus contains an eloonent appeal to those "in declining health" "to turn out and take a Fall's recreation in the invigorating atmosphere of the Western prairies." This is all very well, so far as the invigoration is concerned; but as to the three thousand dollars dividend for herding, taming and driving ten thousand buffaloes, we think that it is an allurement which ought to be addressed to those "declining" in intellect as well as health. We happen to know several young men dyspeptic, and some consumptive in habit, who are quite shrewd; and we must say that, so far as these are concerned, the following sentence from the prospectus has failed to elicit any marked enthusiasm:

"A people that can crush a rebellion such as ours has been, can tame and drive buffalo in such a country as ours."

The only trouble with the above logic is that the "people" who crushed the rebellion are not going to be on the plains to tame the ten thousand buffaloes. That is to be done, according to the plan, by a hundred and twenty volunteers who shall pay two hundred dollars each, shall receive three dollars per day, for eighty or a hundred days' service, together with a bonus of fifty dollars, and a dividend out of the net profits of three thousand dollars each. Now, the rebellion was not crushed on any such favorable terms, and we are only surprised that the "Cattle Association," considering what it offers, did not get the hundred and twenty volunteers in Leavenworth alone, to say nothing of that part of Kansas which lies outside of that flourishing city.—Wilkes' Spirit of the Times.

ECCENTRICITIES OF GREAT MEN.

IT is a trite saying, that no man is a hero to his valet; and the greatest men that history records have had their little weaknesses, flattering to humanity, because proving them mortals and not demi-gods. Sir Walter Raleigh in his best days had a strong dash of dandyism. When he appeared at court he wore six thousand dollars' worth of diamonds in his shnes; his armor was solid silver, and his sword-hilt nnd baldric were studded with stones of incalculable value. Pass on, splendid shadow! The great philosopher, Descartes, had a passion for wigs, and Sir Richard Steel would sometimes spend forty guineas on a black peruke. Goldsmith's peach-colored coat is immortal. According to Samuel Johnson, Pope had such a high opinion of himself as to think he was one of the pivots of the system of the world. Napoleon I. prided himself on the smallness of his hands and feet. Sir Walter Scott was prouder of being sheriff of Selkirkshire than author of Waverly. Kotzebue was so vain and envious that he could not tolerate any celebrated personage near him, even when represented by a portrait or statue. Byron was vain to excess—vain of his genius, his rank, his misanthropy, and even his vices. Spinoza took particular delight in seeing spiders fight. The Count de Grammont once surprised Cardinal Richelieu jumping with his servaut to see which could leap highest. Salvator Rosa often played impromptu comedies, and traversed the streets of Rome as a mountebank. Antonio Magliabecchi, the famous librariau of the grand duke of Tuscany, was passionately fond of spiders, had his rooms filled with them, and allowed no one to disturb them. Moses Mendelssohn, surnamed the Jewish Socrates, sometimes sought relief from his meditations by sitting at the window and counting the tiles on the opposite roofs. Cowper bred rabbits and made bird cages. Doctor Johnson made an especial pet of his cat. Mind, the famous Swiss painter, always had a room full of cats, nnd one perched on his back when he was drawing. Goethe had a tame adder, but held dogs in aversion. Thompson's greatest delight was to saunter in his garden and eat ripe peaches off the trellises, with his hands in his pockets. Gray said he should like to pass his life on a sofa reading French novels. It is said that Oliver Cromwell sometimes laid aside his Puritanic gravity and played at blindman's buff with his attendants. One of the most innocent amusements of Charles II., of Englaud, was to stroll in St. James' Park, surrounded by a troop of those diminutive spaniels which bear his name, and feed the ducks. Beethoven loved to paddle in cold water, and carried his passion to such an extent, that the floor of his room was flooded, and the water would filter through to the lower stories. Sometimes, at morning and evening, he would scamper barefoot through the dewy grass of the meadows. Shelley was very fond of sailing paper boats. It is said that he came to the Serpentine river once, and having nothing in his pocket but a fifty pound note to make a boat, gave it at once the desired form, launched it on the stream, watched his venture with paternal anxiety, and finally ran around to the other shore to receive his money when it came to land. We might easily extend our list, but have said enough to prove the proposition with which we started.

Death Valley.—The Austin Reveille thus describes a singular valley lying some two hundred miles south of that place, and within the boundaries of this State Death Valley proper is, by report, one hundred and four feet below the level of the sea, forty-five miles long, fifteen wide, and is a vast salt marsh, with broad alkaline borders. It is approached by a pass over Mount Magruder, from which you descend some two thousand feet; there is no fresh water in the valley, all the springs, of which there are many, being strongly impregnated with alkali. It is broken by river beds running in every direction, and the whole surface of the valley is broken and rugged beyond description. In 1852, a party of emigrants encamped near the salt marsh, and suffered severely from want of water; such is the dryness of the climate that the wagon tracks are still distinctly discerned. An exploring party, who were there in January, 1865, found the heat intense, the thermometer standing even then at 90 deg. In midsummer it would be fatal to attempt to visit it. A table land projects into the valley, from which a full view of its terrors may be attained. When it is calm the atmosphere is so dense as to render respiration almost painful, and the winds that visit it are changeable and furious. They generally arise in the south-east, blow from that direction for a few hours, change suddenly to the opposite quarter and blow back, carrying with them immense crowds of dust and enveloping everything in darkness. A traveller, who witnessed several of them, represents them as terribly appalling, impressing the imagination with forebodings of direst evil.

A nice little bit of innocence occurred, recently, at an agricultural show at Cahors. The prize having been awarded to some sheep displaying splendid wool on their backs, the judge seized hold of one to mark it, when, to his surprise, the entire fleece came off, and it was discovered that it had been stuck on with wax!

AN INTERESTING LETTER.

Very few persons, even among physicians, would have been willing upon any terms to have been in the condition of the writer of the following letter on the 14th of February last. I will anticipate somewhat his report of the facts, by saying that on the 15th August, 1865, he made me a visit, "the very picture of health." Time, which tries and proves all things, has sufficiently tested this case, and shown that neither relapse or collapse having followed, the cure is perfect, and can be cited among the scores of similar cases, the result of my improved mode of treating disease without medicine.

G. M. BOURNE,
Water Cure Physician,
No. 10, Masonic Temple, Post street.

August 27, 1865.

Sacramento, April 30, 1865.

Dr. G. M. Bourne—Dear Sir: It is with pleasure and satisfaction that I now let you know of my good health. Looking back on what I have passed through, it seems as if I was lifted from the grave, and I think it my duty to acknowledge to you and the world the benefit I derived from water treatment as administered by you in your celebrated baths. It was in August, 1864, when disease developed itself with a severe cough. I then took medicines, getting worse, with chills, fevers, loss of strength, and was pronounced consumptive. This set me to thinking, and finally I determined to leave my business and go to the Sandwich Islands, having been informed that I could not be cured here. I went to San Francisco, and while waiting for a ship, called upon Dr. Bourne, who stated that a trip to the Sandwich Islands would probably result disastrously, was wholly unnecessary, as I could then be speedily cured at his establishment. I placed myself under his treatment, and in one week was so much improved that I thought I could risk returning home and to my duty as Engineer on the Central Pacific Railroad. The doctor objected; but I thought I knew better, and returned to my duty. In about two weeks my cough returned, and I kept getting worse, and, contrary to Dr. Bourne's injunction never to take medicine again, committed that folly, and soon was so completely run down that I could scarcely walk; so, as a last resort, I concluded once more to try the Water Cure. I went to San Francisco—few of my friends expected me to return; in fact, I thought my return doubtful. On arriving at Dr. Bourne's establishment (February 14, 1865,) I was not able to get into the bath without assistance, but in a few days I began to gain. I remained with him only six weeks, when I left, "a wiser and a better man," without the aid of medicine. I have now been at work several weeks, and find that I am gaining every day, and at present bid fair to be stouter than ever before. Persons visiting the Doctor's establishment will find it just what it should be, in both Ladies' and Gentlemen's Departments, and I cannot say too much in praise of the Doctor's kind attention to his patients.

This letter I write for the benefit of the afflicted, to be used as the Doctor decides, and should it be the means of directing any one to his care and treatment who (as they assuredly will) find relief, I will be paid for my trouble. Your obedient servant,

JAMES CAMPBELL,
Engineer Central Pacific Railroad.

San Francisco, August 25, 1865.

Advised by the undersigned, Mr. James Campbell, of the Central Pacific Railroad (who was then in a most deplorable state of ill health,) placed himself under the care of Dr. Bourne, the Water Cure Physician. Some six months or more afterward he visited this city, when I accidentally met him at Dr. Bourne's establishment, and, I am happy to say, restored to the enjoyment of good health and in fine spirits. JOHN SULLIVAN.

☞ Dr. Bourne treats all diseases of the throat, chest, and lungs—which includes diptheria, bronchitis, incipient consumption, pleurisy, croup, etc.—with the greatest success. Great relief is afforded in advanced stages of consumption. Rheumatism, paralysis, neuralgia, fever and ague, dropsy, etc., etc., are also cured quickly, pleasantly, and economically. No medicine whatever.

HOME MANUFACTURES.—It is the duty of every Californian to give encouragement to the productions of our own State, and, all other things being equal, preference should be shown to our manufactures. Now, in the matter of cloth, things are at least equal, and when we examine the fine suits of fashionable clothing for sale at Quincy Hall, we incline to the idea that our productions have the advantage. This is the pioneer establishment in manufacturing clothing from California cloth, having commenced it in April last. Their work gives general satisfaction, and we are pleased to learn that their business in this line is steadily increasing. Our advice to our readers is, to call and examine for themselves at Nos. 545, 557 and 549 Washington street.—Call.

A DAINTY BRANCH OF ART.—A high reputation awaits Mrs. Read for the exquisite workmanship and general adaptability to their purpose of the Ladies' Skirt Supporters and Chest Expanders, of which she made such fine display at the late Fair. Her "Lady's Bust" is another aid to feminine beauty, which confers perfection on the wearer. Mrs. Read's establishment, 109 Montgomery street, is richly worth a visit.—San Francisco Sunday Mercury.

A TRUE STORY.

DEDICATED TO THE SICK.

THERE dwelt in Sacramento a pale, bilious mechanic,
His muscles were strengthless, his blood it was chill;
And the wife of his bosom believed, in her panic,
The husband she worshipped was hopelessly ill.
Seeking daily for help, in her wifely devotion,
All vainly she tried pill, powder and potion—
Till at last, when a prey to grief's wildest emotion,
Of HOSTETTER'S BITTERS she heard from a friend.

She purchased the cordial, half hoping, half fearing,
A prayer on her lip and a tear in her eye;
And taking his hand, with words kindly and cheering,
Besought him the tonic for her sake to try.
As he drank, a new life through his system seemed stealing,
Each following draft did its mission of healing,
Until, strong in health and most grateful in feeling,
He told the "true story" here twined into song.

It is also proper to state that the Bitters are sold exclusively in glass, and never, under any circumstances, by the gallon or barrel. Imposters and imitators are abroad, and the only safeguard the public have against them is to see that the Bitters they buy have the engraved label and note of hand of Messrs. Hostetter & Smith, and their proprietary stamp over the cork of the bottle.

THE CONNECTICUT LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY organized in 1847, with a guaranteed capital of $50,000; Eliphalet A. Bulkley was its first President, and Guy R. Phelps, Secretary. This company has been successful from the first, and has grown to be, in the number of its policy-holders, the largest company in the world, and its business for the past year was greater than that of any other Life Insurance Company in the world. The whole number of policies issued is 43,386, of which 24,054 are now in force, covering an aggregate risk of over $60,000,000. It has paid in losses, on 1,729 lives, the sum of $3,952,762; and in dividends, $2,812,904. Its capital and assets, February 1st, were $7,918,896, nearly eight millions. During the year ending February 1st, 8,115 policies were issued, $182,387 were paid in losses, on 201 lives, and $343,767 in dividends; its receipts for premiums were $2,381,954, and for interest on investments $556,608, making total receipts for the year, $2,938,562, nearly three millions. During the past four years, its interest on investments has been more than sufficient to pay the losses. The present officers of the Connecticut Mutual Life are, James Goodwin, President; Guy R. Phelps, Secretary.

TRIMMINGS.—MRS. NORCROSS, No. 5 Masonic Temple, Montgomery street, is prepared to fill orders for civic and military at the shortest notice; also, invites the ladies to call and examine trimmings for Opera Cloaks received per steamer from New York. Mrs. Norcross has a Show Case on exhibition at the Fair, containing goods which for elegance and taste are not surpassed by any other establishment on the Pacific coast.—San Francisco Leader, Sept. 16th.

DR. C. W. MOORE'S MEDICAL AND SURGICAL INSTITUTE.—In speaking of this Institution, the Sunday Mercury says: "Aside from the most skilful treatment and nursing, the large, airy and elegantly-furnished rooms, will enable the patients to enjoy all the comforts and luxuries of a home. All in all, we regard Dr. Moore and his Institute a most valuable acquisition to the Pacific Coast—the need of which we have long since felt." See advertisement.

MANY OF THE DISEASES which hitherto baffled and defied the highest medical skill, are now speedily cured by Dr. H. A. BENTON, whose processes of applying electricity receive the approbation of all prominent physicians. The nerves are directly reached, and patients suffering from chronic complaints find almost immediate relief, and rapidly recover their former healthy condition. Dr. Benton is a physician of excellent reputation, and as a Medical Electrician occupies the front rank in his profession.—Golden Era.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direst poisons, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds, purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known, then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing amyl or fusil oil, a mortal poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, antibilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. Beware of imitations and impostures.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

RARE CHANCE

TO SECURE

DESIRABLE HOMESTEADS.

THE CALIFORNIA HOMESTEAD ASSOCIATION HAS been formed to enable its members, by paying a few dollars monthly, to obtain desirable Homesteads in the city of San Francisco. In order to secure a beautiful location, as well as cheap property, they have selected Block 540, bounded by Broderick, Pine, Baker and California streets, and Block 541, bounded by Broderick, California, Baker and Sacramento streets, all of the Western Addition. The property is within three blocks of the Central Railroad, and can be reached in a few minutes from the centre of the city. It is covered with fine trees and shrubbery, is sheltered from the winds, and is in every way most eligibly located for homestead purposes.

The lots are, nearly all, 27 1-2 feet front by 137 1-2 feet deep. The Capital Stock is divided into 69 shares, of $250 each. Shareholders will pay $10 per month on each share taken for the term of 25 months. When six monthly payments been made, the property will be divided among the members, and they will receive contracts for deeds to the lots to which they will be entitled, that will enable them to take possession of the same, and erect buildings thereon. In no other way can Homestead Lots in this city be thus easily obtained, and for so small an outlay.

Parties who may wish to subscribe to the Capital Stock, can see a map of the property and obtain full particulars, by calling at the office of the Secretary, 305 Montgomery street, corner of Pine. The title to the property is perfect.

TO THE LADIES OF CALIFORNIA.

IT IS A FACT, which all should know, that

Washing may be Done for Half the Cost,

and in half the time, required by pursuing the method now in use. An enormous waste of time and materials attends the old and ordinary process. And this is not because a better method is not known, but because housewives persist in treading in the beaten track followed by their mothers and grandmothers before them, opposing every change, and refusing even TO MAKE A FAIR TRIAL of those new inventions which scientific research has produced.

If the housekeepers of San Francisco and of the State will try the

simply by way of experiment, they will be amazed to find how much unnecessary labor may be saved by its use. It may be obtained at all the principal Groceries of the city, or in quantities of the Agents, HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN.

The use of the EXTRACT renders "rubbing," "pounding," "washboards," and all the severe drudgery of the usual method quite unnecessary. It thoroughly cleanses, without injuring the clothes. In short, it works such wonders as no one will credit without witnessing them. All that the inventor asks of any doubting housewife is

A SINGLE TRIAL.

The following certificate from the State Assayer, furnished after an analysis of the EXTRACT, speaks for itself:

A. ENQUOIS—Dear Sir: I have examined the sample of liquid handed me, and find it free from acid or any substance that would be injurious to clothing.

Very respectfully, B. B. THAYER.

Campaign of 1865!

FIRST PREMIUM

AWARDED THE FLORENCE!

AT THE

State Fair of California,

BY A COMMITTEE COMPOSED OF THE

BEST MECHANICAL TALENT OF THE STATE.

THE REPORT:

"FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE.—After a careful investigation of this NEW AND BEAUTIFUL MACHINE, viewing it as we do in a mechanical point of view, we consider that it is in many respects worthy of much praise, particularly that portion of its mechanical arrangement by which the REVERSIBLE motion is obtained, which is simplicity itself, and in our opinion worthy of special consideration; also, the

COMPLETE AND POSITIVE CONTROL OVER THE TENSION,

as exhibited in this Machine, along with the mechanical arrangement for taking up the slack of the thread, as was shown in sewing without any alteration, and without any stoppage of Machine,

FROM THE FINEST LACE TO FOUR THICKNESSES OF LEATHER.

"Your Committee, therefore, after a close and careful investigation, consider it ONE OF THE BEST AND MOST IMPORTANT IMPROVED MACHINES NOW IN USE.

"We, therefore, in view of the above facts, award it the FIRST AND HIGHEST PREMIUM.

THE MOUSE-TRAP.

"We that have free souls, it touches us not."

HAMLET—Act III., Scene 2.

THE CALIFORNIAN will of course be full of earthquakes this week. We had such a splendid description of the Mattole earthqnake last week, that we scarcely like to say anything about the San Francisco earthquake. We carefully looked out for the "protruding eyes" mentioned by the Alta's correspondent, and after an examination of some scores of people, we came to the conclusion that earthqnakes do not affect San Franciscans in the same manner that they affect Mattolians. They weren't palsied, and their eyes didn't protrude. Every one stopped shaking as soon as the earthquake did. The Mattole quaker says: "The heavy weight of my inclination broke my pen upon the paper." The heavy weight of our inclination on Sunday last, made us break and run. We, like the Mattole man, had a tendency to weaken; we yielded to it; we weakened, and, in fact, felt very weak-kneed for fully three seconds. On the whole, we didn't like it. All the daily papers have been engaged ever since Sunday in propping up the city and the faith of the inhabitants with columns of statistics shewing that, though a man may be killed by an earthquake, the chances are greatly in favor of his escaping. The man who won't take the odds offered by the Bulletin, has no speculation in his eyes. This is all very well as far as it goes, but it is not enough. This sort of thing must he put a stop to, if for no other reason than that it interrupts the children in the public schools while they are at their lessons. We, like the Mattole man, are just beginning to recover our senses again, and the most profitable use to which we can put them is to hit upon a scheme by which the city of San Francisco can be insured against the recurrence of earthqunkes. We have it. It is pretty generally admitted that earthquakes are caused by something in the earth's inside that ought to come out. We must perform an operation on Mother Earth—"cleanse the stuff'd bosom of that perilous stuff which weighs upon the heart"—we must bring the disease to the surface or it will be the death of her. Let a company he incorporated immediately to sink a shaft into Mount Diablo; if this shaft is only sunk deep enough there is no doubt that the borers will, in course of time, strike fire, an erruption will be produced, and poor old Mother Earth will feel easier in her inside. It is the healing up of that old sore that gives her all this trouble. Mount Hood gives her some ease at present, but that is not near enough. We might perhaps run a tunnel through the base and lay down a railroad which would act as a seton and ullay the inflamution, but the best way will he to re-open the old crater and bore down until fire is struck; there is a probability of striking oil before fire is reached, which would repay the stockholders in this company for their investment. The chief object, however, is to put a stop to earthquakes. The next one will probably not he so considerate as the last, which came on Sunday that it might not interfere with business, and will very likely cause more inconvenience. We sincerely trust that this little matter will be attended to before any more damage is done to brick buildings in this city.

GENERAL HOWARD is reported to have given the following toast at a dinner party: "The Maine Law—The True Beverage of a Soldier." How the Maine Law can he the true beverage of a soldier is a puzzle. General Howard said: "I am from the State of Maine. I don't go back on my State." Perhaps, it is better to be in the State of Maine than in a state of intoxication; but we are sorry that the General cannot plead intoxication as an excuse for calling the Maine Law "a beverage."

ECHO was a very respectable young lady, and though, when she wasted away to nothing, she, like a true woman, would not give up her right to have the last word, we do not wish her to be libelled. Echo doesn't talk half the nonsense which is attributed to her. A paragraph, under the title, "What the Echo Answers," is going the rounds of the press, which makes Echo out a perfect fool. Here is a specimen:

"What must he done to conduct a newspaper right?—Write."

This is about as false a statement as could be made. The conductor of a newspaper had better write as little as possible. The most successful conductors of newspapers have been those who have never written a line for the press. Again:

"What would be a blind man's greatest delight?—Light."

Now, what use would light be to a blind man? If a man is blind, he cannot see light, and is therefore just as happy in the dark. Here is a query which any decently-grammatical Echo would scorn to answer in the style in which this unhappy, libelled Echo is said to reply:

"Who commits the greatest abominations?—Nations."

Nations commits the greatest abominations; does they? If Echo answered us in such a fashion as that, we would immediately cease our inquiries in disgust. We think the wretch who tormented poor Echo by the above insane questions, and half a dozen more of the same description, might have had the decency to make amends by asking the question, "Ought a drunken fool, who babbles to echoes, to give his old rye up?" that Echo might at length have the satisfaction of answering: "Dry up!"

A COMMUNICATION, signed "Many," appears in the Call, asking that paper the origin of the word "Fenian." The Call replies in a long rigmarole of nonsense about one Fion McCumhall, King of Leinster, but does not answer the inquiry of "Many." We have great pleasure in giving the true origin of the term "Fenian." We utterly ignore the authenticity of Mooney's History of Ireland, in which the Call has so much faith; we draw our information from one of the ancient Irish bards—which of them we refuse to state, lest the Call should be as wise as we are. Mr. Mooney is correct in his statement that "Fion, the renowned General-in-Chief of the Irish Militia, was a son of Cumhall and Muria," but why did he omit to say that the mother of Fion has given her name to an important chemical combination, muriatic acid being named after Muria, whose disposition was slightly acid. But this has nothing to do with the origin of the word "Fenian." The old bard, from whom we obtain our information, relates that Shamus an Poltaugh, the first king of Donnegal, fell in love with a mermaid, and, in spite of the opposition offered by St. Patrick, was married to her. The offspring of this marriage was a boy, who resembled other human beings in every respect, save that a fin extended the entire length of his dorsal column, and, in consequence of this dorsal fin, his youthful companions nicknamed him the "Finny-un." When enraged, the young Catha na Dioul, as he was named by his father, would erect his dorsal fin, and from this action first originated the phrase, "getting one's back up." As, one thousand years ago, the youthful Celts exclaimed: "The Finny-un 's got his back up again," so do we at the present day say: "There's the Fenian got his back up."

THE Boston Saturday Evening Gazette goes into ecstacies over Bierstadt's picture of Mount Hood. It says it is not so sensational as his last work. That is because Bierstadt was in too much of a hurry. Why couldn't he wait until Mount Hood was in a state of eruption, and have thrown a little warmth into his picture. We hope some one has had consideration enough to telegraph to him to alter Mount Hood to suit the present time. He saw Mount Hood like a quiet old lady, with a snowy white cap on, tied with beautiful green ribbons. He ought to see it now with its cap thrown off, a regular red-headed roarer. Mount Hood of to-day, with its revolutionary bonnet rouge, is very different from Bierstadt's Mount Hood. Let him for truth's sake alter his picture, which he painted before he knew that this demure, white-capped mountain avait sa tete si pres du bonnet. The Gazette says Bierstadt's fame may rest on Mount Hood; let it not be founded on a false (Mount) Hood.

THE following advertisement appears in an evening paper:

THE GENTLEMAN who, about 18 months ago, received $150 from the old widow living on North Beach, will please leave his card, addressed to Mrs. B., at this office, as she has moved away and forgotten his name and business place.

We should like to become acquainted with "the old widow living on North Beach." B stands for benevolence in this case most decidedly. Are there many old widows who would lend a gentleman $150, and actually forget his name? We sincerely trust that, for the sake of other gentlemen who may be in want of $150—and there are such—that the old widow at North Beach will not have cause to regret the confidence she reposed in the gentleman whose name and place of business she has forgotten.

WE clip the following extraordinary paragraph from an exchange:

"The tenor, Schnorr, died in Germany a short time ago. He was the only living tenor who could successfully interpret the music of the future."

Could he always interpret the music of the future? Dead tenors we may trust take part in the music of the future. How easily we could have understood a statement that he was the only living tenor who could successfully interpret the music of sleep—we could have fully realized that the music of sleep would be most successfully interpreted by a Schnorr. For fear of the Gold Hill News attempting to teach us, we may remark that Richard Wagner, the composer of Tannhauser, is the originator of the phrase, "the music of the future" which he used concerning his own music to express his conviction that it was a little ahead of anything else. The music of his last opera, Tristan and Isolde is especially the music of the future, and Wagner said that no one but Schnorr could sing it. Schnorr accomplished the feat, but it killed him; the overwork and vexation which singing Wagner's music of the future caused him, resulted in his departing this present life for the future state, where we may hope he, with the heavenly choir, is singing sweeter music than mortal ears have heard.

WE have heard of a number of curious coincidences arising out of the occurrence of the earthquake on Sunday last. Almost every one has some curious thing to tell about it. Jones was just thinking of earthquakes when he felt the first vibration; Smith was reading the Last Days of Pompeii when he felt the shock; and just at that moment Mount Hood must have been in a state of eruption—extraordinary coincidence, wasn't it?—and, if Sunday and Monday had been the last days of San Francisco, it would have been more so; Robinson was just at that moment talking about the Shakers, and arguing that they were humbugs, when the earthquake began—queer, wasn't it? Perhaps, the most extraordinary thing was that no less than three hundred persons were, at the moment the vibration commenced, engaged in reading the remarks on the Mattole earthquake, in last week's MOUSE-TRAP. There is nothing strange in the fact that three hundred persons, or even three thousand, were reading the MOUSE-TRAP, but it did seem strange that they should all be reading that bit about the earthquake. We are sorry to say that twenty-five young ladies who ought to know better, declared that they believed the earthquake was "a judgment on that horrid, wicked MOUSE TRAP man for making fun of the Mattole earthquake, and saying that that dear Doctor Scudder, who is so nice, wanted earthquakes to come as missionaries to soften obdurate hearts." This has shocked us even more than the earthquake, particularly as the young ladies were all good-looking. From the bottom of our heart we pity them and regret their want of charity. We knew there was an earthquake coming, and we wrote that article just to get people a little prepared beforehand and prevent nice young ladies from being frightened by it.

THE New York Leader is really a very creditable paper. If its original matter is not very brilliant, it displays admirable taste in its selections. The Leader is a little worried about the MOUSE-TRAP, which, it says, is "full of feeblenesses." It, in the kindest manner, took out six little batches of feeblenesses, some little time ago, and, for fear of injuring the MOUSE-TRAP, published them as Leader editorial paragraphs. This was, indeed, kind; we thanked the Leader for its consideration, and this ungrateful paper sneers at us in return for our feebleness. Is the noble instinct of gratitude to be accounted a weakness! If so, it is a weakness which we glory in. We take this opportunity of renewing the assurances of our distinguished regard and esteem for the Leader, and again in all sincerity assure it that we shall be happy to help it along by allowing it to take as many "feeblenesses" as it pleases from the MOUSE-TRAP, provided it will not tell where it got them from.

POOR old Mrs. Grundy is dead. The dear old creature could not keep alive on water gruel, and she had conscientious scruples against taking a dram, and determined to avoid spirit. The publishers, in their valedictory, say that, if they had only succeeded in keeping Mrs. Grundy alive, they would have established a new era in the Comic Literature of America. Heaven be praised that they were prevented, if the first numbers of Mrs. Grundy contained the new patent American fun. San Francisco publishes the comic paper of the United States. Little PUCK is now nearly a year old; he was always a lively little sprite, and grows stronger every month. He has not yet cut all his teeth, but he has another wisdom tooth or two coming. Mrs. Grundy was mortal, and she died. PUCK is immortal; PUCK's alive!

WE wonder what the following, which we clip from an exchange, means:

"'No sardines admitted,' is one of the common hotel notices in the Pennsylvania oil region."

Why object to sardines in oil?

TREM.

A NIGHT'S LODGING IN PARIS.

IN 18—, before I had taken my degree at Oxford, and before by my uncle's death I had succeeded to the title, I made arrangements to spend the whole of the long vacation abroad. I was by no means desirous of a solitary journey, and was glad to find that ——, whose rooms were on the same staircase with my own at Brasenose, and with whom I was tolerably intimate, was also meditating a continental tour. We made arrangements for starting together at the end of the summer term, and in order to lose no time, I determined not to go into Scotland to my mother before my departure, but to travel as quickly as possible to Dover. ——— had as little to detain him as I. We slept a night in the capital, and a night in the port, and three days after leaving Oxford were lodged in the Hotel Dessin. Neither of us had ever left England before, and we were both full of the spirit of enjoyment.

The quaint costumes, the new cookery, the ponderous diligences—but I won't trouble you with a diluted road-book. I do not wish to give you my crude ideas on the state of society and the aspects of the buildings in France, but the history of one night in Paris. We reached that city, still together, but the first fortnight of our journey had taught us that we were not very well suited for companions. It was my delight to stop to sketch some tawny old market-woman, in her stiff white cap; I could spend a whole day in a church, and have still somewhere a portfolio full of corbels and screens and cornices, marked St Omer, Lille, Cambrai, Amiens, and other places of smaller note. ——— grew terribly tired of all this. He said the scenery was detestable, he thought all the churches were shockingly out of repair, and was anxious to hasten his arrival in the French metropolis. But in Paris we were separated more than ever. In addition to the incongruity of our tastes, political feeling tended to keep us apart. We both had a fair number of introductions to families moving in good society. The friends who were most pleased with ———, and with whom ——— was most pleased, though by birth entitled to hold their heads as high as any of the blue-blooded inhabitants of Faubourg St. Germain, had been induced to give their countenance—so they regarded the transaction—to the court of the Citizen King.

An old friend of my mother's, married to a Marquis de ——, who took me under her especial protection, assured me that it was impossible for the loyal hearts who still cherished love and hope for the (temporarily) fallen cause of the white flag, to associate with those who had degraded their race by recognizing the position of an usurpation as detestable as it would be ephemeral. I confess that I cared very little whether the older or younger branch of the Bourbons issued the invitations for the assemblies at the Tuileries, and I had small hopes that Charles X. would be recalled.

But I grew to like Madame de ——, and, as a necessary consequence, formed different acquaintances from those of my fellow-traveller. We had been in Paris about three weeks, and though we were staying in the same hotel, I had not seen ——— for several days, We met by accident on the staircase of the hotel.

"We are quite strangers; where are you going?"

"To call on Madame de ——."

"What! still the legitimist marquise! Shall we dine together?"

"By all means. Meet me here at six."

——— agreed, and so we parted. It was about three o'clock in the afternoon.

The day was intensely hot. Reflected backwards and forwards on the white stone house-fronts, the sun's rays seemed to scorch up all that was breatheable in the atmosphere. The stones of the streets were hot to the tread. I entered the gardens of the Tuileries, hoping to find some slight shade for my dazzled eyes. I know of few scenes brighter than those Tuileries gardens. You have seen them often, of course. The water was mounting and falling with its musical plash in the shallow basin, wherein two little boys, under the superintendence of a black-eyed bonne, were swimming their toy-boats.

More children and more nurses were playing among the orange trees. Two or three National Guards were lounging about. Nor were other uniforms wanting to give color to the picture. The tri-colored bunting flapped lazily over the dome of the palace. A man in a queer snuffy-brown coat walked by: he had on green spectacles, and his button-hole showed a shred of ribbon. You wonder how I remember all this? You have no idea how idellibly the scene is stamped on my memory. It was the first time. But you must hear all in order. I sat for perhaps twenty minutes listening idly to the plashing fountain, wondering whether Auguste or Jules—he must have been either Auguste or Jules—would get his boat within reach by judiciously shelling over it with pebbles, fancying now Napoleon pinching some honored ear, or the longed-for Louis dozing over his favorite Horace in that very garden, watching the figure of the man in the brown coat and the green spectacles, growing "fine by degrees" in the narrowing vista of trees.

Then I thought of Madame de ——— and my visit; but remembered that it would be more decorously paid in the evening than in the afternoon. What should I do with myself? I felt strangely disinclined to move. And my head? What is it that seems to weigh it down? Is it the sun and the heat? I never felt anything like it before. The pain attacked me suddenly. Pain! It was hardly pain. Perhaps the sensation cannot be described to those who have not felt it. I had suffered from a violent headache for some days, but my head did not ache now. It felt dull and heavy. My natural impulse was to lift my hand to my brow. I willed the movement of my arm, if I may so express myself; but no movement resulted. I had no power to stir. I then became sensible that my respiration grew feebler, and that there was a kind of lull in the pulsation of my heart. It is difficult for me, as I have said already, to describe my condition. I can only say that I seemed suddenly to have less life in me; my vital powers seemed to dwindle down to the smallest possible force. I existed, because I was conscious, but that was all.

My senses remained to me, but not all in equal strength. The plashing of the fountain was as distinct as before the paroxysm; my eyesight was slightly dimmed.

Whether I could smell or taste, of course I could not tell. Of touch I had hardly any sense at all.

All this I tell you at this point, for at the moment of my attack I seemed thoroughly aware of my condition. One thing only excepted. For ten minutes, as I should imagine, I sat wondering at what had befallen me. Then I bethought me of calling for help. There were a score of people within the sound of my voice. I willed to cry, but there was no sound. My tongue refused to articulate. I was horror-struck, but I was sensible of none of the usual symptoms of horror. My heart did not beat more quickly. I could feel no sweat on my brow. Was this death? No; it could not surely be death. I had all my wits about me, and all my impressions were mundane. The life of Paris was moving round me just as it was wont. I alone was motionless.

Then there flashed across me the recollection of a strange tale of cataleptic seizure, in which my grandfather's name had figured. I remembered that my mother had seemed distressed that the subject should be mentioned; the guest who had made casual allusion to it turned the conversation, and I had really thought little more about the matter. I remembered two mysterious expressions about the letters which I had received from my mother immediately before my departure from England, expressions which, when read in the light of my present brief experience, led me to the opinion that my family must be cursed by some fearful hereditary evil, an evil which my mother had never yet dared to communicate to me.

"I am very anxious," she had written, "about your journey. Of course, you will not travel alone. Who is to be your companion? Do I know him? I know that you like society, my dear boy, and I should be sorry to think of your wandering through strange cities alone. Nothing is more melancholy. Pray let me know if you are intimate with your proposed compagnon de voyage, and if you are likely to remain together for the whole of your tour."

All these thoughts flashed through my brain in a very few seconds. I knew that I must have fallen into a kind of trance. I felt horror and alarm, of a vague and indefinite kind, but I also felt intense curiosity. What would befall me? How long should I sit in those Tuileries gardens? Would the fit soon leave me?

I was sitting on a seat with a back to it, a few feet removed from the main alley of the garden. My arms were folded, my head was slightly drooped on my breast, my legs were crossed. There was nothing in my attitude to attract attention, so I sat rigid and immovable for what seemed to me an age. I imagined all kinds of possible terminations to my adventure. I should be found, of course. I should be carried to my hotel; doctors would be sent for; I should learn what was the matter, and I should probably recover; these fits were rarely of long duration. Carried to my hotel!

They would find my pocket-book in my pocket, containing letters addressed á Monsieur ——, Hotel de ——. Would they? Was my pocket-book in its place? I could not feel. Suppose the pocket-book was left, as was sometimes the case, in another coat? What other means of identification would remain? A seal with a coat of arms on it, a hat with an English maker's name; neither of much use in Paris. But what matter was it who I was, or where I lived? I should, of course, be taken to the Hotel Dieu. What will they do to me, I wonder? Will they—ha! what was that?

"Qu'est ce que tu fais donc, petit méchant! Demande pardon a ce monsieur que tu as —"

It was the bonne who spoke. Alphonse, or Jules, in his infantile gyrations, had stumbled against me. He knocked one leg off the other, and the shock threw me into a posture so obtrusively unnatural, that I could not longer remain unnoticed. The nurse stopped short in her expostulation.

"Mais, mon Dieu! Il est mort!"

No, I am not dead, I thought, but I am very glad that you have found out that I am not wholesomely alive. Now I shall be properly cared for. In a very few moments I was the centre of a small crowd, and presently two or three gendarmes shouldered their way through the starers. They lifted me up, and laid me along the bench. I felt—no, I did not feel; I was aware that I was quite stiff. One of them put his hand on my breast, and held it there awhile.

"Son cœur ne bat plus."

"Tatez donc son pouls."

"Il n'y pas de mouvement. Il a bien l'air d'être mort."

"Pauvre jenne homme! Il a été passablement beau!"

(This from the bonne.)

"Il a été!"

It smote very sadly on my ears, that past tense.

"Eloignez-vous donc!" cried one of the officials.

The little group of bystanders fell back some paces, and a search was commenced in my pockets for some name and address. I was excited by the thought of this search. You see how difficult it is for me to express myself. I cannot say "I trembled," "I held my breath," "my pulse beat quicker;" there was no palpable evidence of my agitation. But I was excited.

"Voyons: qu'est ce qu'il possede, le joli garçon? Il est assez chic!"

"Un monchoir. Un chiffre au coin. Un portecigare. Rien dedans. C'est dommage."

"C'est une montre de priz. Mais n'y a-t-il pas de portefeuille?"

No, there was no pocket-book. My heart sank; at least I felt as though my heart ought to have sunk. I cannot tell how long this search occupied. My consciousness seemed now to become a little duller. Not by any means lost: only a little less acute than in ordinary life. In the meanwhile a stretcher had been brought to the ground. I was lifted thereon, something was put over my face, and they bore me away. I could hear the fountain plashing, and the many children's voices ringing through the avenues. Oh, that I could have spoken! Oh, for the power to say but one word!

We passed out of the garden; I could not be sure in what direction. By the noise of traffic I perceived that we entered the crowded street. Presently we stopped; a door was opened and shut, and the hum of the moving world ceased. I was sensible that I was no longer being carried along, and guessed aright that I was in some office of the police. Here, I thought, the worst of my troubles must end.

They will send for a doctor; he will know of the probable duration of the fit, and will take such measures as will mollify its most painful symptoms, or, perhaps, release me from it altogether. From the confused murmur of several voices in conversation, which sounded in my ears, I gathered that in a room communicating with that in which I lay the officials were deliberating on my condition. I could not distinguish the words. Presently the voices grew plainer, and the speakers were evidently approaching. The face-cloth was removed. There were the same gendarmes who had discovered me in the garden, accompanied by several more. And with them—yes, there was no doubt of it—with them entered the little old gentleman in brown coat and green spectacles, whom I remembered to have seen before my seizure. This, then, was the long-desired physician; he would tell these blunderers that I was not dead.

"He is stiff already. Such is not unfrequently the case with disease of the heart. I should have believed him dead before the hour which you say. In the garden of the Tuileries? I made there a promenade myself this afternoon. And neither name nor address? That is droll. Ah! it is already six hours! And I am invited to dine in a quarter of an hour! Poor young man! Close his eye-lids, Louis; they have an expression quite living. Monsieur will permit me to sign the proces-verbal without delay? Let us go."

So much for my hopes of the doctor. And then an authoritative voice said:

"Vous le porterez la bas tout de suite, Louis."

A door shut, and there was silence.

I began now to realize the awful horror of my position. Officially declared to be dead, I experienced all those emotions which are said to be felt by the dying in cases where an accident plunges them from the enjoyment of health and life to the immediate prospect of passing to another world. My past actions rose in quick succession in my thoughts. I reflected on the frivolity of many of my occupations, on the time I had thrown away, and the small use I had been to anybody. I remembered that my mother's last letter, full, as were all her letters, of expressions of the fondest endearment, had not been answered. And that lie that I had told at school! and my young life cut off horribly and mysteriously, none to be near me dying, none to know what had become of me. And ——, he would be waiting to dine with me.

Where would he dine? I wondered. What would he do to find me? Perhaps I might yet recover before—before what? Frightful, damning thought. I was dead; I should be buried. I tried to pray. It was not death I feared, I said to myself; it was the manner of death.

Yet through all this I must confess that my agony was not so intense as now—knowing the circumstances in which I was placed—I should suppose it might have been. From my apathy or hope, my mind was very calm, and I was very curious. I speculated on what would befall me almost as though I had been the unconcerned spectator of the adventures of another.

And what did "la bas" mean? The door opened again. My eyelids were closed now, and I could not see who entered. I need hardly say that I could not open my eyes. The voices were none of those which I had already heard. I was lifted again. The sounds of the street fell on my ear with a sound slightly dulled, and I felt that I was covered with some kind of cloth. My bearers walked for some ten or fifteen minutes. There was a fresh sound of opening and shutting doors, and I was thrown rudely on some hard surface; not laid decently, as if I had been in the office of the gendarmes, but thrown down like a worthless burden. Could I complain? Was I not officially dead?

But what was this? I felt rough pecks at my arms and legs. I was being stripped of my clothes. Was this for the coffin? I thought now that all was over, and I felt weary and confused. A partial blunting of my senses spared me much of the pain I must otherwise have suffered. I waited, still perfectly conscious of all that was going on around me, as far as any one can be conscious of what he does not see, and wondering what would happen next. I was stripped of my clothes—stripped entirely. Then I was carried through another door. A faint and sickly stench immediately smote my sense of smell. I was laid down on my back on an inclined surface, my head somewhat higher than my feet. A horrible chill ran through me. Was this the grave? I could not tell. Nothing covered me, with the exception of a cloth which had been thrown over my loins. Was I in a coffin, waiting for a pauper's burial on the morrow? Oh, God! to what should I awake!

No. It could not be the grave. It must be——the thought flashed across me in an instant. How came it that I had not thought of it before? That of course was the destination of the unclaimed dead. That of course was what was meant by the la bas of the gendarme. I was in the morgue!

You may think it strange, but my first feeling was one of relief. To be buried alive was my great dread. That fate was certainly postponed. Perhaps I might be saved from it altogether. So for some time I lay congratulating myself on the renewed probability of my safety. I should be here, perhaps, for days. It would be remarked that my body showed no signs of decomposition. Possibly —— would seek me in this grim receptacle of the dead. At any rate, there was hope. Should I starve to death? No; surely in cases of catalepsy the appetite is all but dead. The little life left in the body requires but little sustenance. At least, I felt no hunger. There was hope!

Then came a re-action. This horrible place that I was in! and I bound hand and foot as tightly as Lazarus in his grave-clothes. A deadly cold seemed to chill all my frame. And always that faint-fetid stench telling me of my—hideous thought!—of my companions. I was not alone. I had never seen it. I pictured to myself the maimed and rotting corpse of some unhappy suicide, recovered too late from the current of the Seine: for such suicides, I had heard, were the most frequent denizens of the morgue. How close was I to that loathesome body? Could I touch it if I were able to put out my hand?

Filled with these fearful fancies, I hoped that the fit might not leave me till it was day. My blind helplessness was a sort of protection to me. To have all my horrors of life restored to me, and to be imprisoned for hours in that hideous place, would kill me in reality, I thought. It was better to lie there impotent as I was. If I could only sleep; if I only could escape from that unconsciousness which was all that was left to me.

I lay tortured and distracted by these reflections for what seemed to be many hours. Soon, I expected, it would be day. And then?

But now a strange shiver shot all over my frame. The blood seemed to rush to my head and fill it with violent darting pains. A tingling, somewnat resembling that of cramp, ran along my extremities. Did these mean that the paroxysm was coming to an end—that I could move—that I could feel—that I could speak? I hardly wished the surmise to be true, as yet. The pain in my head grew more acute. Instinctively I willed to lift my hand, and press it on my aching forehead. The limb obeyed the volition.

You will perhaps understand me me when I say that, though this movement of my arm came to me as a kind of order of release, I yet hesitated to make trial of my recovered powers. I still kept my eyelids down. I held my hand fixed on my brow. Then the idea sprang up in my brain of using all my force to effect my escape from my foul prison. I made a low sound with my voice. I then muttered several articulate words. My tongue obeyed me. I moved my arm to my side again, and raised one of my legs. The pain in my head was less. The shivering had altogether ceased. Still I was affected by a strange weariness—a disinclination to use the smallest exertion. Courage! I thought; up, and save yourself! I slowly opened my eyes. A little light from a dull moon struggled in through a skylight over my head, and by its help I could distinguish with tolerable clearness the aspect of my lodging. Immediately in front of me it shimmered on panes of glass. Through these, as I surmised, my friends would seek me. It fell on some six or seven hard cold beds of stone or metal, like the slabs in a fishmonger's shop. On several it showed nothing but the smooth shining surface. On two others, besides my own, it rested with a dull gleam on something that had once been the spirit of a man. One of these corpses looked little more deadly than I did myself. It was lying next to my own couch; and I could clearly see the fair and gentle features of a well looking lad of some fifteen or sixteen years, drowned, in all likelihood, in the river that ran behind me. His face showed few or no signs of a violent death. A slight abrasion on his cheek-bone was all the disfigurement. His close-cropped curly hair looked full of life, and his lips were almost smiling. The other body was as far removed from me as the size of the room would permit. I could just see a mass of discolored flesh. The moon seemed to make a kind of foul halo over its misshapen outline. The stench of the dead smote my nostrils again, and I turned to the wall with a shudder. I looked behind me. There all the clothes of the dead were hanging, waiting the recognition of the interested, or the criticisms and jests of the inquisitive. I now rose, and, groping among my own, partly dressed myself with as little delay as possible, for I was bitterly cold. But I did this with no little difficulty; I was very weak. Now, I thought, is there any one near me who will hear me cry out? The work-people will probably be soon going out to their labor; or, perhaps, some gendarme is left to watch in the precincts of this place. What time was it, exactly? I wondered. I felt for my watch in my pockets, but it was not to be found. Then I tried the door; locked tight; the windows; fast too. Here my strength failed me. I tried to knock on the panes of glass, but I felt myself sinking to the ground. I tried to call aloud, but my cry was very feeble. After this, I remember nothing more of the night. Worn out with pain and anxiety, utterly exhausted by the attack to which I had been subjected, I became totally insensible.

When I came to myself again it was broad daylight. I found myself lying crouched up in a corner of the room. I lifted my eyes for a moment to the bodies of the two occupied slabs, with a strange fancy that they, too, might have been shut up alive. The corpse of the youth was just as it had been in the night, lying as if asleep. And the other? How should that be again a receptacle of life? Bronzed and swollen, it was a loathsome sight to see. For an instant I said, "It is the body of a negro." It was no negro; it had not that black skin in life. And a sight like that is the attraction for a crowd every day. But I was in no condition to indulge in reflections on others; I was too weak to think for myself. I lay still, huddled in the corner, waiting.

At last a key rattled in a lock. The functionary in charge of the establishment opened a door, not the door of the part of the room in which were the bodies, but a door opening into the little passage behind the windows. I could see him through the panes of glass proceeding along the passage, but he did not turn his head. I made as loud a cry as my strength would allow. He was just disappearing through the farther room, when he suddenly turned and looked through the glass. Under any other circumstances, I should have smiled at the man's expression of ludicrous perplexity. His eyes opened to their utmost extent, and he nervously twisted his finger in an end of his moustache. I beckoned feebly with my hand. In another minute he was by my side.

"Mon Dieu! On ne sait jamais ce qui pet arriver! Cependant il a encore bien l'air d'étre un cadavre. Filons au moins de cette diable d'odeur."

Muttering these words between his teeth, he took hold of my hand, perceived in an instant how utterly weak and helpless I was, lifted me in his arms, and carried me out of the morgue. I have never seen my one night's lodging since.

Now I was able to tell where I could be taken. And now the worst of my troubles were over; but the fit left lasting and severe effects. I was not able to leave my room for a fortnight, and during that time only very gradually recovered my shattered strength.

Assured by my physicians that I was in no vital danger, I did not distress my mother by informing her of my condition. But as soon as I was strong enough to travel I left Paris, and travelled as rapidly as was possible to our northern home. My mother was terribly agitated when she saw that I had been ill; more so than was explicable by the mere fact of my having suffered from a malady which had both come and gone.

On hearing my narrative of all that had befallen me she wept passionately, and accused herself as the cause of much of my suffering, inasmuch as she "had not told me before." I then learned that the fearful disease to which I had fallen a victim was hereditary in its visitations—that it never slumbered for more than a generation. If it spared a father, it was almost certain to fall upon one of his sons. My father had passed through life with no personal experience of the family curse, dying when I was about nine years old. My uncle was equally fortunate. My grandfather was seized at intervals of time varying from two to four years, being smitten first when about twenty years of age. The great uncle of my grandfather, there was little doubt, had been buried alive in Paris, sojourning there as part of the suite of the hapless Queen Henrietta Maria. I was, as you know, the last of my line. My poor mother, who had learned the family secret from my father on his death-bed, knew that, unless the curse had died out, I should be in the natural order of things, its next victim. She was divided between her sense of the obligation she was under to inform me of my danger, and so enable me to take proper precautions to meet it, and her desire to spare me the pain of anticipation of so great a calamity. When I had passed the age of twenty-one in security, she had hoped that I might be spared. She was, nevertheless, ever anxious concerning me; and you can understand the apprehensions that were roused by my announcement of my intended journey to Paris.

You will understand, also, why I have never travelled alone. At the time I tell you this (I am just thirty-five) I have been attacked altogether eight times by a cataleptic fit, similar to that which I have described to you.

You may be sure that since the first time I have taken precautions which have saved me from more than the necessary suffering. In my earliest youth I was never very wild or thoughtless; but the solemn experiences of the hours of the night of my sojourn in the morgue made, as you will believe, no light impression on me. I was brought palpably in contact with my own death, and the lesson was better than fifty sermons. But I will spare you my moralizings. I have never married, and I never shall. And ——, the man who was with me in Paris? He was just coming out of our hotel as I drove up in the morning in a fiacre, supported by a gendarme, and some doctor employed by the police.

"My dear fellow!" he said. (Poor ——! he went to the bar, but died only two years ago. I seem to see him now pulling on his gloves in his cool way.) "My dear fellow! where the deuce have you been? I have had such a jolly little dinner at the 'Trois Freres,' after waiting an hour for you, by-the-by. Where have you slept? Anywhere?"

"In the Morgue."

He had to hear the story from the doctor, for I was too weak to talk.

Imitating an Emperor.—The following anecdote exhibits the late Emperor of Russia in a new character, as well as records one of the most happy escapes from an awkward position that wit and presence of mind might afford:

Some years ago, there was a very celebrated comic actor at St. Petersburg, named Martinoff. He had the most extraordinary powers of imitation, and was so great a favorite with the public as sometimes to venture interpolations of his own, instead of following the advice of Hamlet to his players, to "speak no more than is set down for them." The emperor had a high-chamberlain, or person filling a similar office, named Poloffsky. Whether for fun or malice, Martinoff, while performing, contrived to let fly some puns against this great man, which were warmly received by the audience. The consequence was, as soon as the play was over, the actor found himself in the custody of a guard of soldiers who took him to prison, where he was told he was to be confined for a fortnight. Not content with this, Poloffsky either told the Emperor himself, or contrived that it should come to his ears, that the player had actually had the presumption to indulge in imitations of his imperial majesty.

On his liberation, Martinoff went to pay his respects as usual; and the emperor told him of the accusation, which he denied.

"Well," said the emperor, "if you never did so, let me have an imitation of myself now. We know you can do so if you choose."

This was an awkward and dangerous position for the poor actor, who felt he should get into trouble for falling short of or overdoing the character. Still the autocrat was determined, and there was no escape. Suddenly a bright thought struck the actor; and, drawing himself up, he assumed the exact bearing and manner of the emperor, and in a voice which made every one present start, said:

"Poloffsky! give Martinoff [himself] a thousand silver roubles!"

"Stop," said the emperor; "I have heard quite enough. The imitation is admirable, but the entertainment promises to be too expensive; give him the roubles, Poloffsky; and now mind, sir, let this be the last time you ever dare to mimic me here or elsewhere."

It is, of course, unnecessary to say, Martinoff was too glad to pocket the money, and escape so well.

Arthur is a real Union boy, but not at all religiously inclined, so that his mamma often has great difficulty in getting him to pray understandingly. One evening, after much persuasion, he knelt to repeat his usual prayer, but rendered with a slight variation: "Now I lay me down to sleep, shouting the battle-cry of freedom!"

SEEING BANDMANN.

THE subject of this communication is, "Bandmann in the character of 'Shylock,'" as rendered by him at Maguire's Opera House.

Dropping in at this place of theatrical entertainment on last Friday evening, I was lucky enough to secure an eligible seat in that portion of the parquette called the orchestra seats—eligible, I say, for seeing, hearing, and smelling vile scents.

I had arrived thirty or forty minutes previous to the commencement of the performance, which was in this instance music by the band-men.

The house was comparatively empty of an audience when I took my seat, being a general condition to be found when one goes early to a play—invariably so when the great majority of play-goers secure reserved seats. There is a great deal of satisfaction in feeling that you have a seat reserved—that it is there sure, vacant—waiting for you to fill it at any time previous to the falling of the curtain on the first act. Under the care of the lynx eyed "gentlemanly conductor," it is as secure as the hat you have on your head. Then, too, you feel that you needn't hurry yourself off to the theatre and have to wait so long before the play commences; for this thing of waiting is such an infernal bore. What a thrill of self-congratulation and gratified pride there is about it; coming in with your Matilda Jane on your arm—she gotten up in the highest style of theatrical-going costume; rats and mice in her hair; huge beheaded, bespangled beaver-tail sticking out behind from under her duck of a bonnet—coming in just as some very interesting period of the play is holding the hushed audience in painful attentiveness—creating so much, to yourself, delightful noise and confusion in getting to your seats with the Matilda Jane aforesaid, she making her heavy skirts rustle and rattle like shattered, small thunder, that every one in your vicinity, feeling so terribly annoyed, wish that you and your Matilda Jane with her rats, mice, bespangled beaver-tail, and rustling, rattling skirts were all to Hades. But what need you care? You've secured your seat in advance, paid for it plump, and are going to have it if it should annoy the devil himself in your getting to it! Talk about rights! An audience have no rights that a would-be-important personage is bound to respect. What's it people's business when or how you come in? Money has been paid—there!—that settles the matter. Matilda Jane too, feels so complaceat by having created a slight sensation and drawn attention, frowning and ridiculing though it be, to her rats, mice, and beaver-tail sticking out behind from under her bonnet; and you both settle back into that oblivion which is the fate of annoying, would be-important people after their annoyance ceases. During this interruption to the harmonious feelings of your neighbors, the players on the stage have gone on with their parts, utterly regardless of your arrival. Do not flatter yourselves that you have created any sensation there; but remember that some beautiful parts of a scene have been marred or entirely lost to some of the audience, for which they, too, had paid their money to come to see and hear.

When one who has in him something of an observing nature takes a seat in that terribly odoriferous region of Maguire's Opera House styled the "orchestra seats," long before the curtain is to rise, naturally begins to watch the incoming people; to scrutinize and criticize; to talk mentally with himself; to make remarks and laugh or sneer, as the case may be. Anything to beguile the tedious minutes.

Some such thoughts like those, about reserved seats, passed through my mind; then, as the audience came pouring in, it struck me that the German element prevailed to an extent above all other. Of course, they came to see Bandmann; Bandmann (of whom, as "Shylock," I will have something to say by and by) was a German. Would not the Germans turn out to see a German play sooner than to see any other man not a German? Is it not natural that Germans prefer to patronize Germans exclusively, when they get a chance? Are not, in fact, all the different foreign populations in America inclined to be clannish in their actions and feelings? Bandmann draws the Germans; Arrah na Pogue the Irish; Shylock the Jews; Vestvali, for aught I know to the contrary, if she draws anything, the French; and, with the fair sprinkling of Americans thrown in—who go to theatres and concerts quite upon the cosmopolitan principle of not caring a continental to what nationality the attractive play, or histrion, may belong, so it's a good egg—the managers make a good thing of it; large audiences are captured, the exchequer kept replenished, and the wherewithal to shine away with supplied. Bully for the Thespian art; but bullion for the art that manages the Thespian art itself.

The house fills faster with the preponderating German element, who come to feast their eyes and ears with Bandmann in the character of "Shylock," (about which I am soon going to speak.) This, where I am sitting, is styled the orchestra seats. It is supposed to be a good place to sit in during a play. Is it? ha! I paid a dollar for the privilege of sniffing and snuffing the vile effluvia of evaporated and evaporating tobacco juice, mingled with the fœtid exhalations from hundreds of human lungs, compounded with escaped gas and the insufferable cry of the apple and peanut boy, "happles, peaches hand pears." The seats are hard and uncomfortable, lined with coarse, dingy carpeting; and anything else but what they should be for the price paid for the privilege of suffering in them. One with a strong stomach and a nature oblivious to the influences of refinement and elegant odors, may be very able after all to survive an infliction of orchestra seat once or twice; but I doubt the result of five or six trials on one even of the coarse and unrefined style. And then, too, they seat women—just think of it!—they seat women—ladies—delicate, delicious ladies—in that infernal sink of a place, on the plea that there is no room in the boxes, and leave them to imagine that a great act of kindness has been done them. It ought to be reformed; and Mr. Maguire should do it. But, if you wait till this needed reform is accomplished, you will, perhaps, never see Bandmann in the character of "Shylock," (which I am going to speak about presently.)

There is the peep-hole in the green baize curtain—the curtain that shuts out the mysteries of the mimic world from the wild desire to see and explore, until the proper moment comes, when the tinkling of a little bell shall signal its rising. How often has a manager taken a peep through the hole in the curtain, and had his heart filled with the conflicting emotions of doubt or despair, joy or satisfaction, as he may have viewed his auditorium filling or filled up with troops of enthusiastic and appreciative people, or the long rows of empty benches, with an occasional person here and there, sitting languidly, and looking and feeling sheepishly, for the lack of company. In the former case, how gay and brilliant everything is; in the latter, how gloomy and dispiriting! I can see the glitter of an eye at that peep-hole now. I wonder what the possessor of that eye remarks, as it notes the rapid filling up of the seats, from gallery to parquette, inclusive of this fœtid arrangement, called the orchestra seats?

Might one not imagine the possessor of that eye to be a super who is costumed already for the enaction of the business of one of the Duke's understrappers at the trial of Antonio. How enthusiastic he feels! what wild delight he experiences at the glorious sight! If the truth were known, there is but little difference between the manifestation of interest by a manager or his supers at the sight of a fair or full house, or an empty one. A super never likes to play his small part—heavy enough to him, though God wot—to a "beggarly account of empty beaches," any more than the manager likes to play him.

The appearance of several musicians followed by their leader, Reiff, put an end to all my cogitations and thought-wanderings. Reiff has his orchestra well under the command of his baton or fiddle-bow. They discoursed some excellent music. Reiff understands how to harmonize the cornet with the snare-drum, the squeaking fiddles with the big double bass, so as to make it all sound pleasant. Next to seeing Bandmann in the character of "Shylock"—about which I will yet have something particular to say—is the music as made by Reiff and his orchestral accompaniments, assisted by the time-markers in the audience, to whom, after the first tune was finished, he made his acknowledgments, returning his sincere thanks in a neat, mental speech. Would it be out of place to remark that if Manager Maguire has placed a first rate Bandmann on his stage, he has also placed a tip top Band-man in the leadership of his orchestra?

The curtain at last rose on the Merchant of Venice; at least, the Merchant came on the scene before it went down again. How glorious sounded the language of Shakspeare, once more, after one has listened to so much of the sensational trash that for the time has been all the rage. It will be lucky for us, if a Shakspeareau revival can be successfully inaugurated and sustained. Shakspeare is your only wear, after all.

The play went off well. The actors were up in their parts, and, though some slight changes for the better might have been made, yet, taken as a whole, it was very well. I have, in my time, seen the court scene more highly wrought. The Juke, though, "did his level best; and the fellows in red caps and red robes, with white capes spotted all over with black, looked and acted the sleepy dig to perfection, giving an orchestral-seated spectator the idea that, long before the final judgment was rendered, in fact, before the proceedings in the case were fully entered on at all, they had made up their minds that the Jew had a losing suit of it as against Antonio, having been told so by Portia at the very first rehearsal. The spectators, ranged in a row in a gallery above the noble Juke's head—alternating male and female supernumerary—were quiet and well disposed, exhibiting no sympathy with either plaintiff or defendant, and indulging in no demonstrations of applause, as spectators in a San Francisco court might, and very probably would, have done, at the speech of Portia, about mercy, etc.

However, Antonio, released from his bond; the Jew at last escaping, being eaten entirely by the insatiable Gratiano (Thayer,) who acted toward him as ferociously as if he counted it nothing to swallow Jews, bones, beard and all, as easily as he would a Bank Exchange cocktail, the curtain fell, letting me out—jammed, by the way, considerably among the German element—into the pure fresh air of Heaven—be praised. By the way, that was a neat joke told on the German who, overhearing some one speak about a "Rebellion in Heaven," having reference to the Panorama, of course, said: "Oh, dat won't last lonk; Onkle Abe is dere."

On coming to read this over, I find I haven't said a word about "Bandmann in the character of 'Shylock.'" Indeed, I would have liked to say something, but I fear I have already encroached upon too much space.

PLAY-GOER.

JOSEPH C. NEAL, author of Charcoal Sketches, says: "If the faculties were in equipoise, we should never fall. We are to a certain extent rope-dancers here below, and there is truth in the Mohammedan supposition, that we cross the gulf on a bridge finer than a hair. Any internal force, therefore, in excess or deficiency swerves us from the right line, and we run the risk of being infringed upon as an adverse catastrophical circumstance, having the melancholy preferment of serving to point a moral or adorn a tale. Our vices are our virtues running to riot and pushing into the extreme. All human impulses are good in subordination and in their place. It is their morbid unwholesome condition which makes our trouble. There is no sinfulness in thirst, if the proper means are used to quench it; nor is ambition unholy, if it only seeks honorable and useful distinction among men. Acquisitiveness is derided, but a subdued acquisitiveness is necessary if we would not be a burden to our friends and subject old age to the degradation of being a charge upon the public purse. Even Anger, the combativeness and destructiveness of modern definition, notwithstanding the views of a certain prim personage, we conclude, is essential to our being, (a defensive means,) and that the oppressor may fear to set his heavy foot upon us. It is ridiculous to suppose that the Creator has implanted such a principle within, only to have it stifled at its birth. On the contrary, it was given to aid the first law of nature. Every brute beast resents instinctively the aggressiveness of a foe, and what parent would not be exasperated at the destruction of its offspring? We are, in short, good people enough in the constituents of our individuality. All the materials are respectable in themselves: it is the quantity of each which causes the disturbance. Too much courage makes the bully—too little shrinks into the coward. A modicum of self-esteem induces us to scorn meanness; with too large a share, our pride becomes an insult and an outrage. The love of approval gives amiability to our deportment, but it may run into frisking vanity and ambling affectation. Happy, in the words of another, are they whose blood and judgment are so well commingled that they can move with a steady step, and have no need of pensive analysis to learn why they stumble."

PHOTOGRAPHY ON WOOD.—The most recent improvement in photographic art, says the Home Journal, is the one to which we are about to call attention, and which has lately been invented in England. It is transferring a photograph to wood with the same facility as it can be transferred to any other material surface, and is thus described: "The new application is patented, and, as we have seen several specimens of the photography, not only on wood, but on canvas, silk, glass, and ivory, we can fully attest the excellence of the application, and can readily imagine the number of objects to which it can be successfully applied. The new field opened by this discovery is, indeed, almost unlimited. Furniture, for instance, the sideboards, tables, cabinets, and panels of which are, at present, plain, can now be artistically decorated with pictures of flowers, statuary, or portraits, which will be as enduring as though they were laid on by the painter's brush; and, for house decoration generally, it may be both economically and ornamentally applied. Several attempts, we believe, have, at various times, been made to adapt photography to wood engravings, but they have hitherto failed, in consequence of the coating with which the boxwood has been covered to receive the photographic impressions, having sealed off under the engraver's knife. The defect has now, however, been remedied, and greater accuracy is, by the new process, obtained, and at a saving, too, of fully three hundred per cent. over the system ordinarily adopted. Indeed, the photographs on wood, by this new process, cost about as many shillings as a drawing by hand, on the same surface, costs guineas. The transparent photographs, upon opal and other glass, are exceedingly beautiful and artistic, and, for internal lights—such as lamps, or for church windows—their effect is highly attractive. Upon close examination, the process would appear not to be a mere surface deposit, but rather an incorporation with the material upon which it is impressed. It is indelibly fixed in the pyres of the wood, which will bear being washed and rubbed without receiving the slightest injury."

A MONTANA correspondent of the Marysville Express reports the killing of J. O. Maxwell, formerly of Sacramento and Yolo, by highwaymen, September 3d. Jerry Conkey was hung by a mob on suspicion of being one of his murderers.

LITERARY NOTES.

Messrs. Ticknor & Fields have left their bookstore on the corner of Washington and School streets, in Boston—long and pleasantly known as "the old corner"—and have occupied a new and magnificent building on Tremont street, opposite Boston common. The Boston papers describe the new establishment at great length, and in enthusiastic terms. Mention is made of its parlor for literary reunions, entitled the "Authors' Room," which is to be supplied with the current literature of the day, and—according to one report—"is destined to be famous in literary history as the centre of a brilliant coterie of men and women of genius—a drawing room where they shall hold their kindly meetings and be free to come and go as in their own parlors.

Henry Alford's Poetical Works, in complete form, have just been published in London. A collection of Alford's poems was published in this country many years ago, dedicated to Longfellow. Alford is Dean of Canterbury. His poems are thoughtful, and extremely delicate in sentiment, and they deserve to be better known than they now are.

Edward Irving's works are being published. The fifth volume is just out. Irving was one of the noblest men that have ever lived. As a clergyman, he preached the doctrines of the Second Advent. Many persons called him "daft." "He was not daft," said Carlyle, remarking on the great preacher's apparent effort actually to see God with human eyes; "he was dazed."

Dante is to be again commemorated by a Festival—this time at Dresden, on the 14th of September. Professor Karl Witte, of Halle; Wegele, of Werzburg; Mussassia, of Vienna, and Bahr, of Dresden, are the chief movers in the affair. They contemplate establishing, at Dresden, a Dante Library and a Dante periodical, and publishing a critical edition of Dante's smaller works.

The French Academy—of which an ample and very entertaining account is given in Matthew Arnold's Essays in Criticism, contains forty chairs. Among its members there are five octogenarians, ten septuagenarians, and thirteen sexagenarians. M. Viennet is the oldest, born in 1777, M. Paradol is the youngest, aged 36 years.

Dr. Colenso, Bishop of Natal, returns to his diocese at the Cape of Good Hope. All efforts to oust him have proved unavailing. His income having been withheld, proceedings to obtain it have been commenced in chancery. Meanwhile a purse of upwards of 3,000 guineas has been raised by subscription in England and presented to the Bishop, to enable him to resume his duties.

Trubner & Co., of London, announce a book that may chance to prove very valuable, in the event of the spread of cholera to England and the United States. It is entitled Diarrhœa and Cholera, their Origin, Proximate Causes, and Cures through the Agency of the Nervous System, by means of Ice, and is the work of John Chapman, M. D., M. R. C. P.

Thackeray's copyrights have been purchased by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. of London, who will henceforth be the publishers of his works in England. The same firm has secured the right to publish all the works hitherto brought out by Wilkie Collins.

M. Emile de Girardin's new play, The Two Sisters, was "damned," at the Vaudeville, Paris, on its first night by a specially invited audience of critics. At its second representation, however, before a miscellaneous audience, it was completely successful.

Mrs. Boswell, wife of the biographer of Dr. Johnson, was annoyed that the Doctor should possess so much influence over her husband. "I have often known bears led by men," she said, "but this is the first time I ever heard of a man led by a bear."

Dr. Wellesley, of Oxford University, suggests, in a work entitled Stray Notes on the Text of Shakspeare, that the perplexing word oneyers, in the first part of Henry IV. be altered to mayors.

Alexandre Dumas' Hamlet has been played at one of the lesser theatres in Paris. A French "Hamlet" must be a very ludicrous personage.

George Augustus Sala has written a book on Algiers, which is presently to be published in London, under the title of "A Trip to Barbary, by a Roundabout Route."

John Foster, editor of the London Examiner, will shortly publish the Life, Journals, and Letters of Jonathan Swift.

A writer in the American Medical Gazette gives the following lucid explanation of the phenomenon of a lady's blush: "The mind communicates with the central ganglion; the latter, by inflex action through the brain and facial nerve, to the organic nerves in the face, with which its branches inosculate." The blush loses nothing by the explanation.

The resumption of the Oregon daily mail, from Lincoln, California, to Portland, Oregon, which has been suspended the last month, is announced.

ARTEMUS WARD'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

New York near Fifth Avenoo Hotel, Org. 31ct.

Dr. Sir: Yrs. into which you ask me to send you sum leadiu incidents iu my life so you can write my Bogfry for the papers, cum dooly to hand. I have no doubt that a article onto my life, grammattyeally jerked and properly punktooated, would be a additiou to the chaos literatoor of the day.

To the yooth of Ameriky it would be vallyble as showin how high a pinnykle of fame a man can reach who commenst his career with a small canvas tent and a pea-green ox, which he rubbed it off while scratchin hisself agin the center pole, cansin in Rahway, N. J., a discriminating mob to say humbugs would not go dowu in them village. The ox resoom'd agricultooral pursoots shortly afterwards.

I next tried my hand at givin Blind-man concerts, appearin as the poor blind-man myself. But the inlamous cuss who I hired to lead me round towns in the day time to excite sympathy, drank freely of a spiritoous licker unbeknownst to me one day, & while under them influoance he led me into the canal. I had to either tear the green bandige from my eyes or be drownded. I tho't I'd restore my eyesight.

In writin about these things, Mr. Editor, kinder smooth 'em over. Speak of 'em as eccentricities of gen'us.

My next ventur would hev bin a success if I hadn't tried to do too much. I got up a series of wax figgers, and among others one of Socrates. I tho't a wax figger of old Soek would be poplar with eddycated people, but unfortnitely I put a Brown linen duster and a U. S. Army regulation cap on him, which peple with classycal eddycations said it was a farce. This enterprise was unfortnit in other respecks At a certin town I advertised a wax figger of the Hon'ble Amos Perkins, who was a Railroad President, a great person in them parts. But it appeared I had shown the same figger for a Pirut named Gibbs in that town the previs season, which created a intense tumoolt, & the audience remarked "shame unto me," and other statements of the same similarness. I tried to molify 'em. I told them that any family possessin' children might have my she tiger to play with half a day, & wouldn't charge 'em a cent, but alars! it was of no avail.

I was forced to leave, and I infer from an article in the Advertiser of that town, in which the Editor says, "Altho' time has silvered this man's hed with its frosts, he still brazenly wallows in infamy. Still are his snakes stuffed and wax werks unreliable. We are glad that he has concluded to never revisit our town, altho' incredible as it may appear, the fellow reely did contemplate so doing last summer; when still true to the craven instincts of his black heart, he wrote the hireling knaves of the obscure journal across the street to know what they would charge for 400 small bills, to be done on yellow paper! We shall recur to this matter again."

I say, I infer from this article that a prejudiss still exists agin me in that town,

I will not speak of my once being in straitened circumstances in a sertin town, and of my endeavorin' to accommulate welth by lettin' myself to Sabbath school pic-nies, to sing ballads adapted to the understandins of little children accompanyin myself on a clarionett—which I forgot where I was one day, singin instead of "Oh, how pleasant to be a little child,"

Rip, snap—set 'em up again,
Right in the middle of a three-cent pie,

which mistake, added to the fact that I couldn't play onto the clarionett except making it howl dismal, broke up the pic-nic, and children said in voices choked with sobs and emotions where was their home and where was their Pa? and I said be quiet dear children, I am your Pa, which made a young woman with two twins by her side say very angrily, "Good heavens forbid you should ever be the Pa of any of these innocent ones unless it is much desirable for them to expire igmininyously up on to a murderer's gallus!"

I say I will not speak of this. Let it be Berrid into Oblivyon.

In your article, Mr. Editor, please tell 'em what sort of a man I am.

If you see fit to kriticise my Show speak your mind freely. I do not object to kriticism. Tell the public, in a candid and graceful article, that my Show abounds in moral and startlin curiositics, any one of whom is wuth dubble the prices of admission.

I hav thus far spoke of myself exceloosively as a exhibiter.

I was born in the State of Maine of parents. As a infant I attracted a great deal of attention. The nabers would stand over my cradle for hours and say, "How bright that little face looks! How much it noes!" The young ladies would carry me round in their arms, saying I was a muzzer's bezzy darlin and a sweety 'eety ittle ting. I was nice, tho' I wasn't old enuff to properly appreciate it. I'm a helthy old darlin' now.

I have allers sustained a good moral character. I was never a railroad director in my life.

Altho' in early life I did not invably confine myself to truth in my small bills, I hav bin gradooally growin respectabler and respectabler ev'ry year. I luv my children, and never mistake another man's wife for my own. I'm not a member of any meetin house, but firmly b'leeve in meetin houses, and shouldn't feel safe to take a dose of laudnum and lay down in the street of a village that hadn't any, with a thousand dollars in my vest pocket.

My temperament is bilious, altho' I don't owe a dollar in the world.

I am a early riser, my wife is a Presbytcrian. I may add that I am also bald-headed. I keep two cows.

I liv in Baldinsville, Indiany. My next door nabor is Old Steve Billins. I'll tell you a little story about Old Steve that will make you larf. He jined the Church last Spring, and the minister said, "You must go home now, Brother Billins, and erect a family altar in your house," whereupon the egrejis old ass went home and built a regl'ar Pulpit in his settin room. He had the jiners in his house over four days.

I am 56 (56) years of age. Time, with its relentless seythe, is ever busy. The Old Sexton gathers them in, he gathers them in! I keep a pig this year.

I don't think of anything more, Mr. Edit'r.

If you should giv' my portrait in connection with my Bogfry, please have me engraved in a languishin' attitood, leaning on a marble pillar, leavin my baek hair as it is now.

Trooly yours, Artemus Ward.

THE CAUSE OF EARTHQUAKES.

The cause which produces the earthquake shock, and the manner in which it is communicated over vast distances in short time, have been variously explained. Slight impulses sometimes produce perceptible movements in what appears to be solid and fixed. Thus, at Greenwich observatory, the shutting of the outer gate has so jarred the transit telescope as to throw the star to which it pointed out of the field of view. The effect of the jarring of dams by the fall of water is also felt miles off. Various agents are well known to be at work in the interior of the earth, producing chemical changes, which are often attended with violent movements. By such forces immense columns of lava are lifted up in the craters of volcanoes, and stones of vast size are ejected. One mass of rock thrown from Cotopaxi, a distance of eight or nine miles, was estimated to contain about 100 cubic yards of matter, consequently weighing over 200 tons. It has been suggested that many of the gases which are evolved from volcanoes may, under the immense pressure to which they are subjected in the interior, exist in a liquid or solid form, and that by a considerable increase of heat these are made to assume the gaseous form, and, in doing this, display an elastic power which no superincumbent mass can resist. It has been found that when powder is exploded in rocks, a shock is communicated to distances varying with the quantity fired and the quality of the rock as to elasticity; and the rate of progress of this impulse has been observed to be from about 1,000 to 1,700 feet per second. Many instances have been recorded of the velocity of the earthquake shock, ascertained by noting the time at which chronometers at different localities have been stopped by it, and this has been found to vary from 1,000 to 5,000 feet per second. The movement in both these cases is, no doubt, of analagous character, though accompanied in the earthquake by a vastly increased display of force. Mr. R. Mallet, who has recounted these and other observations in his valuable essay on the dynamics of earthquakes, defines their efficient cause to be 'a wave of elastic compression, produced either by the sudden flexure and constraint of the elastic materials forming a portion of the earth's crust, or by the sudden relief of this contraint by withdrawal of the force, or by their giving way and becoming fractured.' When, as frequently is the case, the shock originates beneath the ocean, its effect is transmitted first in the wave of sound, which, rushing forward through the rocky crust of the earth at the rate of 8,000 to 10,000 feet per second, gives notice by its rumbling of the vibrating motion that is following behind. The great sea wave generated by the same movement, advances still more slowly than the vibration transmitted through the rocky strata, but at last pours in upon the land, its effects modified by the contour of the coasts and the depth of the waters through which it has passed. Lastly, may come the atmospheric agitation and the sound of the outbreak, transmitted through the air. The vibrating movement imparted to the solid strata is the chief agency in the disastrous effects of earthquakes. Its rate of progress must vary with the varying elasticity of the rocks, and a greatly increased shock must consequently be experienced in the passage of the wave from soft alluvial strata into the hard crystaline rocks, or vice versa. It was on this line of junction of the two formations that the most disastrous effects were experienced in the great earthquake in Calabria in 1783. It is by such an elastic wave, moving forward and suddenly back again, that Mr. Mallet explains the curious effects which have been observed in the twisting movement given to the blocks which form portions of columns, as if the upper stones had been partially turned round on the lower. Such effects were noticed by Darwin in the cathedral at Concepcion, and others of the same nature are described as having occurred to two obelisks in a convent in Calabria. The effect has also been referred to a vorticose or whirling motion, and by others to a rotary movement caused by the crossing of two waves of horizontal vibration. The Profs. Rogers 'attribute the movement to an actual pulsation engendered in the molten matter itself by a linear disruption under enormous tension, giving vent explosively to elastic vapors, escaping either to the surface or into cavernous spaces beneath.' By others the movement had previously been ascribed to elastic vapors, passing between the strata or between the crust and the fluid lava beneath it.—American Encyclopedia.

COMPENSATION.

WHAT if my tender roots may haply coil
In a deep mellow soil,
Wherein is found no weed
That killeth all things with its harmful greed,
But only there is nourished mine own reed,
To rear its slender crest
In every delicate hue of richest blossom dressed?

If in the sunny mazes of my leaves
The crafty spider weaves—
Or in my fairest bloom
Some worm hath climbed, where in delicious gloom
It lies and fattens in its honeyed tomb—
What shall it profit me,
The outward show so fair, the prize I seem to be?

Still, I may 'scape the worm, the spider's net;
No cursed blight may set
Its dangerous touch anew
Upon my frailest buds, in vile mildew;
My faded flowers the Autumn winds may strew;
But, after all the strife,
If I have borne no fruit, or seed, what use was life?

THE MISTLETOE.

(VISCUM ALBA.)

"NOT far away, for ages past hath stood
An old, inviolated, sacred wood,
Whose gloomy boughs, thick interwoven, made
A chilly, cheerless, everlasting shade:
There barbarous priests some dreadful power adore,
And Instrate every tree with human gore;
The pious worshipers approach not near,
But shun their gods, and kneel with distant fear."

FROM time immemorial, trees—either standing apart in solitary majesty or congregated in groves and forests—have been consecrated to the solemnities of religion. "Paradise itself," says Evelyn, "was but a kind of nemorous temple planted by God himself, and given to man." This appropriation of them to sacred purposes may be traced even in the patriarchal ages. Abraham, we are told, "planted a grove in Beersheba, and called there on the name of the everlasting God." It was in a bush—or, as some commentators render it, a grove—that the Angel of the Lord appeared to Moses," in the wilderness of Mount Sinai;" and when the same glorious being visited Gideon, "he came and sat under an oak."

Trees have been solemnized by funeral obseqnies. When "Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, died, she was buried beneath Bethel, under an oak, and the name of it was called Allonbachuth, which signifies, oak of weeping." The bones of Saul and his sons had also a similar place of sepulture.

Such was the sanctity of trees and groves in the earlier ages of the world; and such it continues still in many places. Nor can we wonder at it, for their shadowy recesses seem made for meditation.

"Still let me pierce into the midnight depth
Of yonder grove of wildest, largest growth;
These are the haunts of meditation—these
The scenes where ancient bards the inspiring breath
Ecstatic felt, and, from this world retired,
Convers'd with angels and immortal forms
On gracious errands bent."

If we cast our eye through the depths of time, travelling from the east to the west, we shall find all nations—the Israelites, the Persians, the Egyptians, the Grecians, the Romans—each had their sacred groves, over which certain deities presided, whence oracles spake, and where priests and priestesses officiated, till at last we arrive in Britain, and find the Druid performing his horrid rites under the oak. The Mistletoe, having no attachment to earth, it was considered of celestial origin, and it was held in the greatest veneration by the Druids, and, indeed, most of the northern nations. The poet says:

"There, where the spreading consecrated boughs
Fed the suge mistletoe, the holy Druids
Lay wrapt in moral musings."

The utmost solemnity was used in the gathering of it; it took place always at the close of the year, when the moon was just six days old. Two white bulls, which had never felt the yoke, were fastened by their horns to the fortunate oak whereon the mistletoe had been discovered; a priest, clad in a white vesture, then ascended the tree and detached the plant with a golden hook or bill, whilst others stood ready to receive it in a white woolen cloth. This done, they were prepared to offer the best of their flocks and herds in sacrifice, "mumbling many orisons, and praying devoutly that it would please God to bless this gift of his to the good and benefit of all those to whom he had vouchsafed to give it." Water in which it had been steeped, they considered a panacea for diseases of every description, hence the name they gave it—"All-Heal."

Many are the fables attached to this really singular plant; and it must be owned that its peculiar habits, the obscure mode of its propagation, etc., might almost countenance the superstitious regard in which it was held in the dark ages, when ignorance and credulity reigned paramount over the human mind. The horrors with which it was associated in the bloody and cruel rites of Druidism have probably obtained for it, in the following quotation from Shakespeare, "a local habitation and a name" by no means enviable:

"A barren and detested vale you see it is;
The trees, though Summer, yet forlorn and lean,
O'ercome with moss and baleful mistletoe;
Here never shines the sun, here nothing breeds
Unless the nightly owl or fatal raven."

This plant is extensively used in holiday decorations in many parts of England and also on the Continent. It is found growing luxuriantly on the oak and other kinds of trees in this vicinity.

THOREAU ON COATS.

CONCORD, January 21, 1864.

MR. B——: My coat is at last done, and my mother and sister allow that I am so far in a condition to go abroad. I feel as if I had gone abroad the moment I put it on. It is, as usual, a production strange to me, the wearer, invented by some Count D'Orsay, and the maker of it was not acquainted with any of my real depressions or elevations. He only measured a peg to hang it on, and might have made the loop big enough to go over my head. It requires a not quite innocent indifference, not to say insolence, to wear it. Ah! the process by which we get our coats is not what it should be. Though the Church declares it righteous, and its priest pardons me, my own good genius tells me that it is hasty, and coarse, and false. I expect a time when, or rather an integrity by which a man will get his coat as honestly and as perfectly fitting as a tree its bark. Now, our garments are typical of our conformity to the ways of the world, i. e. of the devil, and to some extent react on us and poison us, like that shirt which Hercules put on.

I think to come and see you next week, on Monday, if nothing hinders. I have just returned from court at Cambridge, whither I was called as a witness, having surveyed a water-privilege, about which there is a dispute, since you were here.

Ah! what foreign countries there are, greater in extent than the United States or Russia, and with no more souls to a square mile, stretching away on every side from every human being, with whom you have no sympathy. Their humanity affects me as simply monstrous. Rocks, earth, brute beasts, comparatively, are not so strange to me. When I sit in the parlors and kitchens of some with whom my business brings me—I was going to say in contact—(business, like misery, makes strange bedfellows,) I feel a sort of awe, and as forlorn as if I were cast away on a desolate shore. I think of Riley's narrative and his sufferings. You, who soared like a merlin with your mate through the realms of ether, in the presence of the unlike, drop at once to earth, a mere amorphous squab, divested of your air-inflated pinions. (By the way, excuse this writing, for I am using the stub of the last feather I chance to possess.) You travel on, however, through this dark and desert world; you see in the distance an intelligent and sympathizing lineament; stars come forth in the dark, and oases appear in the desert.

But (to return to the subject of coats,) we are well-nigh smothered under yet more fatal coats, which do not fit us, our whole lives. Consider the cloak that our employment or station is; how rarely men treat each other for what in their true and naked characters they are; how we use and tolerate pretension; how the judge is clothed with dignity which does not belong to him, and the trembling witness with humility that does not belong to him, and the criminal, perchance, with shame or impudence which no more belong to him. It does not matter so much, then, what is the fashion of the cloak with which we cloak these cloaks. Change the coat; put the judge in the criminal-box, and the criminal on the bench, and you might think that you had changed the men.

No doubt, the thinnest of all cloaks is conscious deception or lies; it is sleazy and frays out; it is not close-woven like cloth; but its meshes are a coarse net-work. A man can afford to lie only at the intersection of the threads; but truth puts in the filling, and makes a consistent stuff.

I mean merely to suggest how much the station affects the demeanor and self-respectability of the parties, and that the difference between the judge's coat of cloth and the criminal's is insignificant, compared with, or only partially significant of, the difference between the coats which their respective stations permit them to wear. What airs the judge may put on over his coat which the criminal may not! The judge's opinion (sententia) of the criminal sentences him, and is read by the clerk of the court, and published to the world, and executed by the sheriff; but the criminal's opinion of the judge has the weight of a sentence, and is published and executed only in the supreme court of the universe—a court not of common pleas. How much juster is the one than the other? Men are continually sentencing each other; but, whether we be judges or criminals, the sentence is ineffectual unless we continue ourselves.

I am glad to hear that I do not always limit your vision when you work this way; that you sometimes see the light through me; that I am here and there windows, and not all dead wall. Might not the community sometimes petition a man to remove himself as a nuisance, a darkener of the day, a too large mote?

WHEN THE SULTAN GOES TO ISPAHAN.

BY THOMAS BAILEY ALDRICH.

WHEN the Sultan Shah Zaman
Goes to the city Ispahan,
Even before he goes so far
As the place where the clustered palm-trees are,
At the last of the thirty palace-gates,
The pet of the harem, Rose-in-Bloom,
Orders a feast in his favorite room—
Glittering squares of colored ice,
Sweetened with syrup, tinctured with spice,
Creams and cordials, and sugared dates,
Syrian apples, Othmance quinces,
Limes and citrons, and apricots,
And wines that are known to Eastern princes;
And Nubian slaves, with smoking pots
Of spiced meats and costliest fish,
And all that the curious palate could wish,
Pass in and out of the cedarn doors;
Scattered over mosaic floors
Are anemones, myrtles, and violets,
And a musical fountain throws its jets
Of a hundred colors into the air!
The dusk Sultana loosens her hair,
And stains with the henna-plant the tips
Of her pearly nails, and bites her lips
Till they bloom again—but, alas! that rose
Not for the Sultan buds and blows!
Not for the Sultan Shah-Zaman
When he goes to the city Ispahan.

Then at a wave of her sunny hand,
The dancing girls of Samarcand
Float in like mists from Fairyland,
And to the low voluptuous swoons
Of music rise and fall the moons
Of their full brown bosoms. Orient blood
Runs in their veins, shines in their eyes;
And there, in this Eastern Paradise,
Filled with the fumes of sandal-wood,
And Khoten musk, and aloes and myrrh,
Sits Rose-in-Bloom on a silk divan,
Sipping the wines of Astrakhan;
And her Arab lover sits with her:
That's when the Sultan Shah-Zaman
Goes to the city Ispahan!

Now, when I see an extra light,
Flaming, flickering on the night
From my neighbor's casement opposite,
I know as well as I know to pray,
I know as well as a tongue can say,
That the innocent Sultan Shah-Zaman
Has gone to the city Ispahan.

A NONSENSICAL IDEA.—We Americans have, of late years, more especially on the Pacific Coast, fallen into the ridiculous habit of tacking the word "city" on the tail end of the names given to a large proportion of the little towns that are started, it makes no odds where or what may be their present or future prospects. Why this is done has never been satisfactorily explained that we ever knew of, but so it goes. The notion is simply a nuisance, and should be discarded by every sensible individual in naming a town. When Virginia was in its "tadpole" days, so to speak, it had "city" hitched on to its name by way of tail, but now that it has grown to be a big frog, as it were, the tail is dropped off, and it has become plain "Virginia:" nothing more, and a real city at that. Carson City, Silver City, Washoe City, Ophir City, and other "cities" that we could mention, are all encumbered with that confounded tail. Over in Excelsior, too, the first town laid out was called "Summit City," and now they have just named another "Enterprise City." We shall expect to hear of "Fordyce City," or "Ho, Joe!" City next. Seriously, though, this idea of burdening every little scrub town that is started with the extra and inconvenient attatchment of "city," is simply a burlesque and popular humbug that all people of good taste should carefully avoid.—Nevada Union.

JULIUS CÆSAR'S letter—"I came, I saw, I conquered"—has been admired for nearly two thousand years for its terseness. A hypercritic, however, says it is rather verbose. The words, "I saw" are quite superfluous. Indeed, "I came" are wholly unnecessary. "I conquered" would tell the whole story.

A LITTLE GIRL was once troubled by some loud peals of thunder, when she said, very determinedly: "When I get to heaven I'll STOP that noise!"

THE WAY I MADE MY FORTUNE.

THREE of us were sitting in a small room, and complaining of the hardships of our destiny.

"Without money we can do nothing," said George; "were I to hit upon a speculation that would have done honor to a Rothschild, coming from a pauper like myself, no one would think it worth attending to."

"I," said Albert, "have actually finished a work which would establish my reputation as an author, if I could only find a bookseller to buy it."

"I have petitioned my employer for an increase of salary," I exclaimed, anxious to contribute to the chorus of lamentation: "and he told me that for forty louis a year he could get more clerks than he wanted."

"It would not so much matter," said George, thoughtfully, "if, besides being poor, we did not seem poor. Could one of us only be thought rich—"

"What is the use of the shadow without the substance?" I asked.

"Of every use," said Albert. "I agree with George—the shadow sometimes makes the substance. The next best thing to capital is credit."

"Especially," returned George, "the credit of having a good fortune. Have none of us a rich uncle in India?"

"A cousin of mine went to Jamaica or Martinique, I forget which," I said innocently; "and he never came back."

"Capital! that is all one requires," exclaimed George; "we will conjure up this cousin of yours—or could we not kill him? Yes; James Méran, of Martinique, deceased, leaving a sugar plantation, a hundred negroes, and a fortune of a hundred thousand louis, to his well-beloved cousin, Louis Méran."

We laughed at the joke, and I thought no more of it; but George and Albert—slightly excited by the fumes of a bowl of punch which I had sent for to do honor to the testator—lost no time in concocting and afterwards publishing a full account, in the local newspaper, of the fortune that had been left me.

The next day, sundry friends dropped in to compliment me. Of course I endeavored to undeceive them, but they would not take a denial. In vain I assured them it was a hoax; it was of no use. Several people remembered my cousin James very well, and had seen him at Nantes before he embarked in 1789. Among others came my tailor, to whom I owed a small sum which it was not quite convenient for me to pay at that moment. No doubt the rumor of my cousin's decease had sharpened his memory. I wished my two friends at a place that shall be nameless.

"Good morning, Mr. Mayer: I suppose you are come for those fifty francs?"

"I hope, sir, you don't think I came for such a trifle as that. No, sir; I came to take your orders for a suit of mourning."

"A suit of mourning?"

"Yes, sir; cousin's mourning. Dark bronze frock, for morning wear, black trousers and waistcoat."

"At the present moment, Mr. Mayer—"

"I hope, sir, I have done nothing to forfeit your patronage?"

"But, I repeat, I have received no money at all."

"I hope, sir, you won't mention such a thing; there is no sort of hurry," exclaimed the tailor; who busily employed himself in taking my measure with slips of paper.

After all, my wardrobe did want some additions, and I said nothing more.

"My dear sir," said the next visitor, "I have a very great favor to request of you, Buy my house. You are very rich; you must be on the lookout for safe and lucrative investments. Sixty thousand francs are nothing for you—a mere fraction of your income. With me the case is different. I thought Mr. Felix had made up his mind to purchase the premises, and now I hear he has changed his intention. What is to become of me? I have heavy demands to meet, and I don't know where the money is to come from."

"I buy your house? Why, it would be madness to think of such a thing."

"Madness? no such thing; you could not find a better investment anywhere. In two years, with trifling repairs, it will be worth double its present value; you will never see such a good opportunity again. Say 'done,' and I'm off."

And he was off, without leaving me time to put in a word. Two hours after, in walked Mr. Felix, evidently not in the best of tempers.

"Really, sir," he began, "you have taken me quite by surprise. That house is indispensable to me; I reckoned on it as if it were mine, and only offered fifty thousand francs because the owner is embarrassed, and I felt sure that he would be obliged to take them. With you, sir, the case is different; so I come to ask if you will let me have it for seventy-five thousand francs."

Fifteen thousand francs, dropping all at once into the lap of a poor fellow who had to work hard to gain eight hundred francs in a year! I could hardly believe my ears.

"I cannot give you an answer just now, sir," I said; "but if you will take the trouble to call again at five, I'll see what I can do."

At a quarter to five, Mr. Felix made his appearance. I spoke to him with candor:

"I should tell you, sir, that I had no thoughts of buying the house, till the owner prevailed on me to do so. You say you want the house; any other will suit me as well, so I accede to your terms."

"You shall have a draft on Paris for the amount in a fortnight," replied Mr. Felix, who bowed and withdrew, apparently enchanted with my way of doing business.

A draft upon Paris! The circumstance appeared so unusual to me that I thought I ought to send it to Paris to get it cashed. I wrote accordingly to Messrs. Flanges & Bergeret, the only firm I knew there. I was in the habit of receiving through them the interest of a small sum that had been left me by an uncle. I informed them that, having funds at my disposal, I wished for information as to the best mode of investing them. The signification of the word "funds" varies very much according to the name and position in life of the speaker. The rumor of my legacy had reached Paris; so that when I spoke of "funds," it was evident I meant a considerable sum. This was proved by the following letter:

"SIR: We are in receipt of your esteemed favor of the 17th current, which reached us just after the conclusion of the last loan negotiated by the Cortes, in which our firm has an interest. Desirous that our friends should have an opportunity of participating in an investment which we consider profitable, we have taken the liberty of placing twenty thousand piastres to your credit. Should that amount appear too considerable, the rise of those securities admits of your selling out a premium.

"We remain, sir,

"Yours to command,

"FLANGES & Co."

To this was added a postscript written by the head of the firm:

"We have heard with pleasure of the recent good fortune that has fallen to the lot of our old friend and correspondent, and beg to offer him our services as occasion may require."

Twenty thousand piastres! I let the letter fall in sheer amazement. What would have been my astonishment, if, more conversant with terms of commerce and more attentive to the enclosed account current, I had seen that what I took for the principal was only the yearly interest? I lost no time in writing to my correspondents to inform them that the sum was much too large—"I have received no money," I said, "from Martinique, and it would be impossible for me to meet my engagements."

An answer came by return of post:

"We learn, with regret, that you have misgivings with regard to the Spanish loan. According to your orders, we have sold out half the stock assigned to you, which brings you in already a net profit of eighty thousand francs. With regard to your property at Martinique, we are too well acquainted with the delays which bequests at such a distance must necessarily involve, to think for a moment that you can be immediately put in possession of your inheritance; but your simple signature will suffice to procure you all the money you may require in the meantime. We take the liberty of reminding you of the advantage of making timely investments: lest, when the legal arrangements are ended, you should find difficulty in getting good interest for so large a capital. With the hope that you may entertain a better opinion of German securities than you do of Spanish, we hand you a prospectus for establishing a bank at Grunningen. You will please observe, sir, that no deposit is required, and that, as calls are only made at long intervals, it will be easy for you to sel your shares, should you change your mind, without your having occasion to make any payment. We have placed fifty to your credit, and have the honor to remain," etc.

Eighty thousand francs! The amount was a perfect mystery to me; no doubt the clerk had made some mistake in the figures. My position was becoming embarrassing. Congratulations poured in from all quarters; especially when I made my appearance in black from head to foot. The Journal de Goubmouges thought it right to publish a biographical sketch of my cousin, and the editor wrote to me asking for further particulars. Ladies connected with all sorts of societies, begged that my name might be added to their list of subscribers, and the money that I had to pay for postages was something alarming. To escape from this avalanche of inquiries, I hastily departed for Paris. Directly I got there, I called on my bankers, by whom I was received as heirs to a large property generally are.

"Sorry that you have such a poor opinion of the Spanish stock," said Monsieur Bergeret; "there has been a great rise: however, we only sold out half your parcel."

"Would you have the goodness to let me know what the present value of the remainder might be?" I replied.

"Certainly, sir; ten thousand piastres stock at seventy (the piastre being at five francs, thirty-five centimes) the sum already paid being—— If you sell out to-day you will, with the proceeds of last sale, have from two hundred and ten thousand to two hundred and twenty thousand francs."

"Very well. You said something about a German bank, I think?"

"Yes; the Government made some difficulty about granting a charter; it is all settled now, and the promised shares have risen considerably."

"Can I sell out?"

"Certainly; you have fifty at four hundred and fifty florins profit: that will bring you in about sixty thousand francs."

"Without any calls to pay?"

"None whatever."

"That seems strange; but you are no doubt well informed. I should like to find a secure investment for those sums; would you have the goodness to tell me what would be the best?"

"You cannot have anything better than our own five per cents. I know of nothing more secure; at the present price of that stock, you get six per cent. for your money. I can easily understand that you should be worried by such trifling details as these: you will soon have more considerable sums to look after."

"Then, if I invest the combined produce of the German and Spanish stocks in the five per cents, what should I get a year?"

"Let me see. Three hundred thousand francs—funds at eighty—eighteen—twenty—yes, twenty thousand francs a year."

"Ah! twenty thousand francs a year! And when can the investment be made?"

"To-morrow morning: that is, if you will allow our firm to conduct the transactions."

"Certainly; in whom could my confidence be better placed?"

The banker made a polite bow.

"And now," I continued, "I should feel obliged to you if you would have the goodness to advance me a few louis, as I am rather short of cash."

"My dear sir, all the cash I possess is at your service. How much do you want—two hundred—four hundred?"

"Thank you; fifty will be quite sufficient."

"May I hope," added the banker, when I rose to leave, "that our firm may be favored with the continuance of your patronage?"

"Certainly," I replied.

There are few moments of my life on which I look back with more satisfaction than in those occupied with my interview with M. Bergeret. I doubt if I should have believed in the twenty thousand francs a-year, if it had not been for the fifty napoleons.

In the meantime, my two friends were shocked at the success of their story, and were not a little alarmed at my sudden journey to Paris, which was attributed by others to legal business. George and Albert then began to fear that I really believed in the authenticity of the invention they had concocted.

Three days after my return, they came to me with long faces.

"My dear Louis," said George, "you know your cousin is not dead."

"I cannot be sure of that," I replied, "for I am by no means convinced of his existence."

"Well, but you know that this inheritance is only a hoax?"

"To tell you the truth, I think we are the only people who are of that opinion."

"We have been very wrong to originate such a foolish invention; for which we are sincerely sorry."

"On the contrary, I am much obliged to you."

"But it is our duty to contradict it, and to confess how foolish we have been."

Truth cannot remain long concealed; people began to wonder that no news came from Martinique; the wise and prudent shook their heads ominously when my name was mentioned.

"The most ludicrous feature in the case is," said one, "that he has ended by believing the truth of his own invention. For my part, I must say that I was always rather skeptical about that inheritance."

"And I also," said M. Felix, "though it has cost me fifteen thousand francs."

On seeing a dozen letters on my table one morning, I guessed that the bubble had burst. Their contents were much alike; for instance:

"Mr. Mayer's respects to Mr. Méran, and having heavy payments to meet, will feel obliged by a cheque for the amount of the enclosed."

My replies disarmed all doubts of my perfect solvency.

"Mr. Méran thanks Mr. Mayer for having at last sent in his account, and encloses a cheque for the amount."

My cool and unconcerned demeanor kept curiosity alive for a few days longer.

"What a lucky fellow!" said one.

"Luck has nothing to do with it," rejoined another; "he has played his cards well, and has won."

Once or twice, I confess, I felt compunction of conscience; but a moment's reflection convinced me that my own exertions had no share in my good fortune, and that I owed it all to a universal public worship of the Golden Calf, and to the truth of Albert's axiom, "The next best thing to capital is credit."

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14, 1865.

THE RECENT EARTHQUAKE.

IN the shock of last Sunday, not only several weak walls, but some beliefs, quite as imperfectly established, have been rudely shaken. Certain comfortable theories have been badly handled and must come down. The complacent argument so frequently used, that because no serious damage from earthquakes has hitherto befallen California, none may be hereafter expected, is not only illogical but false in its premises. According to lately published data, the thick walls of adobe churches were overthrown during a previous shock, with great loss of life; and it would be as ridiculous to imagine that the same degree of force applied to buildings of weaker construction would not result in a calamity commensurate with the greater amount of material and population involved, as to suppose that hereafter earthquakes on this coast will never exceed the one of Sunday last.

The comments of the daily press have been characteristic and local. The Alta evidently regards the whole affair as a vast "Fitz Smythe" practical joke, and, indeed, the occurrence may be said to have combined that levity of treatment and seriousness of result, which characterize the remarkable humor of that apochryphal personage, who has gradually absorbed the impersonality of the Alta. The Flag treats the subject sensationally, under an impresssion—not clearly defined—that an earthquake may be used advantageously against the Alta and Bulletin; while the latter journal, excepting an equivocal intimation that there is more danger in running away from San Francisco than in remaining, offers its readers the consolation of statistics. The interior papers regard the phenomenon as being in some mysterious way a retribution on San Francisco for her metropolitan egotism; and, in the light of this greater evil, Sacramento looks back on her inundations with native pride. But Mr. Supervisor Torrey may be regarded as the real earthquake hero. In a debate touching the expediency of rebuilding the shattered City Hall, that gentleman is reported to have declared his willingness to occupy the building during another shock as great as that which wrought the present damage. Whether Mr. Torrey had read the story of Quintius Curtius, and wished to avert calamity from his beloved city, by throwing himself—a valuable citizen and supervisor—into the chasm, we are unable to state. On the whole, we rather hope that he will not be permitted to try the experiment. We are inclined to think that the earthquake would be restrained by Mr. Torrey, but it would be poor consolation to be swallowed up with him for the sake of contradicting his theory. Mr. Torrey is a builder; so is the earthquake; but, in the formation of continents and islands, and the erection of public buildings, there is some difference in the agencies and power employed.

It is time to look calmly at the facts elicited by our late terrible experience. Extravagant timidity and overstrained levity are equally out of place. There can be no doubt that, at about noon on the 8th day of October 1865, the city of San Francisco was placed in imminent and deadly peril, and that we have only negative evidence to prove that this peril is not continually impending. The duration of a few seconds longer of the same shock, or an application of equal force hours later, would have levelled to the ground many buildings which, sorely shaken, had survived the first disturbance. The eruption of Mount Hood, whether a cause or result of terrestial discomposure—whether a safety valve of explosive gases or the generator of disorganizing forces—proves incontestibly that the building and formation of this part of the earth's surface is still going on, without any reference to our puny labors on its surface. Whether we have been premature in selecting this unfinished foundation for our young empire, or whether its peculiar geology has fitted it for one of Nature's permanent workshops, may be important to future generations; the present fact, that we are liable at any moment to calamity from these causes, being the only one that concerns us.

We do not suppose that our people will run away from the earthquake, or that California will be materially retarded in her progress or population. We need not recall the Swiss village, nestled beneath a cliff, over which for centuries a fearful avalanche has impended, nor need we point to the vineyards which contest, inch by inch, the burning lava that smokes along the sides of Mount Vesuvius, to show how seldom these risks are weighed in the economy of civilization. Let us take them calmly; without recklessness, without fear. We cannot escape the great law of compensation which underlies all Nature. We pay for our half-yearly summers and the bland security of our winters, in droughts and innundations; if we are to accept the theory of a great geologist and chemist,* we pay for that mineralogical wealth which has made us famous, in the earthquake shock and volcanic fire. The vitality of our atmosphere and the long days of labor it affords, is extravagantly compensated by prematnre old age and wasted energies. If we ascend to the moral and social plane, we pay for the unrestrained and easy pioneer intercourse of our civilization, in crime, Vigilance Committees, social vice, and scandal. The earthquake belongs to that system of compensation which admits nothing unpaid or unpayable, and balances the debit side of California's account with Nature.

THEATRICAL TALK.

AT Maguire's Opera House large audiences have been in attendance nightly. On Monday evening The Lady of Lyons was performed, Mr. Bandmann played the character of "Claude Melnotte" very satisfactorily, and Mrs. Sophie Edwin was extremely good in that of "Pauline." On Tnesday, Mlle de Vestvali reappeared, playing "Bianca" in Fazio, or the Italian Wife. Mlle Vestvali, in her impersonation of the character of "Bianca," displayed much power, and was frequently applauded. On Wednesday, Mr. Bandmann appeared as "Shylock," in The Merchant of Venice; it is of this performance I have to speak. Mr. Bandmann's "Shylock" has been praised by many Eastern papers as his great character; I cannot agree with critics who hold the opinion that Mr. Bandmann, in his impersonation of "Shylock," displays as much talent as in "Narcisse." In the latter he is faultless; he understands the character and realizes it. His "Shylock" is extremely faulty; he makes many good points and gives greater force to some old poiuts than is done by many actors; but he makes some extraordinary mistakes. In the scene with "Bassanio" he is shockingly noisy, even where he is supposed to be calculating the risk attendant on granting the loan of three thousand dncats on the security of "Antonio's" bond. The Jewish usurer, the man whose money is his god, who will fawn and cringe to the Christian if he can by so doing make money, is altogether too "cheeky." By what right does Mr. Bandmann make "Shylock," after laying his plot to gain revenge on "Antonio," speak the lines

> "O Father Abraham,
> What these Christians are;
> Whose own hard dealings teaches them suspect
> The thoughts of others,"

as an aside to the audience? Is it not a portion of his remonstrance addressed to "Antonio" and "Bassanio?" Mr. Bandmann, with eyes uplifted in horror, stands in the centre of the stage and makes this appeal to Abraham while "Antonio" and "Bassanio" stand aside and converse. This is as false a conception as can possibly be imagiued. "Shylock's" simulated horror at his proposal being considered as any other than a merry sport, is a sham to lull the suspicions of "Bassanio," not real distress at being so wronged and misunderstood, as Mr. Bandmann would have the audience believe. Mr. Bandmann's acting and reading were most correct in the first sceue of the third act. Any actor who attempts to soften down the wickedness of and gain sympathy for the villainous "Shylock," who has not one redeeming point in his character, will fail in representing the Jew that Shakspeare drew. The audience, on Wednesday evening, saw through Mr. Bandmauu's attempt to do this, and the applause which broke forth as the crushed and brokendowu "Shylock" slank from the court, was an outburst of genuine satisfaction at the discomfiture of the villainous old Jewish usurer, far more than it was an endorsement of Mr. Bandmann's rendition of the character. Mrs. Sophie Edwin's impersonation of "Portia" showed much care and study. Mr. C. R. Thorne, with the exception of a false reading now and then, played "Bassanio" very well; Mr. Aldrich was very good as "Antonio;" Mr. Barry played "Launcelot Gobbo" excellently well; Mr. Thayer was sadly out of his element in the character of "Gratiano," but did his best. The piece was not strongly cast, by any means. I fully expect to be able to say as much in praise of Mr. Bandmann's "Hamlet" as I have been forced to say in depreciation of his "Shylock," and shall be pleased to have an opportunity offered me. On Thnrsday, Planche's romantic drama of The Brigands was presented, Mlle Vestvali assuming the role of "Allessandro Massaroni," in which she had a better opportunity afforded her for the display of her talent for masculine impersonations than in "Romanio." In the songs of "Gentle Zitella" and "Father, is this thy Welcome?" Mlle Vestvali's fine voice was heard to great advantage. The greatest melo-dramatic male character in which this extraordinary actress appears has been reserved for her benefit, which takes place to-night. On this occasion the Duke's Daughter, or The Fool and his Master, which has been for some time past in preparation, will be presented, with magnificent scenery, dresses, etc., Mlle Vestvali impersonating "Lagadere." Mr. Daniel E. Bandmann's first benefit, which took place last night, could not fail to be well attended, seeing that he played that wonderful "Narcisse."

Mr. G. C. Boniface, who played a most successful engagement at the New Bowery Theatre, New York, previous to his departure for this State, appearing in a round of Shakspearian characters, arrived on the last steamer, under engagement to Mr. Magnire. A whole constellation of stars will shortly be formed at the Opera House.

This afternoon's bill will be The Captain of the Watch and The Maid of Croissy.

At the Metropolitan Theatre, Mr. Wheatleigh has nothing to do but keep the box office open and the public rush to secure their seats. Every one knows what is the attraction here; Arrah-na-Pogue's popularity is bnt little cooled, after a run of three weeks. Where all the audiences come from is a mystery; the house is well filled every night. Whether or not the Fenians have entered into solemn league to keep this piece running until Ireland is free, and expended the money collected at the meeting the other night in the purchase of tickets to witness this rebellious drama, I cannot with certainty say, but it is an undeniable fact that Arrah-na-Pogue seems likely, after a three week's run, to fill the Metropolitan fairly every night next week.

On Thursday night, Mrs. Sedley Brown will take her first benefit in California. Mrs. Brown has played "Arrah Meelish" in a very pleasing manner dnrring the run of "Arrah na Pogue," though, I fancy, this character is not so well calculated to display her talent as one which would call for more fun and vivacity. Mrs. Sedley Brown comes of a theatrical family, being the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Smith, so long the favorites of the Boston Museum.

The late terrible disaster to the Yosemite, has deprived the theatrical profession of two promising members. W. Stephenson and J. E. Myers who were returning from filling an engagement to Mr. Maguire at the Marysville Theatre, were killed by the explosion. Mr. Stepheuson was for some time a member of Maguire's Opera House company, and had attained a commendable proficiency in his profession, playing "juvenile" bnsiness very creditably. He was a good fellow, and much liked by all his brother professionals. His adopting the stage led to his estrangement from his relatives, who occupy a high position in San Francisco society now, as the poor fellow lies dead, he is still unforgiven, and that the tears of strangers alone will fall on his lifeless form. Mr. J. E. Myers was a native of London, England; he made his first appearance on the stage at the theatre in Victoria, V. I. After playing several engagements in Portland, Boise, and California, he joined Mr. Wheatleigh's Eureka company, and during the few weeks he remained at that theatre, displayed so much talent as a low comedian, that he speedily became quite a favorite. Leaving the Eureka, he joined Mr. Maguire's troupe and played at the Sacramento and Marysville theatres. Had not death cut short his life, this promising young actor would have attained a high rank in the low comedy branch of the dramatic profession. The untimely decease of Mr. Myers is deeply regretted by all who knew him; he was generally loved and respected. He leaves a wife and a brother in this city.

TOUCHSTONE.

THE "YOSEMITE" EXPLOSION.—Yesterday, the telegraph announced the startling intelligence of the explosion of the starboard boiler of the Yosemite, just as she was leaving the landing at Rio Vista, on her downward trip. The Yosemite, built some three years ago, was provided with two low-pressure boilers, forcing and supply pumps, steam and water guages, all apparently in perfect order, and comparatively new. The cause of the accident is not known. The force of the explosion threw the upper cabin, pilot-house, and everything forward of the smoke-stack, into a perfect wreck. This locality seems to be a fatal one to steamboats. It was opposite Rio Vista that the Nevada was snnk and wrecked; and a few miles below, the Washoe met with her final disaster. The following persons were killed: J. H. Myers, comedian; J. M. Fallon, Treasurer; H. Major, machinist; Wm. H. Stephenson, comedian, (members of Magnire's Theatrical Tronpe, recently performing in Sacramento and Marysville;) J. H. Barnes; G. W. Seaton, Senator-elect for Amador county; William Rogers; Patrick Crowell, coal-passer; three white men, names unknown. The missing are: Sntherland, of the Bank of British North America; Decker, of the Central Pacific Railroad Co.; A. Lindaner, of Virginia, Nev.; and some twenty Chinamen, known to he in the hold of the steamer. There were forty or fifty persons maimed or scalded.

A RECENT fancy of Parisian existence is said to be the universal cultivation of violets. An exchange says: "The sale of these sweet flowers is prodigious. They are raised on the heights of Romainville in immense fields, and from early morning until night thousands of women and children are seen exploring the spacious woods that lie around the city in search of them. It is estimated that ten thousand dollars' worth are daily purchased in Paris."

ANSWERING THE BELL.

A STORY OF THE LATE EARTHQUAKE.

AT Number Four, had Dennis More
A decent situation—
A Celtic youth, who showed, in truth,
But little cultivation,
And "wore the green"—the kind I mean
Not reached by legislation.

His knowledge did not go beyond
The door-bell he attended,
The boots he blacked—the services
On which his place depended;
Yet with his humble duties he
A certain zeal had blended.

One Sunday morn—the folks were all
At church, and no doubt sleeping,
While Dennis More at Number Four
His household watch was keeping—
When all at once there came a ring
That set his pulses leaping.

He started to his feet, but ere
He took erect position,
A certain trembling in his knees
Betrayed their weak condition;
And looking round, poor Dennis found
This fearful exhibition:

The kitchen clock that ere the shock
The time of day was showing,
Had stopped its pendulum, although
The clock itself was going;
It fell—he thought the End of Time
Had come, with no man's knowing.

The tumblers tumbled on the shelves,
Moved by mysterious forces,
The plates were shifted as they are
In dinners of twelve courses;
And knives went racing for the plate,
Just like St. Leger horses.

But high above the general crash
He heard the door-bell ringing,
And staggering to his feet he reached
The hall, where he saw swinging
The study door, and down before
Its bookshelves he fell, clinging.

One hurried glance he gave—enough
For fatal confirmation—
The very globe upon its stand
Still rocked to its foundation,
And all the standard volumes seemed
In active circulation.

The fearful thrill, continuing still,
Had loosed "The Stones of Venice,"
The law-books just above his head
Ejectment seemed to menace—
Till down fell "Coke on Littleton,"
Followed by "Kent" on Dennis!

The very poets were disturbed—
The mild and peaceful Lakers,
As though they'd caught from "Aspen Court"
Some power that made them Shakers;
Or, that the "Life of William Penn"
Had turned them all to Quakers.

The "Testimony of the Rocks,"
In rocking, was appalling—
Thermometer and weather-glass
Both side by side were falling;
Yet midst the jar—a Leyden jar—
He heard the door-bell calling.

Half dead, he reached the hall again—
Sometimes on all-fours creeping—
Wide swung the parlor's creaking door,
And, through the portals peeping,
He saw a Turkish ottoman
Like some wild dervish leaping;

Four high-backed chairs that waltzed in pairs,
Two easy-chairs coquetting;
And—like some dowager that found
A partner hard of getting—
The piano against the wall
Was right and left foot poussetting.

Yet, spite of giddy sights and scenes
Of books and portraits reeling,
To Dennis' brain one thing was plain—
The door-bell still was pealing;
He seized the knob expectant of
Some frightful form revealing!

The hinges swung—the door was flung
Wide open; but no spying
Disclosed the hand that rung the bell,
Nor anybody trying,
Save that a pale-faced man stood near,
The walls intently eyeing.

One bound gave Dennis to the ground
And seized the rash spectator—
With wicked fingers round his throat
He clutched his respirator:
"Is thim your Sunday thricks?" he cried,
"Ye haythen agitator!"

"The earthquake!" gasped the wretch. With scorn
Bold Dennis drew his brows down;
"The airthquake, is it?" then he gave
A forcible but coarse noun—
"And that's the wake excuse ye'd give
For ringing masther's house down!" BRET.

THE GREAT EARTHQUAKE.

BY "DIONYSIUS VAGO."

SOME time since, imbued with the idea that perhaps I would be doing the world of science and philosophy a tremendous service by collecting facts of personal experience which might furnish a basis to some savan or other on which to found an inductive theory as to the moral force of earthquakes, I sent word to a number of my friends of different stations in life and various modes of thought, that I would be pleased to receive from them written accounts of their particular sensations during any disturbance of the earth which might happen thereafter. I expected at the time to embody the whole collection in a report to the Smithsonian Institute, but such documents as I have received hardly seem scientific enough to be thrown away on that respected Institution, and I therefore place them before the readers of THE CALIFORNIAN with no apology other than the uncertain condition of San Francisco terrene affairs since last Sunday morning may imply.

My first report comes of I. Calculus Indifference, Esq. He sends it in the form of an affidavit, which doubtless will add to the respect elicited for its facts:

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, } ss.
City and County of San Francisco, }

Before me, a Notary Public in and for the City and County of San Francisco, personally appeared I. Calculus Indifference, who being duly sworn, avers as follows:

At sixteen minutes of one in the afternoon of Sunday the 10th day of October, A. D. 1865, I was seated in my office in the third story of Law Block in the City of San Francisco, engaged in drawing a demurrer in the case of Jones vs. Ericson. I was in a cool and thoughtful state of mind, in no wise subject to any false or uncertain grounds of terror. I had arisen from my chair, and was crossing the room to procure a volume of Hill's Reports, when I was shaken by some novel force into a prostrate condition, while the whole case of books through which I was looking came down upon me. Meanwhile the walls of the room began to divest themselves of their plaster, and it occurred to me then that an earthquake had occurred. Anxious to know the exact moment, I left for my watch, an open-faced chronometer of Liverpool manufacture. I discovered that my right eye had received a severe contusion which prevented my employing it to advantage, while my left was obscured by the weight of the XXVI. Cala. By dint of physical exertion, or as pettifoggers will sometimes say, vi et armis, I relieved my left organ of vision sufficiently to enable me to consult my watch, the crystal of which was shattered, and discovered that the hands had stopped at precisely fourteen minutes thirty-eight seconds of one. Allowing for the length of time required for the book-case to fall, and accepting sixteen feet per second for the velocity of bodies under the positive influence of gravitation, adding to the time the delay occasioned by the fact that the summit of the case must needs have performed a distance denoted by an arc measuring a right angle and of about nine feet radius, and having applied the test of differentiation to the problem, I conclude that the approximate moment at which the quaking occurred must have been fourteen minutes, forty-five seconds before one. This result is of course subject to correction on the part of any more critical observer.

On arising from the floor, from which I had been making my observations thus far, I discovered that the fallen book-case had, by its weight, produced a fracture in the bones of my left leg. The calculation of time herein before given may need some variation in consequence of the positive force thus evinced by the action of a falling body. However, I have not as yet been able to gain from my medical adviser the data of the strength of osseous bodies, necessary to arrive at a proper result. When I have done so, I will correct my statement.

Dragging myself to the window, I found that the glass had been broken in every pane. I observed as closely as my then imperfect vision would permit, the direction and character of the fractures. They appeared to have been caused by some irregular force, such as a shaking of the earth by the wind. I now was obliged to lie down again; but a section of plaster, something like three yards and nine inches square, came down (having been loosened by the shock.) and battered me into a senseless condition, which, I am sorry, for the cause of science, to say, prevented my further observations at the time. I may say, however, that from the manner in which the cracks in the wall were formed, and which I had just time to observe before the crash of falling plaster came, I should judge that the waves of motion were in a nearly east and west direction.

From my present helpless condition, it will be impossible for me to make further examinations for some time to come. Should any further shock of a peculiarly interesting nature occur, I will do my best to give you a more extended account.

I. CALCULUS INDIFFERENCE.

Katty O'Hoolahan, a very impressible lady friend of mine who gains her bread by tending to certain duties as to beds and wash-bowls at the inn where I at times find welcome, was extremely glad to oblige me. Her only trouble was that she could not get her shaky reminiscences together with coherence enough to satisfy, as she thought, my literary demands. At last she told me that she would just tell me "all she could remimber, and, if I loiked, I could write it out as I plazed."

"Ye see, Mistthur Vagho, I was up in the third story wid the broom in me hand cluning about widout much iday of the wurk I was doin'. Jist thin, Mike came up the stairway carrying a thray an' four cocktails for some military gintlemen in the room beyant. Ye know Mike, maybe. It's he that's so good looking and nate in his linen, and has such purty eyes that's as big as saucers, and a fine bonest boy he is an' a credit to the house that he wurks fur. They do be saying that he's very fond of me; an' I call him a swatehcart myself sometimes, but it's only to bodther him. He's jist a gossoon yet, and too innicint to fall in love with a girl like me. (Of course the reader will supply any ellipses that I may make as to what I said during the recital. I could not have permitted Katty thus to disparage her powers of conquest without putting in an energetic demurrer. Whenever she is found referring to herself, I would not have been so ungallant as to suffer any self-deprecation on her part.) As I was saying, Mike had come up the stairway and was standing furnenst me with the thray, whin the glasses began to jump about as if they were chickens and the thray a bot griddle. 'Mike,' said I, 'carry your hand a little steadier; it's ashamed I am of you to have the thrimbles so airly in the marning.' Just thin, he flung the glasses and all over the bannisters, and tumbled right upon me, and wid that I gave him a welt over the back wid the broom-handle, as much as to say, 'It's not a dhrunken beau I'll have, whatever lookout there is for a husband.' But before I cud pit it to him again, I found my knees wakening under me, and the doors shetting and opening, and the windows breaking, and the people rushing down stairs; and I crossed myself, remimbering that I hadn't been at confessional for the matter of six months or more, and what a look Father Lancy had given me at mass in the morning. Mike was spry enough though. He grabbed me about the waist, and for that matter betune you and me it was no new journey for the rascal's arm, and rin down, lepping three or four steps at onct, and me with him like a witch goin' off with the Evil One, feeling as though he might be eloping wid me, as the ladies say, until we reached the ground floor whin he stopped, and some man wid no coat or shoes on said 'It's all over.' 'It's all over, is it?' said Mike. 'Sure Katty my girl, we must go back thin as we came; and he tuk hould of me again, and broom and all we wint thravelling back, only Mike would be stopping on the landings just to see if I had fainted and by the same token he kissed me, the blaggard, which I being somewhat highsterickle took no notice of at the time. And one white-faced potato-water-blooded fellow said, whin he caught Mike at my lips, 'See that hair-brained Mick kissing and hugging his girl whin we're all on the brink of deth.' I pruned up enough to tell him that he'd be far enough over it before his conrage would give him the same liberty. Then Mike tried to aise my mind of the danger. Whin I was well over the fright, I set to with the broom and dhruv the rascal away, and have been as cross to him ever since as a child wid a pin in its clothes. And I pray ivery night that there will be no more of them airthquake; but if there is, I want Mike to be near me."

The following is from a delightful little belle of my acquaintance that was tinkled badly by the shock:

"You queer old Vago: How odd it was of you to ask me to give you an account of my feelings during that horrid earthquake. If I had known what I would be obliged to disclose, you should never, never, have got me to make the promise. But I must keep my word I suppose, and make the confession. How shall I begin? Oh, dear, please don't show it to any one.

It happened just after we finished lunch. Charlie (you know Charlie; and isn't he a dear, good, handsome fellow, and such a moustache!) was at the house as usual on Sundays. Pa and he lighted their odious cigars together, and then pa went off to his crony next door. Ma was busy down stairs, I guess, and so we were all alone. Charlie puffed a bit and his cigar went out, and then I got up to get a match to help him light it. (His cigars always do go out when we are by ourselves.) The horrible thing wouldn't light, and I tried again and again, until Charlie took hold of my hand to "steady it" he said, and when that match went out, he threw away the cigar, said it was green, but kept hold of my wrist and made me sit down by his side. He is really rude sometimes, as I have often told him. Charlie then commenced to say all sorts of pretty things, and smoothed my hair, and laughed at my "rats," and threatened to run away with my waterfall, and told me that oh, I was so pretty, (you know Vago, how young men talk sometimes,) and said that I was "the star of his existence," and "his brightest hope," and that he treasured me, oh, so much. I told him that Aunty Gruff, (she is an old, old maid and doesn't like Charlie a bit because he always jokes about ladies' ages,) said that young men never told the truth when they talked to us girls. He said that Auntie Gruff never had had a chance to hear a young man talk and couldn't be a judge of the matter; and then we both laughed, (Don't you think him very witty?) and then he put on such a sober, grave look, and said that his life would prove to me how great his devotion to his angel was; and—but you can imagine what he would have said if, just then, the house had not commenced to shake and the vases to dance a breakdown on the mantlepiece, and the glass to jump out of the windows, and Charlie looked very uneasy, and I felt oh, so sick, and clung to Charlie who put his arm around me, and said if it came, we would meet it in each other's embrace! (He said it just like an actor would,) and then I fainted with fright. When I recovered, Charlie was bending over me with a sponge dipped in coal oil by mistake, and he looked anxious for me; and I just couldn't help putting my arms around him and crying. Then Charlie tried to get the oil off my face, (some of it was on his mouth somehow, and he made all sorts of wry faces.) and then pa and ma rushed in, and Charlie looked embarrassed and couldn't tell his experience, (neither could I,) and then ma guessed it and winked at pa, and everybody laughed and cried at the same time as they do at Arrahna-Pogue. That is all, dear Vago, and don't make fun of me.

"Your quaking friend, AUGUSTA SUMMERS."

THE "WIND OF A BALL."

THE following extract from Dr. Frank Hamilton's Treatise on Military Surgery, refutes the popular error that death is sometimes caused by aerial concussion :

Occasionally a soldier is found dead upon the field upon whose body no mark of a wound, or of a contusion even, can be found, and his comrades have always, in such cases, ascribed his death to the "wind" or "whiff" of a shell or large solid shot; but surgeons very well understand that this is not the true explanation. However large the missile may be, however great its speed, or closely it may approximate the body, unless it actually touches, it cannot cause death, or inflict any serious harm. In the case supposed, the man had been struck, probably by a large and nearly spent ball, which may be said to have rolled over him, extinguishing life instantly by the concussion of the shock; or it may have been a side-glance of one of those huge missiles across the chest or abdomen. Under such circumstances the action of the heart ceases so suddenly that effusions, swellings, and discolorations may not occur, just as we have known death to be caused instantly among pugilists by a "foul blow" upon the pit of the stomach, even though not delivered with great force; and when no mark, either external or internal, has indicated the nature of the injury.

The following case will be easily recognized as an example of death from this cause:

At about one o'clock on the morning of the 31st of July, 1862, while the army of General McClellan was lying upon the banks of the James River, at Harrison's Landing, the batteries of the enemy on the opposite side of the river suddenly opened a terrific fire upon our crowded encampment, and upon the large fleet of vessels lying at that point. Among those who were killed, we carefully examined the body of John Booth, private of the Sixth Pennsylvania Cavalry. Upon the right side of his face was a slight abrasion of the skin, but no swelling or discoloration, and this might have been occasioned by the fall. Beyond this he bore no mark of injury, at least upon the external surface of the body. The account of his death given by those who stood near was, that a cannon shot passed first through the neck of a horse in front of him, then struck the ground, ricochetted, and struck Booth as he was standing upon the ground, killing him instantly. Precisely where he was hit we had no means of knowing.

In another case which came under my notice, the explanation of the phenomena caused by the missile was not so simple. At the battle of Blackburn's Ford, in Virginia, on the 18th of July, 1861, G. Wenzel, a private in the Second Wisconsin, was kneeling, when, as he affirms, he saw the cannon ball approaching. He instantly threw his head to one side, and at the same instant received a blow which carried away his hat and threw him over sideways, so that his face struck the ground. For a short time he could neither see nor hear, yet he did not lose his consciousness. He states also that the same ball carried away both legs of Louis Gardner, a private, who was standing behind him. We saw Wenzel a few hours after the accident, and, as he seemed very intelligent, we interrogated and examined him closely. The whole of the right side of his face was red, as if it had been slightly scalded; the upper eyelid of the left side was in the same condition, but the remainder of the left side of his face presented a natural appearance. Over the whole extent of the reddened surface were small, dark-colored petechiæ of a line or two in diameter. His sight and hearing are now perfect. On the 20th we saw him again. The reddened surface was somewhat swollen, and a mild conjunctival inflammation had developed itself in both eyes; the petechiæ had not disappeared, and no other changes had taken place. This was the last we saw of the patient. The only solution of the phenomena which we can offer is, that his cap came between his face and the ball, and inflicted the injuries we have described.

In the same battle John Hays, a private in the Sixty-ninth New York Infantry, had his right ear shot away with a cannon ball. We found him, after several hours, at Centreville. He was then inclined to sleep, and was not easily aroused, yet he was not actually comatose. The ear was carried away completely, but there was no wound of the scalp, or evidence of contusion. In this case also it is possible that his cap was partially interposed between the ball and his head.

On the other hand, examples without number may be cited in which large cannon shot have carried away an ear, a nose, the lower jaw, or both upper and lower jaws, without leaving any impression upon the system at large. Large proportions of flesh have been torn from the back, the sides of the body; the ribs have been broken, or denuded of their skin and flesh; the muscles enclosing the abdomen have been more or less torn away, without causing immediate death, and without inflicting any material injury to the parts adjacent and not actually touched.

Sometimes large portions of the flesh are contused by these missiles, but not broken upon the surface; the contusion being accompanied with a loss of sensation in the part, and great swelling, and being followed by rapid sphacelation. At other times broad, dark-colored, and superficial eschars are found looking as if the surface had been charred by fire. It is very common for these superficial injuries caused by cannon shot, to be followed by numbness of an entire limb, or of a large portion of a side of the body.

When the bones of a limb are broken by these solid shots, and the integuments are not torn, the fracture is seldom simple, but almost always the comminution is excessive. This fact will be recognized by grasping the limb firmly, when the sensation will be conveyed of a large number of fragments rubbing upon each other. Under such circumstances amputation, which offers only a feeble chance, is the only resort.

Chain and bar-shot, used occasionally in cannon, and which are especially destructive at short range, we have not seen employed during the present war. They cannot be thrown with much accuracy, but when they strike a body of men approaching they sweep through like a flail, dividing in two everything with which they come in contact. In a few instances, we have been informed, our enemies have thrown fragments of railroad iron, but they are said to have always fallen so far short of their mark as to have done little or no harm.

A DAY'S MARCH.

A DAY'S march varies according to the country to be traversed or the opposition encountered. If the map indicates a stream crossing the path, probably the strong party of mounted infantry or of cavalry which has been sent forward the day before has found the bridges burned, and then the pontoons are pushed on to the front. If a battle is anticipated, the trains are shifted to the rear of the centre. Under any circumstances, the divisions having the lead move unencumbered by wagons, and in close fighting trim. The ambulances following in the rear of the division are in such close proximity as to be available if needed. In the rear of each regiment follow the pack-mules, laden with every kind of camp baggage, including blankets, pots, pans, kettles, and all the kitchenware needed for cooking. Here will be found the led horses, and with them the negro servants, who form an important feature of the ménage.

Having placed the column upon the road, let us now follow that long line of muskets gleaming in the rays of the morning sunlight, and ride, heedless of the crack of the rifles, to the head of the column. The flankers are driving a squad of Rebel cavalry before them so fast that the march is not in the least impeded. The flankers spread out, on a line parallel to the leading troops, for several hundred yards, more or less, as the occasion may require. They search through the swamps and forests, ready for any concealed foe, and anxiously looking out for any line of works which may have been thrown up by the enemy to check our progress. Here the General of the division, if a fighting man, is most likely to be found; his experienced eye noting that there is no serious opposition, he orders up a brigade or another regiment, who, in soldier's phraseology, send the Rebel rascals "kiting," and the column moves on. A large plantation appears by the road-side. If the "bummers" have been ahead, the chances are that it has been visited, in which event the interior is apt to show evidences of confusion; but the barns are full of corn and fodder, and parties are at once detailed to secure and convey the prize to the road-side. As the wagons pass along they are not allowed to halt, but the grain or fodder is stuffed into the front and rear of the vehicles as they pass, the unhandy operation affording much amusement to the soldiers, and not unfrequently giving them a poor excuse for swearing as well as laughing.

When the treasure-trove of grain, poultry, and vegetables has been secured, one man is detailed to guard it until the proper wagon comes along. Numbers of these details will be met, who, with proper authority, have started off early in the morning, and have struck out miles away from the flank of the column. They sit upon some cross-road, surrounded with their spoils—chickens, turkeys, geese, ducks, pigs, hogs, sheep, calves, nicely-dressed hams, buckets full of honey, and pots of fresh white lard.

A Roman consul returning with victorious eagles could not wear a more triumphant air than this solitary guard. The soldiers see it, and gibe him as they pass :

"Say, you thar! where did you steal them pigs?"

"Steal!" is the indignant response; "steal! perhaps you would like to have one of "them" pigs yourself."

An officer who is riding along gazes upon the appetizing show. He has recently joined, never has been on one of Sherman's raids, and does not know that a soldier will not sell his chickens for any price.

"Ah! a nice pair of ducks you have there, soldier; what will you take for them?"

Firmly, but respectfully, the forager makes answer, touching his cap the while, "They are not in the market. We never sell our stuff, sir—couldn't think of it."

The officer rides away through a battery of broad grins from the by-stauders, and never again offers to buy the spoils of a forager.

There is a halt in the column. The officer in charge of the pioneer corps, which follows the advance guard, has discovered an ugly place in the road, which must be "corduroyed" at once, before the wagons can pass. The pioneers quickly tear down the fence near by and bridge over the treacherous place, perhaps at the rate of a quarter of a mile in fifteen minutes. If rails are not near, pine saplings and split log supply their place. Meanwhile the bugles have sounded, and the column has halted. The soldiers, during the temporary halt, drop out of line on the road-side, lying upon their backs, supported by their still unstrapped knapsacks. If the halt is a long one, the different regiments march by file right, one behind the other, into the fields, stacking their muskets, and taking their rest at ease, released from their knapsack.

These short halts are of great benefit to the soldier. He gains a breathing-spell, has a chance to wipe the perspiration from his brow and the dust out of his eyes, or pulls off his shoes and stockings to cool his swollen, heated feet, though old campaigners do not feel the need of this. He munches his bit of hard bread, or pulls out a book from his pocket, or oftener a pipe, to indulge in that greatest of luxuries to the soldier, a soothing, refreshing smoke. Here may be seen one group at a brook-side, bathing their heads and drinking; and another, crowded round an old song-book, are making very fair music. One venturesome fellow has kindled a fire, and is brewing a cup of coffee. All are happy and jolly; but when the bugle sounds "fall in" and "forward," in an instant every temporary occupation is dropped, and they are on the road again.

This massing of brigades and wagons during a halt is a proper and most admirable arrangement. It keeps the column well closed up; and if a brigade or division has by some means been delayed, it has the opportunity to overtake the others. The Twentieth Corps manage this thing to perfection.

A great many of the mounted officers ride through the fields, on either side of the line of march, so as not to interfere with the troops. General Sherman always takes to the fields, dashing through thickets or plunging into the swamps, and, when forced to take the road, never breaks into a regiment or brigade, but waits until it passes, and then falls in. He says that they, and not he, have the right to the road.

Sometimes a little creek crosses the path, and at once a foot-bridge is made upon one side of the way for those who wish to keep dry-shod; many, however, with a shout of derision, will dash through the water at a run, and then they all shout the more when some unsteady comrade misses his footing and tumbles in at full length. The unlucky wight, however, takes the fun at his expense in the best of humor. Indeed, as a general rule, soldiers are good-humored and kind-hearted to the last degree. I have seen a soldier stand at a spring of water for ten minutes, giving thirsty comers cool draughts, although it would delay him so that he would have to run a quarter of a mile or more to overtake his company. The troops, by the way, kept their ranks admirably during this Georgia campaign. Occasionally, however, they would rush for a drink of water, or for a beehive which they would despoil of its sweets with a total disregard of the swarm of bees buzzing about their ears, but which, strange to say, rarely stung.

But the sun has long since passed the zenith, the droves of cattle which have been driven through the swamps and fields are lowing and wandering in search of a corral, the soldiers are beginning to lag a little, the teamsters are obliged to apply the whip oftener, ten or fifteen miles have been traversed, and the designated halting-place for the night is near. The column must now be got into camp.

Officers ride on in advance to select the ground for each brigade, giving the preference to slopes in the vicinity of wood and water. Soon the troops file out into the woods and fields, the leading division pitching tents first, those in the rear marching on yet farther, ready to take their turn in the advance the next day.

As soon as the arms are stacked, the boys attack the fences and rail-piles, and with incredible swiftness their little shelter-tents spring up all over the ground. The fires are kindled with equal celerity, and the luxurious repast prepared, while "good digestion waits on appetite, and health on both." After this is heard the music of dancing or singing, the pleasant buzz of conversation, and the measured sound of reading. The wagons are meanwhile parked and the animals fed. If there has been a fight during the day, the incidents of success or failure are recounted; the poor fellow who lies wounded in "the anguish-laden ambulance" is not forgotten, and the brave comrade who fell in the strife is remembered with words of loving praise.

By-and-by the tattoo rings out on the night air. Its familiar sound is understood. "Go to rest, go to rest," it says, as plainly as organs of human speech.

Shortly after follows the peremptory command of "Taps." "Out lights, out lights, out lights!" The soldier gradually disappears from the camp-fire. Rolled snugly in his blanket, the soldier dreams again of home, or revisits in imagination the battle-fields he has trod. The animals, with dull instinct, lie down to rest, and with dim gropings of consciousness ruminate over "fresh fields and pastures new." The fires, neglected by the sleeping men, go out, gradually flickering and smouldering, as if unwilling to die.

All is quiet. The army is asleep. Perhaps there is a brief interruption to the silence as some trooper goes clattering down the road on an errand of speed, or some uneasy sleeper turns over to find an easier position. And around the slumbering host the picket-guards keep quiet watch, while constant, faithful hearts in Northern and Western homes pray that the angels of the Lord may encamp around the sleeping army. Major Nichols—Story of the Great March.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM

—OF—

WILD CHERRY,

HAS BEEN USED FOR

NEARLY HALF A CENTURY,

With the most astonishing success in curing

Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of

The Throat, Lungs and Chest,

INCLUDING EVEN

CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last-named and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the "medicinal gum" of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaints is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great the popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry there are commingled with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of

has induced many physcians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

S. H. Finley, M. D., San Francisco, Cal.
E. Boyden, M. D., Exeter, Me.
Alexander Hatch, M. D., China, Me.
R. Fellows, M. D., Hill, N. H.

W. B. Lynch, M. D., Auburn, N. Y.
Abraham Skillman, M. D., Boundbrook, N. J.
H. D. Martin, M. D., Mansfield, Pa.

The proprietors have letters from all classes of our fellow-citizens, from the Halls of Congress to the humblest cottage, and even from beyond the seas; for the fame and virtues of WISTAR'S BALSAM have extended to the "uttermost bounds of the earth," without any attempt on our part to introduce it beyond the limits of our own country

TO CALIFORNIANS AND OREGONIANS.

In future all genuine WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY for the Pacific Coast will be enclosed in a new wrapper which will bear the printed names of both *SETH W. INTERIOR ITEMS.

Two persons in Nevada, says the Union, got into a dispute on Sunday last. After quarrelling for some time, and thereby attracting a pretty large crowd, one of the parties called the other some hard name, and the latter turning to him, expressed his regret that it was the Sabbath, as, if it hadn t been, he would have knocked him down. This, of course, caused an outburst of merriment from those who had congregated in the expectation of seeing a fight; but the old fellow was determined to strike no blow that would have a tendency to break the Sabbath, and went off muttering "I wish it wasn't Sunday."

The Sacramento Union says: "The Central Pacific Railroad Company have been laying their plans for the operations of the year 1866. The surveys which have been in progress this summer have developed a better line over the mountains than was antieipated, and the Directors, after a full consideration of the work before them, have concluded that they can and will lay the track to the Truckee river next year. They have given the uecessary orders to effect that object. If successful, it will be a great feat in railroad building."

Two or three days ago, says the Sacramento Bee, Captain Pierce completed the job of building a wing dam in the Sacramento river opposite the eity. The effect has been good, as a bar but two hundred feet in length now prevents the San Francisco boats from reaching the landiug opposite the foot of K street. As the channel is gradually deepening, it may be expected that in a short time the familiar steamers will show their noble proportions in the old berth.

The Enterprise Company, Meadow Lake district, has sunk a shaft some thirty feet from the surface. A few days since a blast was put in and two tons of rock blown out, in any piece of which free gold may be found in large quantities. These ledges, says the Nevada Transcript, differ in many respects from any gold bearing rock yet found. They are all very wide and exceedingly rich on the top.

Judge Warner Earll, Treasurer of the Committee of Management of the John Brown Cottage Fund, says the Red Bluff Observer, has received, from various sourees, the sum of $216 50. Rev. L. S. Ely, of San Francisco, Treasurer of the Committee iu that city, paid over to Mrs. Brown, on the 5th of October, the sum of $212 50, making a total of $426 towards the cottage.

The Grass Valley National says: Notwithstanding the pleasant weather, there is a good deal of sickness prevailing, particularly in the country. The druggists inform us that they are disposing of a large quantity of medicines daily. Diphtheria appears to be on the increase in the interior, but it does not seem quite so difficult to manage as usual.

Sixteen miles from Grass Valley, on Bear river, we are informed by the National, grouse and mountain quail are abundant. Bear river and its tributaries, and particularly in the region of the old Emigrant road, are supplied with speckled trout innumerable.

A letter from Virginia City, Montana, informs the Douglas Camp Vedette that two more of that elass called "road agents" were—upon sufficient evidence—"elevated" by the Vigilantes at Virginia, September 27th. The names they sailed under were Jackson and Morgan, but their right names were Jones and Collins.

The Enterprise, of Virginia, records the fact that a day or two ago a couple of women were walking along a street in that city, when the wiud blew the mantilla of one of them aside, and diselosed a six shooter stickiug in her waist-belt. She was evidently on the war-path; had on her "paint," and was thirsting for the fray.

James H. Lawrence, editor of the Mariposa Free Press, who killed Christopher C. Wilson, at that place, on the night of the 30th ult., has been discharged from custody by the Justiee of the Peaee before whom an examination was had, ou the ground of self defence.

The Visalia Delta states that William Anderson accidentally shot himself dead near Converse's Ferry, about two weeks ago, while knocking the gravel out of his pistol, which had fallen iu the dirt.

The eelebrated Sheba Mine, in Humboldt county, Nevada, is to be sold at Sheriff's sale, to satisfy a judgment of $30,000 in favor of the Bank of California. Three years ago it was worth $300 a foot.

A Frenchman by the name of Jean Pillegreeny, while working in a drift at Michigan Bar, Scott river, recently, was instantly killed by a bowlder falling upou him from the roof of the drift.

The Wilmington Journal says that business is improving and the steamer finds plenty of employment at present. In Santa Barbara the oil interests are creating considerable trade.

James Ullman, who killed a colored barber at Idaho City, has been lodged in Fort Boise, to keep him from being lynched.

TO A TIMID LEECH.

BY OUR INVALID CONTRIBUTOR.

NAY, start not from the banquet where the red wine foams for thee—
Though somewhat thick to perforate this epidermis be;
'Tis madness, when the bowl invites, to linger at the brink,
So haste thee, haste thee, timid one. Drink, pretty creature, drink!

I tell thee, if these azure veins could boast the regal wine
Of Tudors or Plantagenets, the draught should still be thine!
Though round the goblet's beaded brim plebeian bubbles wink,
'Twill cheer and not inebriate. Drink, pretty creature, drink!

Perchance, reluctant being, I have placed thee wrong side up,
And the lips that I am chiding have been farthest from the cup.
I have waited long and vainly, and I cannot, cannot t. ink
Thou would't spurn the oft repeated call: Drink, pretty creature, drink!

While I watched thy patient struggles, and imagined thou wert coy,
'Twas thy tail, and not thy features, that refused the proffered joy.
I will but turn thee tenderly—nay, never, never shrink;
Now, once again the banquet calls: Drink, pretty creature, drink!

OUR OWN ÆSOP.

FABLE I.—THE FOX AND THE GRAPES.

AN artless fox went out for a morning walk, and, casting up his fine eyes quite promiscuous-like, beheld a bunch of grapes hanging just above his innocent little head. He imprudently ate several, but was very soon attacked by a most violeut fit of indisposition. "I now begin to perceive," said he, "that I have done something rash. However, I will try to console myself by supposing that those grapes were not at all sour."

Moral.—Never touch early fruit unless you are quite positive that you have a lively imagination.

FABLE II.—THE DOG AND THE SHADOW.

A dog was erossing a wooden bridge, with a slightly underdone mutton-chop in his mouth, when he beheld his refleetion considerably magnified iu the stream beneath. A common dog might have dropped the solid meat with a vague notion of getting the shadow into his possession; but this was not a eommon dog, or I should never have taken the trouble to write a fable about him. "Ah," said he, "this is evidently an optical illusiou, which will be explained some day by Professor Pepper at the Royal Polytechnic Institution. In the meantime, it is clear that although yonder chop is larger than mine, yonder dog is also larger, and consequently stronger, than I am; therefore, it would be imprudent in me to stand the chauces of a fight." Aud he went over and calmly ate his chop upon the other side.

Moral.—Cultivate the Polytechnic, and never strike a person who is bigger than yourself.

FABLE III.—THE FOX AND THE CROW.

A crow, perched on an arbutus cactiflora, held a Dutch cheese in his beak. To him enter a fox, unsuspecting as all foxes are wont to be. "Would you like a piece of cheese?" inquired the crow. "Thank you, not at present," replied the fox. "The fact is, I have been reading a very pretty pamphlet by a party called Banting, who doesn't think much of Dutch cheese. Besides, to tell you the truth, I haven't dined yet." "Well, don't go about saying that I never asked you," returned the crow, whose sensitive nature was rather wounded by rejection.

Moral.—There are some people in the world who prefer Stilton cheese to Dutch. To such people this fable is not addressed, because it would only be thrown away upon them. —Fun.

Fishing with the Electric Light.—The Courier de Bretagne, a paper published at l'Orient, gives an interesting account of an experiment made at Bell-Isle recently to fish at night by means of electric light. The light was produced by a powerful electro-magnetic machine constructed by M. Bazin, the well-known engineer. The experiment, which was conducted by M. Bazin on board a ship, in the presence of fifteen hundred persons assembled on the pier, was completely successful, and the quantity of fish taken was very large. A person who was present states that nothing can be more exciting than fishing at sea with the aid of this light. As soon as the sub-marine lantern was immersed, shoals of fish, of every description, came to sport in the illuminated circle, while the fishermen outside it spread their nets from their boats. The light illuminating the deep sea, the fish arriving in shoals, attracted by the fictitious sun, the boats at the edge of the lighted circle, the deep silence, interrupted only by the grating of the electro-magnetic machine, is described as an imposing sight. M. Bazin is shortly to proceed to Bona, in Algeria, to establish a coral fishery by the assistance of his electric light. He proposes in the meantime to descend full four hundred feet into the sea, and explore what he calls the "depths of the ocean" with his submarine instruments. The Minister of Marine has given orders for a ship of war to be placed at his disposal, and Admiral Choppart has appointed a commission, composed of engineers and naval officers, to attend M. Bazin's experiments officially.

FOREIGN MUSICAL ITEMS.

In Baden they seem to have had a concert whose programme has never been equalled by any other in a watering-place in Europe. Madame Viardot was the leading spirit of this concert, which consisted, among others, of the following pieces: "Overture on the "Belgian National Hymn," by Littolff; "The Flight to Egypt; "Les Preludes;" the "Conjuration of the Djinns," from the the Desert, by Ernest Reyer; Air from "Rinklan and Ludmilla," by Giuly, sung by Madame Viardot; "Zigeunerleben," by Schumann; "Hymn of the Rhine," by Ernest Reyer; Introduction of Tristan and Isolde, by Wagner; March from the Africaine; Quintette, Septett, and Duo from Les Troyens, by Berlioz, and Chorus from Moses, by Rossini. Is this enough music "of the futuro" for one concert?

Mdlle. Carlotta Patti has had such success in Boulogne that the Boulogne press are more than usually staccato in their laudations: "Quelle belle voix! quelle etendue! quelle méthode! quelle justesse! quelle douceur jusque dans les notes les plus élevées!" A French critic is powerless unless he is allowed the run of the interjectious, and in this case his notes of admiration are produced by admiration for Carlotta's notes.

Another composer, Sigor Farrio, has composed an opera Amleto (Hamlet) which is said to be extraordinarily good. It must be rather queer to hear "Hamlet" sing, "To be or not to be," in E flat.

While live composers aro thus busy, there is a movement on the tapis which is intended not to give rest to the bones of a dead composer, collections being instituted in order to remove Bellini's coffin to Catania. The coffin is now in Paris. Another eomposer and cotemporary of Bellini, Auber, has received a testimonial for his talent, which must havo honored him highly as well as touched him deeply. He has been the recipient of the order of Notre Dame de Guadaloupe.

The first new opera to be produced at Covent Garden after the Africaine is a composition by Mr. Henry Leslie. The name is not definitely fixed, but we believe Ida, or the Guardian Stork, is the title suggested.

The Royal Opera in Berliu has began the autumnal season with Oberon aud Freyschutz. L'Africaine is in preparation for the winter, and will be produced with great splendor and fidelity to the original representation in Paris.

Prof. Noiil, of Munich, has discovered an autograph of Beethoven, a compositiou for the piauoforte hitherto entirely unknown. It is entitled Pour Elisa, 27 avril, and is in the key of A miuor. This newly-discovered treasure will probably be published in the new complete edition of Beethoven's works, by Breitkopf and Haertel, Leipzig.

It is likely that the Scala in Milan will not open for the autumn season, in consequence of the repairs and new decorations not being completed seasonably. The director intends making use of the spare time in grand preparations for the production of the Africaine in the winter.

Mr. Albert, author of Cendrillon, and La Jolie Fille de Gand, and other pieces of great merit, has just died at Fontainebleau, at the age of seventy-nine. He is a good musician, an author and a painter, and was accomplished in all manly sports.

Cherubini's celebrated opera, Les Deux Journées has been produced in Vienna with great success. Herr Beck distinguished himself in the principal character. Mdlle. Ilma de Murska made her rentree at the Court Theatre in Mozart's Seraglio.

Out of the sum of one hundred and sixty pounds, which the concert given, in London, for the tenor Giuglini produced, that unfortunate singer will scarcely receive as much as eight pounds, in consequence of the opposition of a creditor.

Mr. W. Harrison, well known in New York as the tenor of the Pyne Opera Troupe, is lying seriously ill in London.

Adelina Patti made twenty thousand francs by her concert at Vichy last month. So much for having a voice.

AN INTERESTING LETTER.

Very few persons, even among physicians, would have been willing upon any terms to have been in the condition of the writer of the following letter on the 14th of February last. I will anticipate somewhat his report of the facts, by saying that on the 15th August, 1865, he made me a visit, "the very picture of health." Time, which tries and proves all things, has sufficiently tested this case, and shown that neither relapse or collapse having followed, the cure is perfect, and can be cited among the scores of similar cases, the result of my improved mode of treating disease without medicine.

G. M. BOURNE,
Water Cure Physician,
No. 10, Masonic Temple, Post street.

August 27, 1865.

Sacramento, April 30, 1865.

Dr. G. M. Bourne—Dear Sir: It is with pleasure and satisfaction that I now let you know of my good health. Looking back on what I have passed through, it seems as if I was lifted from the grave, and I think it my duty to acknowledge to you and the world the benefit I derived from water treatment as administered by you in your celebrated baths. It was in August, 1864, when disease developed itself with a severe cough. I then took medicines, getting worse, with chills, fevers, loss of strength, and was pronounced consumptive. This set me to thinking, and finally I determined to leave my business and go to the Sandwich Islands, having been informed that I could not be cured here. I went to San Francisco, and while waiting for a ship, called upon Dr. Bourne, who stated that a trip to the Sandwich Islands would probably result disastrously, was wholly unnecessary, as I could then be speedily cured at his establishment. I placed myself under his treatment, and in one week was so much improved that I thought I could risk returning home and to my duty as Engineer on the Central Pacific Railroad. The doctor objected; but I thought I knew better, and returned to my duty. In about two weeks my cough returned, and I kept getting worse, and, contrary to Dr. Bourne's injunction never to take medicine again, committed that folly, and soon was so completely run down that I could scarcely walk; so, as a last resort, I concluded once more to try the Water Cure. I went to San Francisco—few of my friends expected me to return; in fact, I thought my return doubtful. On arriving at Dr. Bourne's establishment (February 14, 1865,) I was not able to get into the bath without assistance, but in a few days I began to gain. I remained with him only six weeks, when I left, "a wiser and a better man," without the aid of medicine. I have now been at work several weeks, and find that I am gaining every day, and at present bid fair to be stouter than ever before. Persons visiting the Doctor's establishment will find it just what it should be, in both Ladies' and Gentlemen's Departments, and I cannot say too much in praise of the Doctor's kind attention to his patients.

This letter I write for the benefit of the afflicted, to be used as the Doctor decides, and should it be the means of directing any one to his care and treatment who (as they assuredly will) find relief, I will be paid for my trouble. Your obedient servant,

JAMES CAMPBELL,
Engineer Central Pacific Railroad.

San Francisco, August 25, 1865.

Advised by the undersigned, Mr. James Campbell, of the Central Pacific Railroad (who was then in a most deplorable state of ill health,) placed himself under the care of Dr. Bourne, the Water Cure Physician. Some six months or more afterward he visited this city, when I accidentally met him at Dr. Bourne's establishment, and, I am happy to say, restored to the enjoyment of good health and in fine spirits. JOHN SULLIVAN.

☞ Dr. Bourne treats all diseases of the throat, chest, and lungs—which includes diptheria, bronchitis, incipient consumption, pleurisy, croup, etc.—with the greatest success. Great relief is afforded in advanced stages of consumption. Rheumatism, paralysis, neuralgia, fever and ague, dropsy, etc., etc., are also cured quickly, pleasantly, and economically. No medicine whatever.

Visit Huskell's Mammoth Tea Store, and examine the splendid display of choicest Teas, Wines and Greceries, now selling at greatly reduced prices, at Wholesale and Retail.

Home Manufactures.—It is the duty of every Californian to give encouragement to the productions of our own State, and, all other things being equal, preference should be shown to our manufactures. Now, in the matter of cloth, things are at least equal, and when we examine the fine suits of fashionable clothing for sale at Quincy Hall, we incline to the idea that our productions have the advantage. This is the pioneer establishment in manufacturing clothing from California cloth, having commenced it in April last. Their work gives general satisfaction, and we are pleased to learn that their business in this line is steadily increasing. Our advice to our readers is, to call and examine for themselves at Nos. 545, 557 and 549 Washington street.—Call.

A Dainty Branch of Art.—A high reputation awaits Mrs. Read for the exquisite workmanship and general adaptability to their purpose of the Ladies' Skirt Supporters and Chest Expanders, of which she made such fine display at the late Fair. Her "Lady's Bust" is another aid to feminine beauty, which confers perfection on the wearer. Mrs. Read's establishment, 109 Montgomery street, is richly worth a visit.—San Francisco Sunday Mercury.

A TRUE STORY.

DEDICATED TO THE SICK.

There dwelt in Sacramento a pale, bilious mechanic,
His muscles were strengthless, his blood it was chill;
And the wife of his bosom believed, in her panic,
The husband she worshipped was hopelessly ill.
Seeking daily for help, in her wifely devotion,
All vainly she tried pill, powder and potion—
Till at last, when a prey to grief's wildest emotion,
Of HOSTETTER'S BITTERS she heard from a friend.

She purchased the cordial, half hoping, half fearing,
A prayer on her lip and a tear in her eye;
And taking his hand, with words kindly and cheering,
Besought him the tonic for her sake to try.
As he drank, a new life through his system seemed stealing,
Each following draft did its mission of healing,
Until, strong in health and most grateful in feeling,
He told the "true story" here twined into song.

It is also proper to state that the Bitters are sold exclusively in glass, and never, under any circumstances, by the gallon or barrel. Imposters and imitators are abroad, and the only safeguard the public have against them is to see that the Bitters they buy have the engraved label and note of hand of Messrs. Hostetter & Smith, and their proprietary stamp over the cork of the bottle.

The Connecticut Life Insurance Company organized in 1847, with a guaranteed capital of $50,000; Eliphalet A. Bulkley was its first President, and Guy R. Phelps, Secretary. This company has been successful from the first, and has grown to be, in the number of its policy-holders, the largest company in the world, and its business for the past year was greater than that of any other Life Insurance Company in the world. The whole number of policies issued is 43,386, of which 24,054 are now in force, covering an aggregate risk of over $60,000,000. It has paid in losses, on 1,729 lives, the sum of $3,952,762; and in dividends, $2,812,904. Its capital and assets, February 1st, were $7,918,896, nearly eight millions. During the year ending February 1st, 8,115 policies were issued, $482,387 were paid in losses, on 201 lives, and $313,767 in dividends; its receipts for premiums were $2,381,954, and for interest on investments $556,608, making total receipts for the year, $2,938,562, nearly three millions. During the past four years, its interest on investments has been more than sufficient to pay the losses. The present officers of the Connecticut Mutual Life are, James Goodwin, President; Guy R. Trimmings.—Mrs. Norcross, No. 5 Masonic Temple, Montgomery street, is prepared to fill orders for civic and military at the shortest notice; also, invites the ladies to call and examine trimmings for Opera Cloaks received per steamer from New York. Mrs. Norcross has a Show Case on exhibition at the Fair, containing goods which for elegance and taste are not surpassed by any other establishment on the Pacific coast.—San Francisco Leader, Sept. 16th.

Dr. C. W. Moore's Medical and Surgical Institute.—In speaking of this Institution, the Sunday Mercury says: "Aside from the most skilful treatment and nursing, the large, airy and elegantly-furnished rooms, will enable the patients to enjoy all the comforts and luxuries of a home. All in all, we regard Dr. Moore and his Institute a most valuable acquisition to the Pacific Coast—the need of which we have long since felt." See advertisement.

Many of the Diseases which hitherto baffled and defied the highest medical skill, are now speedily cured by Dr. H. A. Benton, whose processes of applying electricity receive the approbation of all prominent physicians. The nerves are directly reached, and patients suffering from chronic complaints find almost immediate relief, and rapidly recover their former healthy condition. Dr. Benton is a physician of excellent reputation, and as a Medical Electrician occupies the front rank in his profession.—Golden Era.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE Reduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

TO THE LADIES OF CALIFORNIA.

IT IS A FACT, which all should know, that

Washing may be Done for Half the Cost,

and in half the time, required by pursuing the method now in use. An enormous waste of time and materials attends the old and ordinary process. And this is not because a better method is not known, but because housewives persist in treading in the beaten track followed by their mothers and grandmothers before them, opposing every change, and refusing even TO MAKE A FAIR TRIAL of those new inveutions which scientific research has produced.

If the housekeepers of San Francisco and of the State will try the

simply by way of experiment, they will be amazed to find how much unnecessary labor may be saved by its use. It may be obtained at all the principal Groceries of the city, or in quantities of the Agents, HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN.

The use of the EXTRACT renders "rubbing," "pounding," "washboards," and all the severe drudgery of the usual method quite unnecessary. It thoroughly cleanses, without injuring the clothes. In short, it works such wonders as no one will credit without witnessing them. All that the inventor asks of any doubting housewife is

A SINGLE TRIAL.

The following certificate from the State Assayer, furnished after an analysis of the EXTRACT, speaks for itself:

A. ENQUOIS—Dear Sir: I have examined the sample of liquid handed me, and find it free from acid or any substance that would be injurious to clothing.

Very respectfully, B. B. THAYER.

RARE CHANCE
TO SECURE
DESIRABLE HOMESTEADS.

THE CALIFORNIA HOMESTEAD ASSOCIATION HAS been formed to enable its members, by paying a few dollars monthly, to obtain desirable Homesteads in the city of San Francisco. In order to secure a beautiful location, as well as cheap property, they have selected Block 540, bounded by Broderick, Pine, Baker and California streets, and Block 541, bounded by Broderick, California, Baker and Sacramento streets, all of the Western Addition. The property is within three blocks of the Central Railroad, and can be reached in a few minutes from the centre of the city. It is covered with fine trees and shrubbery, is sheltered from the winds, and is in every way most eligibly located for homestead purposes.

The lots are, nearly all, 27 1-2 feet front by 137 1-2 feet deep. The Capital Stock is divided into 69 shares, of $250 each. Shareholders will pay $10 per month on each share taken for the term of 25 months. When six monthly payments been made, the property will be divided among the members, and they will receive contracts for deede to the lots to which they will be entitled, that will enable them to take possession of the same, and erect buildings thereon. In no other way can Homestead Lots in this city be thus easily obtained, and for so small an outlay.

Parties who may wish to subscribe to the Capital Stock, can see a map of the property and obtain full particulars, by calling at the office of the Secretary, 305 Montgomery street, corner of Pine. The title to the property is perfect.

BY A COMMITTEE COMPOSED OF THE

BEST MECHANICAL TALENT OF THE STATE.

THE REPORT:

"FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE.—After a careful investigation of this NEW AND BEAUTIFUL MACHINE, viewing it as we do in a mechanical point of view, we consider that it ie in many respects worthy of much praise, particularly that portion of its mechanical arrangement hy which the REVERSIBLE motion is ohtained, which is simplicity itself, and in our opinion worthy of special consideration ; also, the

COMPLETE AND POSITIVE CONTROL OVER THE TENSION,

as exhihited in this Machine, along with the mechanical arrangement for taking up the slack of the thread, as was shown in sewing without any alteration, and without any stoppage of Machine,

FROM THE FINEST LACE TO FOUR THICKNESSES OF LEATHER.

"Your Committee, therefore, after a close and careful investigation, consider it ONE OF THE BEST AND MOST IMPORTANT IMPROVED MACHINES NOW IN USE.

"WE that have free souls, it touches us not."
HAMLET—Act III., Scene 2.

THERE is nothing new under the sun. Some of these fine days, the human race at present crawling on this globe will appreciate this fact. They will have the conceit taken out of them. They now fondly imagine that this earth was created for their especial accommodation, and that their ancestors came into possession of it when it was new. The fact of the matter is that it is a miserable second-hand affair, that has been occupied by dozens of sets of tenants, and has come into the possession of the race who at present live and move and have their being on its surface, in a shockingly dilapidated and shaky condition. It will never be let again, after it passes out of the possession of the present tenants; it may be broken up, and the building materials used for other worlds, but it is far more probable that it will turn into a comet. Who can tell how often the curious drama, now being enacted on this earth, has been rehearsed before? The very same actors who are at present engaged in it may have filled the parts which they now play, and have forgotten all about it. Most people have experienced a consciousness at times, when they are in a place where they know they have never been before during their present lifetime, and under circumstances which reason would lead them to believe are entirely new to them, that they are familiar with both the place and the events which are transpiring. Many writers have mentioned this; Dickens speaks of it in one of his works. Oliver Wendell Holmes, in his Autocrat of the Breakfast Table, suggests, as an explanation of it, that the brain being divided into two compartments, one set of organs may receive an impression slightly before it is conveyed to those in the other compartment. He says this may be so, but he does not believe it. It is just as likely that the pre-Adamite races of man were the very same individuals who now inhabit this earth—that John Smith, and Tom Jones, and William Brown, who now walk about, dressed in broadcloth, were pre-Adamite men—wore pre-Adamite plug-hats, and smoked pre-Adamite cigars; in fact, that they have ages ago rehearsed the lives they now live, in the most minute particulars. When breaking-up day came, and the earth was reduced to a state of chaos, of course the earth swallowed up all the traces of civilization in the shape of plug-hats, cigars, waterfalls, etc., which were in existence. Then, after the earth was patched up and set going again, the drama commenced, and in due course of time John Smith's, Tom Jones', and William Brown's souls, which had been carefully put aside for future use, were put into very much the same sort of bodies as they occupied during the pre-Adamite period, and walked about in just the same sort of clothes, wore the same succession of fashions in the way of hats, and smoked the same kind of cigars, as they had done during their pre-Adamite existence. It appears that some of the pre-Adamite cigars are coming to light, though, of course, they are, after the lapse of perhaps hundreds of thousands of years, in a perfectly unsmokable condition. A pre-Adamite cannon-ball, with which pre-Adamite Grants and Lees made war, has also turned up. We clip the following from the Nevada Transcript:

"The cave recently found in the Star Spangled Banner ledge appears to be a reservoir of curiosities. The astonishment of miners at the discovery of a cannon ball seventy-five feet below the surface, has given way to greater amazement at the discovery of a fossil cigar. The cigar is most perfect in shape, and the separate layers of which it is composed are so distinct, that they may be easily counted. Another curious formation was also found, which closely resembles a carrot, and which is pronounced by those who ought to know, the fossil remains of that vegetable. The question now is, 'Who smoked such cigars and ate such carrots?'"

Wonderful, isn't it? It would be utterly absurd to suppose that a race of men, who fired cannon balls from Anderson guns, smoked cigars—"our own manufacture, five for twenty-five cents"—and ate carrots, ever inhabited this earth before the race who now hold it had it turned over to them! We maintain that, possibly, this orb was reduced to a state of chaos by just the same means which are now being used to destroy it. It may have had a succession of had tenants, who did all they could to knock it to pieces, by running tunnels, sinking shafts, and other destructive operations. We inhabit a ruined world, and when it is shaken to pieces the next time, it is very doubtful whether the smash will not be so thorough that it will not be worth repairing. In that case, the inhabitants who have played their parts on this stage may, perhaps, be promoted to higher roles in another world, and no race will succeed the present, to sink tunnels into the renovated earth, and dig up our old cannon balls, and petrified cigars, and carrots, and with cool conceit ask, "Who smoked such cigars and ate such carrots?" having a firm conviction that, before they came upon this earth, it was never inhabited by men civilized enough to use cannon balls to murder one another, smoke cigars, and eat carrots. "Lord, what fools these mortals be!"

At the Democratic Ratification meeting held at Platt's Hall on Monday last, the most practical speech that was made, was that of Doctor Isaac Rowell, though we fear that he failed in making the point which he intended to. He said, according to the Alta's report, that he did not come there to make a Democratic speech. He then explained what he did come for:

"He wanted to contradict a falsehood circulated by the People's Party, that he had threatened to poison secessionists, Copperheads, and Democrats. He had never made any such threat. He never poisoned anybody, though he had had many Irish and Democratic patients since the time when such language was attributed to him. On the contrary, he had allowed many of them to get out of medicine and get well. [Applause.]"

Doctor Rowell was right in contradicting this falsehood, as its circulation has no doubt had a most injurious effect on his business. We do not believe that he ever said that he would poison secessionists, Copperheads, and Democrats, more than patients holding other political opinions, but, if our memory serves us right, he did say that he should like to "prescribe" for Copperheads. Dr. Rowell's defence is delightfully naive. "He never poisoned anybody; on the contrary, he had allowed many of them to get out of medicine and get well." No wonder that there was an outburst of applause when the kind-hearted doctor who has been so cruelly maligned, made that statement. "He had had many Irish and Democratic patients since the time when such language was attributed to him;" did he poison them? No, he resisted the temptation, strong as it must have been—"he allowed many of them to get out of medicine and get well." He does not tell the audience what became of those whom he did not allow to get out of medicine. Did they get well? No doubt it was painful for Dr. Rowell to be forced himself to publish his own good deeds to the world. Doctors are proverbially modest; many of their deeds are hid from the sight of men. How many of their works does N. Gray issue from his great medical publishing house on Sacramento street, neatly bound in boards without any author's name attached to them! We have not much confidence in advertising physicians as a rule, but when a doctor can, as Doctor Isaac Rowell did on Monday evening last, stand boldly forth in the presence of over a thousand people, and, with his hand on his heart say, "I never poisoned anybody," we must have confidence in that man. If we should be stricken down by sickness, we should choose Doctor Isaac Rowell for our physician, in the confident hope that he would in the same generous spirit which he has manifested towards his Irish and Democratic patients—many of them, we mean—allow us to "get out of medicine and get well."

THE London Standard of August 27th, devotes nearly a column to a review of Scenes of Wonder and Curiosity in California; with 100 Engravings. By James M. Hutchings. The Standard considers this work a very good Guide Book to the mammoth trees of Calaveras. It says:

"While Mr. Hutchings confines himself to simple guide-book descriptions of trees, mountains, waterfalls, and hotels, he gets on pretty fairly; but as soon as he attempts a single flight of a higher pretension, he at once becomes American in phraseology, or gives way to a kind of meagre facetiousness, which is of all things most wearisome to the reader."

A "funny" paragraph about mosquitoes on the San Joaquin river that we know Hutchings thought a magnificent effort of genius, is quoted as a specimen of "his highest style," and the Standard then adds:

"Taking this as an example of the highest style Mr. Hutchings attains, our readers must judge for themselves as to what his lower flights must be like, which make up three-fourths of the whole book."

Californians have read most of the matter contained in this work, now, for the first time, published in England, in Hutchings Magazine. The Standard, we imagine, labors under the idea that it is an original work published by Chapman & Hall, instead of being a reprint of articles which appeared in the first place in a Californian magazine.

BIELA'S comet, which, in the course of a few months, will become visible to the naked eye, is one in which the inhabitants of this earth are especially interested, as on one occasion it was very nearly getting in our way. In 1832, had the earth been only one month in advance of its actual position, it would have passed through the comet—"a singular rencontre," says Sir John Herschel, "perhaps not unattended with danger." As Stephenson said of the cow on the railroad track, in the event of a train running against her, "it would be mighty bad for the cow;" so our earth's bolting through a comet might be mighty bad for the comet, or, on the other hand, it might make it unpleasantly warm for us who live upon the earth. Mr. Biela first observed this comet in 1826; it returns to us about once in every six years and three-quarters. In 1846, it was guilty of an eccentricity, which puzzled astronomers greatly: it deliberately laid an egg, in the shape of a small comet. The young comet travelled along peaceably by the side of the old comet for some time, growing brighter every day, and in a few weeks eclipsed the old original in brilliancy; after a while, however, it appeared to grow sickly, and then it threw out a band of light towards the comet which gave it birth, and the two travelled on like the Siamese twins. Immediately upon the old original comet picking up the string which its infant threw to it, it threw out rays which made it appear like a comet with three tails; perhaps this was to help along any struggling young comets who might want assistance. The two then travelled out of sight. Seven years after they appeared again, presenting the same relative position to each other. The earth was, therefore, on one occasion, admitted into the secrets of comet-manufacturing.

THE Bulletin, convinced that it has received a sanitary commission from Providence, devotes a column to the subject of "Cholera and its domestic preventive." It is sweeping in its condemnation of offal, and positively revels in "a magnificent drain" on Folsom street. It is severe on dead dogs and cats in the street, and urges respect for the dead. The article as a whole, is capital; we are grieved to discover flaws in so admirably constructed a column; but really the Bulletin should not tell the public to avoid "tessclating the public highway with vegetable offal or defunct feline or canine life." "Defunct feline or canine life" cannot tesselate a highway. "Defunct life" is not a proper phrase to apply to dead bodies. The writer of this very sensible but not very elegantly written article is, we should imagine, a lady. The concluding sentence is so like a woman: "Eat proper food and take care of the slops, and you need not fear the cholera."

A CORRESPONDENT of the Dublin Freeman says that William H. Seward is the real leader of the Fenian movement, and that the object of the Fenians is not to free Ireland, but to take possession of Canada. Under these circumstances, the whole affair can be arranged by diplomacy. Seward need only write a letter to Lord Russell, telling him that he and a few Fenian friends would like to have Canada: and Lord Russell will immediately answer that, rather than have any unpleasantness about the matter, he is quite willing that he should take Canada, and, if British Columbia is any use to him, he is heartily welcome to that also. The only danger to be dreaded is this: Canada would, in the event of England consenting to give her away, immediately declare war against the mother country, and Lord Russell would be frightened into reclaiming his present to Seward & Co.

THE following advertisement appears in the Call:

FLEW AWAY—From Maguire's Opera House, on Wednesday evening, a GREEN PARROT. The finder will be liberally rewarded by returning it as above.

We sincerely trust that our republication of this advertisement will not lead to the restoration of this green parrot to the company at Maguire's Opera House. If there are green parrots attached to that or any other company, let them have free wing—their loss will not grieve the public. Green parrots are not desirable on the stage. We have had a good many female parrots on the San Francisco stage who have been taught to speak, but they still remained parrots and still continued green. Such as these do well to fly away as soon as they can find mates, and no liberal reward should be offered to induce them to return.

A. D. RICHARDSON, who visited Victoria, V. I., in company with the Hon. Schuyler Colfax, and wrote letters to the New York Tribune from thence, is a model correspondent. His letters are remarkably free from verbiage. Here is a model of conciseness:

"Visiting Her Majesty's flagship, the Sutlej, she fired a salute of fifteen guns and ran up the star-spangled banner, while her band played it."

There is true economy of words. A. D. Richardson would talk of a boy "drawing from a well the old oaken bucket, singing it at the same time," rather than be guilty of tautology.

THE RETURNED WANDERER.

ANOTHER LEAF FROM THE BOOK OF REAL LIFE.

WALKING along Oxford street, one afternoon, I met my friend S. R. He remarked that if I were going his way, he would tell me a very pleasing and affecting story which Robert F. had related to him.

"I and a companion," said Robert, "were seated in one of those comfortable old conveyances—the long coach which had not yet given way to the rail-car—and rubbed the frostiness off the window glasses. We were going some forty miles or so into the west country. My companion—for it is with him my tale has to do—was a hale, hearty old man between seventy and eighty—so his family Bible said—but he was a boy. Age had crumpled his cheek into a complete cobweb of wrinkles, but had left the rosy color of youth almost as bright as ever. Time seemed to have pegged at the tough old man until he found it to be labor in vain, and then given him up in despair to take his own time about the journey. The truth was, he could not touch his heart; and when that is young, man is never old. He was an independent man in the village where he was born, to which locality we were bound; the same roof sheltered his gray hairs that had sheltered him when sleeping in his cradle; he, watching for the London coaches, bent over the same gate that he had climbed up for that purpose as a child. His life, with few exceptions, had been one of calm and sunshine, undisturbed, in his cottage, with the turmoil and vanity of the great world.

"I used to call him uncle, from a distant relationship by marriage—I did not care how distant. There is always a pleasure and a pride in deluding one's-self into a relationship with the good. He, at the utmost stretch of his jocosity, called me 'My Lord,' as I and the Lord of the Manor were the only two seen about in black clothes, except, indeed, the gentleman who came over for an hour and a half on Sunday mornings to preach from some distant village. He being only an infrequent visitor, his coat was very little seen. My uncle, in the kindness of his heart, excused him. 'Poor fellow' said he, 'he has two more churches to attend to.'

"We had progressed some miles on our journey, and found the cold getting more severe at every mile; consequently at the first stoppage to change horses, we alighted to knock some life and feeling into our feet. At the door of the little inn, a small covered cart drew on one side to give room for our coach. After ordering something warm, we popped into the kitchen, invited by the roaring fire which illumined the whole place. There, around the blaze, sat some poor, shuddering wretches who, we understood, were being passed to their parishes in the little cart we had seen at our entrance. One more particularly interested us from her extreme old age, which, from appearance, must have been upwards of seventy. The cold seemed to have made her quite insensible; her almost equally frozen companions were attempting by every attention to bring back some life into the poor old creature. 'She's blind, too, poor old soul,' said one rough-looking fellow who was rubbing her bony hand between his palm, as he saw our pitying looks. 'She'll never live the way down I'm sure, it's come on so bitter, and that tilt draws the cold through us dreadful.' 'Where is she going to, poor soul?' said my pitying uncle, as he drew the back of his hand across his eyes. 'Thirty miles on, sir,' answered the man, 'the village of ——.' My uncle turned his eyes towards me—the very village, his own. 'I do not know her face,' said he. 'I believe, sir, she's been a long time away in foreign parts, or somewhere, I don't know rightly,' continued the man. 'Poor thing! poor thing!' muttered the kind old man. 'She must not go on, it would be worse than murder.' 'Landlady,' said he to the kind-hearted woman who had brought in a cup of hot tea for the poor creature, 'Black Will's coach comes through here in an hour; she must go with him, I'll pay—put her inside—he'll set her down—he's a kind-hearted fellow—do what you can for her; there's a good soul.' As he said all this in a hurried tone, he kept gazing upon the deathlike features of the poor old woman, and passing from one poor shivering object to another his hot glass of brandy and water, he drew out his purse and put some money into the hands of the landlady: 'Give her what you can to do her good,' continued he, 'and I'll see her after to-morrow—I live where she is going to—wrap her up you know, and ——.'

"'Ready, sir,' said the coachman, 'the other insides are in.' We howled away; for a few minutes we did not speak a word. At last the kind old man began to rub his hands and exclaim, 'Well, getting out for so short a time as that, circulates one's blood. I feel all of a glow, as warm as a toast.' No doubt of it; but not a drop of the brandy and water had passed his lips.

'Money,' said my uncle, placing the pegs leisurely and thoughtfully in the cribbage-board, as we sat toasting our shins before the sparkling logs on his hearth after our cosy supper on the self-same bitter night, 'Money, my dear boy, is given to us as almoners. Woe betide us if we break our trust. The reward for charity is unquestionable, is immediate. Witness the glow that pervades the heart when you give to those who are in sorrow and distress. On the contrary, we see the continual misery of the foolish ones who close their hands and their hearts against the call of the needy, scraping a mountain of wealth that they may die worth so much money, but not one blessing. They drag the worthless weight with them to the verge of the unfathomable future, and it sinks them 'Deeper and deeper still!' If I ever feel indisposed or out of humor as the world calls it, (and we are all subject to megrims) I go among my fellows and give my mite where I know it is a blessing and rightly bestowed, which is very easy to find out in such a small community as this is; you would be astonished what excellent physic I find it.' 'Mind, my dear boy' continued he, 'I don't preach, nor wish to give you lessons, for you have forgotten more than I, in my simple way, ever knew; but these thoughts after our painful scene of to-night will find utterance; so take up your cards and let me see whether you play better than you used to do.' I did as he directed me, but as had been the case on all my former visits, I was most woefully beaten. I never was a card-player. My brain was galloping and careering away upon a thousand subjects called up by the last few hours' incidents. At last he threw down the cards with a laugh, vowing that it was no honor to beat me. I bore it like a martyr, and took my candlestick to retire to bed. We parted on the landing. I shook him heartily by the hand and wished him pleasant dreams; who doubts that he had them?

"Such a bed! sweet as a bed of flowers, instead of feathers. No more humps in it than the waves of the sea, like which it received me as I plunged into it. That dear old patch-work counterpane, quilted to a miracle of warmth, was to me always like a memorandum book of generations—little square bits of long departed pride, sniffed from the Sunday-going gowns of aunts and grandmothers, all passed-away patterns of women. Could it have found tongue to prate of its possessors, what a strange history it would have been!

"Tick, tick, tick! went the powerful old clock on the landing. It was an unusual sound to my metropolitan ears, and I began counting its vibrations. I positively felt as if I were swinging with its indefatigable pendulum. When I had almost got at full swing, much to my annoyance, the light of my candle, which I had placed on a well-polished old coffer, or clothes-chest, sent one of its little expiring rays upon the frame of a picture that hung opposite to my bed. I knew the picture well: it was a very poor drawing of a young female head, with high dressed hair, and a little Gipsy bonnet with flaunting ribbons. In fact, in the style of the last century; so outre in our eyes at the present day as we, no doubt, shall be to the eyes of a future day. That picture was the skeleton of my uncle's peaceful house. Those blue eyes and rosy cheeks had made him a bachelor, but not a cynic. It was no secret; everybody in the village knew of uncle's being 'crossed in love,' so I will tell you:

"More than half a century before, the gray-headed old man who slept in the next chamber was the young athletic hero of the village green. From his independence, a sort of squire, and the world all promise before him, to love was part of his nature. The original of that little picture was the object. She an was orphan, though well provided for; brought up by an old aunt, and had never quitted the village of her birth. She was spoiled and petted by everybody, who, of course, called her the village belle. Young and handsome, and rich for his position, he soon became the favored swain, to the dismay of many who had dared to hope. But who could rival him? None. The old people chuckled, and said it was just as it should be: both rich, both handsome, and both such kindly hearts—what a merry wedding it would be! And so it would have been; but fate decreed it otherwise. Months rolled on, and she leant on his arm at church and market, and the old people blessed them as they passed on their way. It was all sunshine. The feast, or annual fair, came round, and with it a host of visitors from far or near. The rich farmer and the poor cottager kept open house: all was innocent merriment and enjoyment. My uncle and his almost bride—Annie Leslie—danced with the best, and better than anybody else; so said the village gossips. Among the visitors was a gay, dashing young buck, from London, upon a visit to some farmer relation, who had driven him over to see the frolics. The cut of his boots and the tie of his cravat almost set the village beaux mad. He was young, gay, and agreeable; his eye soon fixed upon the village belle—Annie. He sought her for his partner, and danced his best. My uncle looked on without the slightest spice of jealousy, only pleased to see her acquit herself so charmingly with the London gentleman—he felt proud of her.

"The feast was past some days, when an alarming fever attacked the young lover, who begged that Annie in her anxiety might not be allowed to come near him. He was obeyed; and, much against her will and entreaties, she was not permitted to approach his bedside. To the dismay of the village, it was soon discovered to be that then most dreadful scourge—the small-pox. Many fled from the village; Annie, among the number, was forced away by her terror-stricken guardian. Dreary and painful weeks passed over, and his life was spared; but his features were much altered, though not disfigured. He hardly knew himself, as he gazed for the first time in the glass upon his changed features. He would not see his betrothed until, by change of air, he had removed all fear of contagion, so that three months elapsed from the least week before he stood in the road of the village, looking out for Annie's return.

"She came—she welcomed him with tears; but there was a strange chill in her manner, that penetrated to his heart. Too soon the busy tongue of rumor whispered the fatal truth: the London spark, who was staying close to the vicinity of her friends, to whom she had gone upon her lover's illness, had been constantly seeking her society and her regards. The noble and upright heart of my uncle shuddered. He sought her, and found that the gay manners and engaging air of the more polished lover had estranged her affections. Like a martyr, he sacrificed himself for her happiness, or what she considered as such; he bade her go free; he felt that she turned from his altered features with little less than disgust, and it was only his former self that she had supposed she loved.

"She left the village, as everybody knew, to be married to another; no blessing followed her; for all knew too well that she had spurned a true and affectionate heart. He never loved woman again. His yearning heart still sought to know her fate, and after years were often saddened by the knowledge that she had placed her fortunes in a rotten vessel, and that she was unhappy in her choice. More than fifty years had passed away, but he had not forgotten her.

"The pecking of the social robin at my casement awoke me early the next morning, soon seconded by the cheerful voice of the old man, exclaiming: 'Come, come, my lord; none of your London ways—up and be stirring. The toasted cake and eggs are crying, Come eat me! You must be quick in your movements, for I intend you to be my assistant this morning. It is my turn, I find, to see the coals given to the poor to-day at the Crown Stables. Come; here's your hot water, and your boots.' With that he popped them into the room, and bustled away, humming with a merry chirping tone some old-fashioned ditty, of which he had stores—about

'Tis sweet in the morn,
When sounds the horn,
And bucks a hunting go,
For all my fancy
Dwells with my Nancy,
For she can cry, Tallyho, ho, ho!'

"We breakfasted like princes, and then bustled across the road to the Crown Stables, where we found men, women, and children assembled with wheel-barrows, baskets, bags, in fact anything that would hold anything, waiting for the charitable gift of coals, provided for them by the richer classes, so that they might not suffer during the inclement season. 'Half a loaf and a whole fire is better than a whole loaf and no fire,' said my uncle.

"He had a thousand kind greetings from them all. I could not help smiling, as I wrote down their names and families, at the severe look with which he whispered me that, 'we must be very particular and not give an ounce more than the rules allow.' God bless the old man; he was continually popping some round coal slyly into somebody's basket, over and above the allowance, and the little muffled-up urchins were clustering around him in the most perplexing manner, interfering sadly with his dignity. Children are the best judges in this world. They believed in him; and well they might: he felt with them. Opposite to his cottage, there was a roughly fenced-in slip of an orchard, which had been a continual annoyance to him. Boys will rob orchards. Apples, it is well known, are gifted with a tremendous power of seduction. There is a positive wickedness about that tree. It throws its arms over its boundary wall, or fence, right in the faces of passers-by, waving a lot of golden temptation to their parched mouths, quite irresistible. That orchard was not to be borne; it was the cause of more family squabbles, juvenile thrashings, and heart-burnings, than all the rest of properly walled-in, respectable orchards in the kingdom. The surly proprietor, however, wanted a small angle of ground belonging to my uncle, to enlarge his stable. For once my uncle finessed: nothing but that straggling bit of cankered orchard would he take in exchange, and he got it. Happy day for the children, for he took down the board of penalties nearly obliterated by revengeful throws from juvenile depredators, and with much humor replaced it with one of more amiable temper. On it was written: 'Don't steal; ask over the way.' From that day, puddings had more apples in them. That orchard became a valuable mentor to infants, for my uncle took care that all deserving children should look forward to it as a positive reward of good behavior in all instances, and a Garden of Eden, from which all delinquents were excluded; it was only known as the 'children's orchard.'

"We had just finished off our last claimant, when a boy came up to my uncle, saying that 'Master Dover, the clerk of the parish, wished to speak with him,' who, being very old, had sent a fleeter messenger; 'and that he was now waiting at my uncle's door.' We soon reached the snow-covered porch, where stood the old man who was parish clerk, beadle, wheelwright—in fact, a factotum. He was an old and respected friend of my uncle's. As we approached, I saw that the old man wore a puzzled look and fidgety manner. He shook hands cordially with us, and entered the house.

"'Well, Master Dover, what's the world's wonder that has brought you down so early this morning?' exclaimed my uncle, placing a chair for his visitor, and opening his little three-cornered cupboard, where he kept his unrivalled home-made wines, and producing a bottle and glasses. 'Why, my dear sir, I be rather puzzled; but they made me come about that poor creature you were so kind to last night, as old Black Will brought down. He wouldn't leave her anywhere, except at his cousin's, down at The Plough, where, of course, she's been well looked after. But we want to know what to do, as we look up to you, you know, and—' Here the old man rubbed his hair down on his forehead, and turned his eyes with an embarrassed look towards me, as if claiming my assistance in some way. I felt a little puzzled at his manner. 'Poor soul, poor soul!' replied my uncle, as he poured out the wine; 'we must see about her, and find out who she is, and her right of settlement, and all that. But I'll pop down myself, and talk to them at The Plough.' 'The owner has been down and—and he thought, as I was one of your oldest friends, I had better come down and talk a bit about it,' continued the old man, twitching and shuffliug about in his seat in a most extraordinary manner. 'Oh! right, very right. Here is your health, and as many more years as you wish yourself,' said my uncle, as he finished his glass, and looked upon his old cotemporary with a benevolent smile. As my uncle turned to the cupboard to look for a piece of cake, the old clerk motioned to me with a piteous look, holding up his hands aud shaking his head towards my uncle, who, placing the looked-for cake upon the table, took his seat, and said: 'Pray, Master Dover, who is the poor blind soul?' 'Ah! master—that be it. I ain't got courage to out with it; my heart gets in my throat. I wish they'd sent any soul else but me; but, dang it, I be an old fool.' Here he wiped with the sleeve of his coat the positive perspiration from his brow, cold as the day was. 'Dang the thing—it must out, my dear old friend. That poor soul that you saved last night from death—after fifty years' absence—is—your Annie Leslie!'

"I started towards my uncle, for I thought he would have fallen from his chair. A sudden paleness overspread his face, and his hands turned death-like, as he clasped them convulsively before him. His old play-fellow and friend looked upon him in his violent shock with the tears coursing each other down his rugged cheeks.

"'To think,' said old master Dover, 'that she, sirs, whom I remember young, happy and well-to-do, should have come to this! It's now gone fifty years and more since my dame went to school with her—she's down along with her now, sir. A bad husband she got when she chose to have that raky ne'er-do-well. Ah, poor dear soul: after fifty years, to come back to her parish a pauper!—blind, too!'

"'Dover! Dover!' said my uncle, in a hurried and hysterical manner, rising suddenly with an effort from his chair. 'No, no, no, Annie Leslie—for to me she will always be Annie Leslie—has not returned to the parish a pauper! No, no, no—poor Annie has not come to the parish! Annie Leslie has returned to me.'

"We were soon hurrying along the pretty lane, leading to the church, where dwelt many of my uncle's tenants. Here an old couple were quickly arranged with to receive the stricken wanderer, and to afford her every comfort. Master Dover was working like a horse, although surrounded by willing hands, between my uncle's house and the asylum for poor Annie, all the day, carrying everything for her comfort that could be thought of. Late in the day she was installed in her new habitation under my superintendence—for my uncle was so overpowered by his feelings he dared not venture within sight of the place after the first burst of his impulsive nature.

"What must have been the feelings of that poor afflicted creature when she found that the rejected of her youth was the shield and comforter of her age!

"The sweet bells pealed out from the modest spire of the village church, and the sun shone bright upon the next morning, which was Sunday. My uncle took my arm to proceed to church, but not by his accustomed path—he took his course up the village—for the old route lay past the door of the cottage where Annie Leslie was sheltered. 'My dear boy,' said he to me, 'the imperfect light of last night and my failing sight have left no impression of the appearance, thank God! of Annie Leslie. I am too old now to tear from my imagination the picture that it has long held—I wish, for the few remaining years of my life, that it should not be destroyed by the sad reality. Therefore I never shall pass that way to church again. She is cast from a sea of trouble at my feet, and I am spared to save her! what more could I ask? The rejoicing that is in my heart is indefinable.'.

"His friends, as they stood clustered around the church porch to greet him, uttered not a word of the returned one, but every hand was held out for a grasp—no one would be denied. That morning few eyes young or old could be turned from that venerable old man; thoughts of him mingled with every prayer. His heart was at peace, for the poor sightless wanderer—the loved of his youth—was forgiven."

"That is a melancholy and affecting tale," I said to my friend Robert. "I see you are in mourning attire. Is your kind-hearted uncle dead?" "No," he said, "he still lives, but Annie Leslie is dead, and at his advanced age I do not think it will be long before he follows her. It is now about four years since poor Annie's return, and latterly she had become very decrepid with palsy; yet all the sweet disposition for which she was noted in her youth seemed to have returned to her. My uncle's friend the surgeon of the parish had, by his request, attended her, and he intimated to my uncle she could not live long; she seemed to be entirely exhausted; and so it proved, for in about a fortnight after that time, Master Dover the faithful old clerk, came up to the house one morning in a great hurry, saying he thought Annie Leslie was dying; so my kind uncle donned his coat and went with Dover to the cottage. On entering, the good woman who had charge of the poor creature, came up to him and told him she had just breathed her last. My uncle would go into the room where poor Annie was lying, and he saw her with a bright, bright flush on her cheeks, reminding him of her early youth; and, although her eyes were closed, there was to him a perfect remembrance of his early love brought full before him in the prostrate form presented to his sight: for a minute or so he stood motionless, with his hands clasped before him; when, with the words 'God bless her,' he turned to the woman of the house who had followed him into the room, and bade her take care that every thing proper should be done, and left the place.

"This occurred on Tuesday, and the funeral was to take place on Saturday following. On Wednesday morning Robert received a letter from his old friend, telling him of the death, and begging him to come and visit him for a week or so, (for he felt lonely just now,) and attend with him to the funeral. This Robert had kindly done, and had just returned from his visit when I met him. I asked how he had left his old friend. He said he was in fair health aud spirits, for he (Robert) had exerted himself a little extra to put him in good heart and drive away a tendency to melancholy which he had observed on his first arrival, and it had a good effect upon him. 'I observed,' said Robert, 'the delicate feeling of the villagers, male and female, when they met the old man in his walks. They pressed his hands in silent gratulations, but not a word was spoken referring to the past.'

"The evening was now closing in upon us," said S. R., in concluding the recital, "so I shook hands with our friend Robert, thanking him for his interesting narrative, and promising to see him again and enquire about his aged relative, for whom he had created in me a feeling of regard." F. H.

An Arabian Laughing Plant.—For the first time I met with a narcotic plant very common further south, and gifted with curious qualities. Its seeds, in which the deleterious prineiple seems chiefly to reside, when pounded and administered in a small dose, produce effects much like those ascribed to Sir Humphrey Davy's laughing gas; the patient dances, sings, and performs a thousand extravagances, till, after an hour of great excitement to himself and amusement to the bystanders, he falls asleep, and on wakening has lost all memory of what he did or said while under the influence of the drug. To put a pinch of this powder into the coffee of some unsuspecting individual is a not uncommon joke, nor did I hear that it was ever followed by serious consequences, though an over quantity might perhaps be dangerous. I myself tried it on two individuals, but in proportions, if not absolutely homœopathic still sufficiently minute to keep on the safe side of risk, and witnessed its operation, laughable enough, but very harmless. The plant that bears these berries hardly attains in Kascem the height of six inches above the ground, but in Oman I have seen bushes of it three or four feet in growth, and wide-spreading. The stems are woody, and of a yellow tinge when barked; the leaf of a dark-green color and pinnated with about twenty leaflets on either side; the stalks smooth and shining; the flowers are yellow and grow in tufts, the anthers numerous; the fruit is a capsule, stuffed with a greenish padding, in which lie embedded two or three black seeds, in size and shape much like French beans; their taste sweetish, but with a peculiar opiate flavor; the smell heavy, and almost sickly.—Palgrave.

A Question in Pastry.—A sub-committee of a school-board was examining a class in a primary school. One of the committee, to sharpen up their wits, propounded the following question: "If I had a mince-pie, and should give two-twelfths to Harry, and two-twelfths to John, two-twelfths to Isaac, and should keep half the pie myself, what would there be left?" There was a profound study among the scholars, but finally one lad held up his hand as a signal that he was ready to answer. "Well, sir, what would there be left? Speak up, loud, so that all can hear!" said the committee-man. "The plate!" shouted the hopeful fellow. The committee-man turned red in the face, while the other members roared aloud. The boy was excused from answering any more questions.

A fracas occurred at a dance house in San Antonio, Alameda county, lately, between a Frenchman named Cora, of San Pablo, and Samuel S. Kennedy, of San Antonio. In the fight Kennedy was very much hurt; he died from the effect of his injuries.

"OIL-SMELLERS."

A NEW professsion of men, claiming to be gifted with extraordinary powers, has arisen in Petrolia, namely, "oil-smellers" or "diviners." Let not the pious reader start with alarm, lest the practice of divination, (whatever it may have been,) condemned so repeatedly in the Mosaic code, has been revived in Western Pennsylvania and Virginia. No devil, demon, ghost, ghoul, fairy, goblin, or table-tapping spirit is known or believed to be at work, albeit the use of a twig of witch-hazel or peach might readily enough suggest to some the calling up of spirits from their vasty deep by modern enchanters. The mode of operating is substantially as follows: The diviner cuts, from one of the trees mentioned, a bifurcated bough or twig, reducing the stem and the forks to about a foot in length, for conveuience sake. In each hand he grasps, firmly, one end of the fork, letting the stem point upward and a little inward. The hands should be held with their backs downward. With this simple apparatus off goes the "smeller;" and, on arriving above an oil-vein, it is claimed that the twig will turn round in his hands, in spite of his utmost exertions, until the stem points directly downward. It may be grasped so tightly that the rind will peel off by the operatiou; yet this will not prevent the revolution in his hands. The author once witnessed this operation going on in the hands of a gentleman of much intelligence and the utmost veracity, who was not a believer in the oil-smeller's claims or pretensions, yet had to acknowledge the existence of the phenomenon for which he could not account. It appears that the twig has not this remarkable power in the hauds of all persons; for the author was unable to perceive any change or tendency in the wand in his own hand, on arriving at the same spot. Whether the difference were owing to magnetic influence or other cause, is unknown; as, also, whether the motion betokens the presence of water, petroleum, both, or neither. In England, it is said, the witch-hazel has long been used, in this manner, for the discovery of coal; in some parts of the Eastern States, people try it to alight upon water-veins. In the oil-regions, some of the most productive wells have been located by oil-smellers; in more cases, however, their vaticinations of first-clast works turn out mere moonshine. However, the diviners have become a power in Petrolia, among a people as keenly inquisitive and practical as are to be found, who reason in this way: "If there be anything in oil-smelling, we may as well avail ourselves of it as not; for the diviner charges only from twenty-five to one hundred dollars for his services in examining a tract; and this is an inconsiderable item in the general expense, seeing we mean to bore anyhow." There is a pretty general impression that he is a better guide negatively than positively; that, while oil may be struck just where he directs, it is useless to sink where he has pronounced none to exist. In a word, the charmer, magnetizer, or natural magician has more real power among the operators than the latter are willing to openly concede.

More Irish Grievances.—The musical pretensions of the Irish are curious. Everybody now knows that the celebrated Zucchelli was in reality a native Celt of the name of Joe Kelly, and a writer in the Irishman, who signs himself "D. H.," points out several other flagrant depredations committed by foreign artists on the national repertoire. Mozart, for instance, "was constantly dragging scraps of Irish melody into his works, and, strange to say, the most effective passage in one of his famous glorias consists of three bars of the "Cruiskeen Lawn." The "Eh bien, sois libre," of Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine is simply "The Minstrel Boy." "Versez," the celebrated bacchanalian song in Le Prophéte, "is nothing but the old Irish quick march of "Paddy Carey.'" "The Last Rose of Summer" is the buckbone of Flotow's Martha. Even the Cockney nigger melodists make a practice of picking up beautiful Irish airs in the romantic rookeries of London, aud adapting them to beastly English words. The exquisite tune of "Love's Young Dream" is thus daily defaced by banjo-strumming blackguards with sooty faces—and Saxon blood in their veins. The only thing to be said against this is, that most of the famous Irish melodies are English.—Pall Mall Gazette.

A Good Example.—The London Reader tells us that "the Daily News, which is more notable for its high standing than remarkable for its ostentation, has recently set a very good example to its wealthy and boastful contemporaries. The past year proving a very prosperous one, the proprietors of the Daily News have distributed a large share of their increased profits among the members of their staff." Upon which, Willis' Home Journal remarks: "We are glad to record a fact so honorable to the proprietors of a newspaper. We sincerely trust that, in place of being the rare exception, it will hereafter become the usual practice for the proprietors of successful newspapers and literary publications to give the reapers good reason to rejoice whenever the annual harvest has been unusually bountiful."

Major Clifford Thompson, formerly a compositor in the Sacramento Union office, has been made Judge Advocate of the Department of Kentucky. He was a member of the staff of General Pleasanton while the latter was on duty at St. Louis.

THE ROSE.

"Rose! thou art the sweetest flower,
That ever drank the amber shower;
Rose! thou art the fondest child
Of dimpled Spring, the wood-nymph wild!"
[Moore's Anacreon.

THE rose is mentioned by the earliest writers of antiquity as an object of culture. Herodotus speaks of the double rose, and Solomon of the rose of Sharon and of the plantations of roses at Jericho. Theophrastus tells us that the hundred-leaved rose grew in his time on Mount Pangœus, and it appears that the Isle of Rhodes (Isle of Roses,) received its name from the culture of roses carried on there. Roses were more highly prized by the Romans than any other flowers, and they had even attained to the luxury of forcing them. Under the reign of Domitian, the Egyptians thought of offering to that Emperor's court as a magnificent present, roses in the middle of winter, but this the Romans smiled at, so abundant were roses in Rome at that season. In every street, says Martial, the odor of spring is breathed, and garlands of flowers freshly gathered are displayed. "Send us corn, Egyptians! and we will send you roses," says Martial. Roses were employed both by the Grecks and Romans to decorate their tombs. Of the history of the rose from the time of the Romans till the time of Tournefort, when botany became a science, very little is known, but there can be no doubt that in the dark ages they were held in esteem by all who could procure them. When Saladin took Jerusalem in 1128, he would not enter the mosque of the Temple—then converted into a church by the Christians—till the walls had been thoroughly washed and purified with rose-water. Voltaire says that, after the taking of Constantinople by Mahomet II. in 1453, the church of St. Sophia was washed with rose-water in a similar manner before it was converted into a mosque.

We read in the History of the Mogul Empire, by Father Catron, that the celebrated Princess Nourmahal filled an entire canal with rose-water, upon which she was in the habit of sailing along with the Great Mogul. The heat of the sun disengaged the essential oil from the rose water. This was observed floating upon the surface of the water; and thus was made the discovery of the essence, otto, or ottar of roses. Formerly, it was the custom to carry large vessels filled with rose-water to baptisms. Bayle relates, upon this subject, that at the birth of Ronsard, his nurse, on the way to church, let him fall upon a heap of flowers, and that at this instant the woman who held the vessel of rose-water poured it upon the infant. Roses were often, in the days of chivalry, worn by cavaliers at tournaments, as an emblem of their devotion to love and beauty. The Rose has been a favorite subject with the poets of all countries, in all ages. It was dedicated by the Greeks to Aurora, as an emblem of youth, from its freshness and revivifying fragrance; to Venus, as an emblem of love and beauty, from the elegance of its flowers; and to Cupid, as an emblem of fugacity and danger, from the fleeting nature of its charms and the wounds inflicted by its thorns. It was given by Cupid to Harpocrates, the God of Silence, as a bribe to prevent him from betraying the amours of Venus, and was hence adopted as the emblem of silence.

The rose was for this reason frequently sculptured on the ceilings of drinking and feasting rooms, as a warning to the guests, that what was said in moments of conviviality should not be repeated, from which, what was intended to be kept secret was said to be told "under the rose." The Greek poets say that the rose was originally white, but that it was changed to red, according to some, from the blood of Venus, who lacerated her feet with its thorns when rushing to the aid of Adonis; and, according to others, from the blood of Adonis himself.

The fragrance of the rose is said by the poets to be derived from a cup of nectar thrown over it by Cupid, and its thorns to be the stings of the bees with which the arc of his bow was strung. Anacreon makes the birth of the rose coeval with those of Venus and Minerva:

"When, then, in strange, eventful hour,
The earth produced an infant flower,
Which sprang, with blushing tinctures drest,
And wanton'd o'er its parent breast,
The Gods beheld this brilliant birth,
And hail'd the Rose—the boon of earth."

Another fable relating to the birth of the rose is, that Flora, having found the dead body of one of her favorite nymphs, whose beauty could only be equalled by her virtue, implored the assistance of all the gods and goddesses to aid her in changing it into a flower, which all others should acknowledge to be their queen. Apollo lent the vivifying power of his beams; Bacchus bathed it in nectar; Vertumnus gave its perfume; Pomona its fruit, and Flora herself, its diadem of flowers. Other mythological writers relate that the beautiful Rhodante, Queen of Corinth, to escape the persecutions of her lovers, attempted to seclude herself in the temple of Diana, but, being forced by the clamor of the people from her sanctuary, prayed to the gods to change her into a rose, which still bears the blushes that dyed her cheeks when forced to expose herself to public gaze, and under which form she is still universally admired. A beetle is often represented on antique gems as expiring, surrounded by roses, and this is supposed to be an emblem of a man enervated by luxury, the beetle being said to have such an antipathy to roses, that the smell of them will cause its death. Pliny tells us that they garnished their dishes with these flowers, and cites the custom of wearing garlands of them at their feasts. Cleopatra received Antony at one of her banquets in an apartment covered with rose leaves to a considerable depth, and Antony himself, when dying, begged to have roses scattered on his tomb.

The Roman generals who had achieved any remarkable victory, were permitted to have roses sculptured on their shields. Rose-water was the favorite perfume of the Roman ladies, and the most luxurious even used it in their baths. The Turks believe that roses sprang from the perspiration of Mahomet, for which reason they never tread upon a rose leaf or suffer one to lie upon the ground, they also sculpture a rose on the tombstones of females who die unmarried. In an old mosaic in the church of St. Susan at Rome, Charlemagne is represented kneeling and receiving from St. Peter a standard covered with roses. The custom of blessing the rose is still preserved in Rome, and the day on which the ceremony is performed is called Dominea in Rosâ. The seal of Luther was a rose. In 530 St. Medard, Bishop of Noyon instituted a festival at Salency, his birthplace, for adjudging annually the prize of a crown of roses to the girl who should be acknowledged by all her competitors to be the most amiable, modest, and dutiful in the village; and he had the pleasure of crowning his own sister as the first Rose-Queen. This custom was continued to the time of Madame de Genelis, who, in the first volume of her Theatre d'Education, has written a beautiful little drama, entitled La Rosieré de Salency, on the subject. In the middle ages the knights at a tournament wore a rose embroidered on their sleeves as an emblem that gentleness should accompany courage, and that beauty was the reward of valor. The French Parliament had formerly a day of ceremony called Baillee de Roses, because great quantities of roses were distributed. Shakspeare, who no doubt followed some old legend or chronicle, derives the assumption of the red and the white roses by the rival houses of York and Lancaster, from a quarrel in the Temple Gardens between Richard Plantagenet, Duke of York, and the Earl of Somerset, the partisan of Henry of Lancaster. Finding that their voices were getting too loud, Plantagenet proposes that they shall adding:

"In dumb significance proclaim their thoughts."

"Let him who is a true born gentleman,
And stands upon the honor of his birth,
If he supposes I have pleaded truth,
From off this briar pluck a white rose with me."

To which Somerset replies:

"Let him who is no coward, nor no flatterer,
But dare maintain the party of the truth,
Pluck a red rose from off this thorn with me."

Their respective followers gathered the different colored roses; and hence tradition says these flowers were adopted as the badges of the houses of York and Lancaster, during the civil wars which afterwards desolated the country for more than thirty years. The Rosa Alba is said to have been the one chosen as the badge of the House of York, and the Rosa Gallica as that of Lancaster. The York and Lancaster rose, which, when it comes true, has one-half of the flower red, and the other half white, was named in commemoration of the union of the two houses by the marriage of Henry VII. with Elizabeth of York.

Among historical reminiscences of the Rose is this charming allegory: A Turkish poet, Abdulkadri, had the design of establishing himself at Babylon. The Babylonians were unwilling to receive him, but they dared not declare it to him openly. To make him comprehend their thoughts, they passed before him with a vase filled with water, that he might understand that, as the vase was full, nothing could be added to it. Thus, their city was in the same manner filled with poets and learned men, until there was no room left for another. Abdulkadri understood perfectly that enigma, and, for his response, he stooped, picked up a leaf of the rose that was on the ground, and placed it carefully on the surface of the water in the vase, showing them that it kept its place without causing the water to overflow, though the vase was full. That act appeared so marvellous to the Babylonians that they regarded Abdulkadri as a man of superior genius, and they conducted him in triumph to the city. IRIS.

A NOVELTY.—The salesroom of the Franco-American Commercial Company, adjoining the Cosmopolitan Hotel, on Bush street, presents many novel and attractive features. Its dimensions are 60 by 130 feet, with 24 feet ceiling. The whole surface of the side walls is covered with beautiful oil paintings; the body of the room is occupied by some forty standing cases, filled with beautiful statuettes, clocks, silver, porcelain, Venetian and Bohemian wares, elegant household ornaments, and fancy-goods of every description. The whole partakes more of the nature of an art exhibition than of a salesroom, and should be generally visited.

FUN.

GASCONADE AND HOAXING.

A GASCON, in proof of his nobility, asserts that in his father's castle they use no other firewood than the batons of the different marshals of France of his family.

A GASCON officer, on hearing of the boastful exploits of a certain prince who, among other things, had killed six men with his own hands in the course of an assault upon a city, said, disdainfully, "Poh! that's nothing; the mattress I sleep on is stuffed with nothing but the whiskers of those I have sent to the other world."

VERNON'S skill in the invention of marvellous stories has never been surpassed, even by the peddlers of wooden nutmegs. Talking one day about the intense heat of the sun in India, he remarked that it was a common thing there for people to be charred to powder by a coup de soliel, and that upon one occasion, while dining with a Hindoo, one of his host's wives was suddenly reduced to ashes, whereupon the Hindoo rang the bell, and said to the attendant who answered it, "Bring fresh glasses, and sweep up your mistress."

ANOTHER of his stories was this: He happened to be shooting hyenas near Carthage, when he stumbled and fell down an abyss of many fathoms depth. He was surprised, however, to find himself unhurt, for he alighted as if upon a feather bed. Presently he perceived he was gently moved upward; and, having by degrees reached the mouth of the abyss, he again stood safe upon terra firma. He had fallen upon an immense mass of bats, which, disturbed from their slumbers, had risen out of the abyss and brought him up with them.

"WHAT is this?" said a traveller, who entertained reasonable doubts as to the genuineness of certain so-called relics of antiquity, while visiting an old cathedral in the Netherlands; "what is contained in this phial?"

"Sir," replied the sacristan, "that phial contains one of the frogs picked up when Pharaoh was visited with the plague of frogs."

"I am sure, then," rejoined the traveller, "there could have been no epicures in those days."

"Why so?" said the sacristan.

"Because they would have eaten him, he is so large and fat."

The traveller took up another phial which was near. "This contains?" said he—

"That is a most precious relic of the church, which we value very highly."

"It looks very dark."

"There is good reason for that."

"I am somewhat curious. Tell me why."

"You perceive it is very dark."

"I own it."

"That, sir, is some of the darkness which Moses spread over the land of Egypt."

"Indeed! I presume it is what the moderns call darkness made visible."

A ROYAL QUANDARY.

ON the first consignment of Seidlitz Powders to the capital of Delhi, the monarch was deeply interested in the accounts of the refreshing beverage. A box was brought to the king in full court, and the interpreter explained to his majesty how it was to be used. Into a goblet he put the contents of the twelve blue papers, and, having added water, the king drank it off. This was the alkali, and the royal countenance exhibited no sign of satisfaction. It was then explained that in the combination of the two powders lay the luxury; and the twelve white powders were quickly dissolved in water, and as eagerly swallowed by his majesty. With a shriek that will never be forgotten, the monarch rose, staggered, exploded, and in his agony, screamed, "Hold me down!" Then, rushing from the throne, he fell prostrate on the floor. There he lay during the long-continued effervescence of the compound, spirting like ten thousand pennyworths of imperial pop, and believing himself in the agonies of death, a melancholy and convincing proof that kings are mortal.

RELICS.

CHARLES MATHEWS AND THE SILVER SPOON.

SOON after Charles Mathews went from York to Haymarket Theatre, he was invited with other performers to dine with Mr. A——, afterwards an eminent silversmith, but who at that period followed the business of a pawnbroker. It so happened that A—— was called out of the parlor, at the back of the shop, during dinner. Mathews with wonderful celerity, altering his hair, countenance, hat, etc., took a large gravy-dinner-spoon off the table, ran instantly into the street, entered one of the little dark doors leading to the pawnbroker's counter, and actually pledged to the unconscious A—— his own gravy-spoon. Mathews contrived with equal rapidity to return and seat himself (having left the street door open) before A—— re-appeared at the dinner-table. As a matter of course, this was made the subject of a wager. An éclaircissement took place before the party broke up, to the infinite astonishment of A——.

A NEW PLACE OF AMUSEMENT.

MR. SETCHELL, the well-known comedian, is shortly to appear in the new role of Manager, at the Academy of Music. Trusting he will be as successful and as popular in this as in his other impersonations, we give place to the following communication from an enthusiastic correspondent of THE CALIFORNIAN, leaving the reader to judge of its general correctness:

REOPENING OF THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Time is a Renovater as well as a Destroyer, clothing the oldest of ruins with fresh green mosses, and opening new treasures to the light of day, in atonement for those which it buries under crumbling formations. The Academy of Music has stood to the community somewhat as an oyster; its valves opening and closing in response to the pressure of the rising and falling tide, but only revealing the wealth and succulence of the interior to the public eye in occasional glimpses. The trills of Richings fille, the swell and strut of Richings pere in old English comedy, the warblings of the minstrels, the marvellous arias of Phillips and Brambilla, and the deep chest notes of Morelli—all failed to win for the Academy a permanent prosperity. Dan Setchell has now taken the matter in hand, and under the auspices of this most unctious of all mirth-provoking comedians this beautiful house will be reopened on Monday evening as the temple of Momus. Clever burlesques, with local adaptations; farces, selected from an excellent and varied repertoire; comedies, whose mention is identified with the names of actors whose memory will linger with us until all have forgotten how to laugh, will rule at the Academy for the future. So that now, when tired of the sables of "Hamlet," the tights of Vestvali, and the Fenianisms of "Shaun the Post," play-goers can turn them to a place of amusement where they are called upon for no contribution of tears and only asked for a relaxation of the muscles of the mouth. Mr. Setchell will be supported by a selection from the legitimate Opera House company, among whom is Mrs. Saunders, with others gathered in from the various resources which are always open to enterprise. During his residence among us Mr. Setchell has won many friends outside the immediate walk of the stage, and has a personal popularity which very few actors achieve. As a comedian, in his burlesque line of characters, he stands at the head of his profession. In what is called the Burtonian business he has no equal, let alone any suggestion of his having a superior. His "Captain Cuttle" and "Toodles" are acknowledged by competent judges to excel, in many points, the delineations of that Burton who first gave them breath, and with whose name their mention seems to be inseparably linked. And his "Dutch Governor," as a comic picture, is equal in conception and finish to anything that ever Hogarth fancied, or the facile pencil of Gustave Doré drew. We bespeak for Mr. Setchell a generous and hearty reception, the recognition which is his due, and the fullest of houses.

THE RIVER STEAMER "PACIFIC."—This new steamer building at the Potrero for the California Steam Navigation Company, is nearly completed, and is the largest and best constructed steamer ever built on this coast. Her extreme length is 300 feet; she is forty feet longer and fifty feet wider than the Chrysopolis, with proportionately larger passenger accommodations and freight capacity. In construction, machinery, fitting-up, and speed, she is expected to be a master-piece, not approachable on this coast, nor excelled by the "floating palaces" of the Hudson or the Lakes. The roof of the main cabin is to be arched, and ornamented in the Moorish style of architecture; and her immense boilers are to be placed on the guards, abaft of the wheel-house—both improvements in construction. The first will give airiness and beauty to the saloon; and the last will prevent that heat and smell of steam which prevail on many of old-fashioned river boats.

THE SAN FRANCISCO BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.—The donations to this worthy charity, at the several polling places on the election day, amounted to $1,022 55. We trust that the managers of this association will adopt some other equally popular and prominent method of getting their claims before the public. A dollar subscription book might be advantageously circulated among the people. It being a pet theory of this institution, that the "poor should help the poor," besides the more liberal donations from men of means, a subscription list, whose maximum should be one dollar, but which did not ignore even "bits" and "quarters," would meet sincere encouragement from the working classes, who are, for their means, even more liberal than the wealthy.

"MARK TWAIN" IN THE EAST.—The Round Table, in an article upon American humor and humorists, pays the following deserved compliment to our old contributor, Mr. Samuel L. Clemens, whose writings, over the nom de plume of "Mark Twain," it seems have obtained recognition even from that critical journal:

"The foremost among the merry gentlemen of the California press, so far as we have been able to judge, is one who signs himself "Mark Twain;" his style resembles that of "John Phœnix" more nearly than any other, and some things we have seen from his pen would do honor to the memory of even that chieftain among humorists."

A SOCIAL PARTY.—A pleasant party at Platt's Hall, celebrated the fourteenth birthday of the eldest daughter of H. B. Platt, on the 19th inst. The little folks appeared en masque.

A TRAVELLING COMPANION.—I once had a delightful opportunity of observing the effect produced on persons of all classes and all ages by the union of beauty and goodness in a lovely young lady who travelled with me through France, Switzerland and Italy. She was spiritually-minded, and so thoroughly imbued with the love of her fellow-beings, that it shone through every act, lending a charm to all she did and said. No one could resist her fascinations, and her presence was a talisman that unlocked all doors and propitiated all officials. Often have I seen custom house officers, addressed by her, forget their duty, and pass our luggage without examination. We travelled in Switzerland before it was full of great hotels, and used to put up at roadside inns, where the host and his family waited on their guests. These were always charmed by the beautiful and gracious stranger; they would sometimes encumber her with service in order to express their admiration, and everything in the house was put at our disposal for her sake.

On arriving in a village, she would occasionally walk out alone, and we were sure to find her surrounded by the children in the street, whom she was amusing. The little dirty creatures were interesting to her. She carried her guitar with her, and when singing to it, in a little inn parlor, I have seen the curtainless windows filled with faces pressed close to the glass outside, looking at and listening to her, while the family of our host was crowding the doorway. She had a way of treating every one as if they were of the utmost importance to her.

In cities, she was followed and pointed out as the beautiful American, and at the great theatre of San Carlo, in Milan, the attention she attracted was really embarrassing to her. In Florence, Mr. Powers was so delighted with her, that he begged to be allowed to make a portrait bust of her, in which he was very successful. She could not believe that her face deserved such a compliment, and it was with great difficulty that I persuaded her to have it done.

In Rome, our party was indebted to her charms for having the best seats at all public shows, and access to places closed to other strangers. When I was bargaining with an Italian Marquis for a suite of rooms. in Rome, I objected to his price for them as too high, and named the utmost that I was willing to give. He could not take it, but just then my young friend appeared, and, in her sweet voice, said: "You will surely accept the terms of Madame." He gazed at her in silent wonder and admiration, then bowed low and said: "I can refuse you nothing."

When she was presented to that interesting old man, Thorwaldsen, he was captivated by her, and on our second visit, he presented to her a bronze medal with his own head on it.—Mrs. Farrar's "Recollections."

WHAT DID MARY SAY?—A correspondent tells a capital anecdote in illustration of queen occurrences that are sometimes met with in Courts:

During the trial of Cogzell, for kidnapping, which took place lately in Hilsborough, an incident occurred which created considerable fun at the expense of wigs and counsel. A Miss Sloan was testifying, and was requested to state all that she knew about a certain transaction.

Witness—"I was in the sitting-room when Mary came from the kitchen hurriedly, and Cogzell after her. He caught hold of her at the sitting room door and said, "Mary you have been here long enough, come and go home now."

Attorney for Defendant—"What did Mary say?"

Attorney for State—"Stop there; I object to the question."

Here a discussion of nearly two hours took place, in which four lawyers participated; after which the judges held a long, serious and exciting discussion on the subject, and finally, in a very formal and pompous manner, stated that it was the opinion of a majority of the court that the question should be answered. The court-room was crowded to almost suffocation, and the most intense interest was manifested at this stage of the proceedings. The question was repeated, "What did Mary say?" and the witness answered:

"She didn't say a word!"

A STORM-MAP.—M. Leverrier has added meteorological maps to the International Bulletin of the Paris Observatory. The map which has appeared is a specimen of what he will do if the government will grant him $5000 a year. It is a storm-map: red dots indicate innocuous storms; blue dots, storms which by rain did damage; black dots, storms which by hail did damage; black crosses, hail-storms which did no mischief; red zigzag lines, the fall of lightning without injury; blue zigzag lines indicate that lightning did damage; black zigzag lines show it killed persons; red arrows indicate the direction of the storm; the number of feathers show its velocity; blue lines point out the places where the storm simultaneously occurred.

ANOTHER SCHOOL SHIP.—Ship Art Union, 750 tons, now at Boston, built at Newburyport, in 1850, has been purchased by the State Government, for a State School Ship, in connection with the present ship Massachusetts.

WANTED.

WANTED—not a husband—a guardian. Of all the conveuient institutions which it has been privilege to take notice of, guardians are (to all appearances) in every respect the most desirable. When I first came to this land of gold, among the very many new and interesting institutions, customs, etc., which met my unsophisticated vision and understanding, the most wonderfully inspiring and pleasing was that of the guardian. When I first met this, that, and the other young lady, under the watchful protection of guardians, my natural impression was that each of the young ladies was an heiress. But, no—far from it! I learned they were penniless—every one. Then the beauty and convenience of the arrangement made its appearance. Here we see numbers of young ladies kept at expensive boarding schools; educated for years at the expense of whom? Guardians. Have those girls no father—no mother? Perhaps not; perhaps a mother; perhaps a father in one part of the world, and a mother in another part. At all events, daughter is placed in the sole charge of guardian. And she need not necessarily be at school. She may be supported out of school, leading an idle, aimless life; fed and clothed at the expense of generous guardian! Has she no father, mother, or brother? Surely not. Sometimes guardian is a natural protector, being a thirty-second cousin, or distantly related uncle. One thing is astonishing—how very youthful those cousins and uncles always are; not a bit like my uncles. My uncles are nearer the age of my father than of myself; and my gay young cousins always seem to prefer somebody else's cousin to their own, to talk to by moonlight, and I am sure the preference is—mutual. Guardian visits little ward of ten, twelve, or fourteen years of age; brings her goodies and nice presents. She is a darling little pet; and he is the kindest, best man, the dearest friend little ward has in all the world. She affirms that such things are right, and such wrong, because guardian says so. He visits little ward when sixteen and eighteen years of age; takes her pretty, delightful rides and walks; escorts her to places of amusement, etc. While at school, she is not permitted to receive attentions from gentlemen; but guardian is a privileged character. Who shall question his right to bestow what attention he pleases on his ward? Ward of eighteen is very grateful to guardian for his kindness. And it is not likely her regard for him approaches aught but gratitude. And, certainly, no one would presume to question his honor. He would not so much as seem to endeavor to win the affections of his ward. He must be—he should be—the soul of honor, to have in his charge the young lady from childhood to years of maturity. Who would not have a guardian? It must be convenient to have school bills cancelled, without giving a thought to economy; it must be convenient to have one's wardrobe replenished, without giving a thought to the expense; it must be convenient to have plenty of spending money, without taking the trouble to question how it comes, or where it comes from; it must be convenient to have a gentleman ever ready to escort one to places of amusement, where it is not proper for unprotected ladies to go unattended; all things considered, it must be convenient to have a guardian. Wanted—a guardian.

HOYYS.

Two friends were listening to a young preacher, whose sermon was made up of unacknowledged plagiarisms. They did little else than nudge each other as one amazing crib succeeded another, until one whispered, "Look at him! I declare his very whiskers are curving into inverted commas, and his face looks one entire quotation."

THE Continental folks, a day or two since hearing of the whereabouts of a guest who had decamped without going through the usual formality of paying his bill, sent him a note: "M. ——, Dear Sir: Will you send amount of your bill and oblige," etc. To which the delinquent made answer: "The amount is $80,62-12." Yours respectfully.

TALLEYRAND once took the conceit out of a young coxcomb at some table in Paris, where he chanced to be dining. "My mother," said the dandy, "was renowned for her beauty. She was certainly the handsomest woman I ever saw." Ah!" taking his measure at once, "it was your father, then, who was not good-looking!"

THE "PHILHARMONICS'" CONCERT.—The fourth and last Subscription Concert of the Philharmonic Society was given at the Academy of Music on Thursday evening, to a fine and fashionable house. The entertainment was so well appreciated that we learn it is the intention of the society to favor the musical public with a new series. The selections were tasteful, and the applause frequent and deserved. The Bianchis sang, and were cordially welcomed by the audience.

THE ELECTION.—The returns, though not complete, indicate that the vote throughout the State has been very light, and Sanderson has been re-elected Judge of the Supreme Court by the same ratio of majority that was given for Lincoln and Johnson, last Fall. The city election resulted in the re-election of Judge Dwinelle and Judge Shepheard, and the election of four, out of six, Justices of the Peace from the Democratic party.

THE FAIRY WEDDING.

[FROM ROBERT BUCHANAN'S POEMS.]

RING, sing! ring, sing! pleasant Sabbath bells!
Chime, rhyme! chime, rhyme! thorough dales and dells!
Rhyme, ring! chime, sing! pleasant Sabbath bells!
Chime, sing! rhyme, ring! over fields and fells!

And I galloped and galloped on my palfrey white as milk,
My robe was of the sea-green woof, my serk was of the silk;
My hair was golden yellow, and it floated to my shoe,
My eyes were like two harebells, bathed in little drops of dew;
My palfrey never stopping, made a music sweetly blent
With the leaves of Autumn dropping all around me as I went;
And I heard the bells, grown fainter, far behind me peal and play,
Fainter, fainter, fainter, fainter, till they seemed to die away;
And beside a silver runnel, on a little heap of sand,
I saw the green Gnome sitting, with his cheek upon his hand;
Then he started up to see me, and he ran with cry and bound,
And drew me from my palfry white, and set me on the ground:
O crimson, crimson were his locks, his face was green to see,
But he cried, "O light-haired lassie, you are bound to marry me!"
He clasped me round the middle, small, he kissed me on the cheek,
He kissed me once, he kissed me twice—I could not stir or speak;
He kissed me twice, he kissed me thrice—but when he kissed again,
I called aloud upon the name of Him who died for men.

Ring, sing! ring, sing! pleasant Sabbath bells!
Chime, rhyme! chime, rhyme! thorough dales and dells!
Rhyme, ring! chime, sing! pleasant Sabbath bells!
Chime, sing! rhyme, ring! over fields and fells!

O faintly, faintly, faintly, calling men and maids to pray,
So faintly, faintly, faintly, rang the bells afar away;
And as I named the Blessed Name, as in our need we can,
The ugly green, green Gnome became a tall and comely man!
His hands were white, his beard was gold, his eyes were black as sloes,
His tunic was of scarlet woof, and silken were his hose;
A pensive light from Faeryland still lingered on his cheek,
His voice was like the running brook, when he began to speak;
"O you have cast away the charm my step-dame put on me;
Seven years I dwelt in Faeryland, and you have set me free!
O I will mount thy palfrey white, and ride to kirk with thee,
And by those little dewy eyes, we twain will wedded be!"

Back we galloped, never stopping, he before and I behind,
And the Autumn leaves were dropping red and yellow in the wind,
And the sun was shining clearer, and my heart was high and proud,
And nearer, nearer, nearer, rang the kirk bells sweet and loud,
And we saw the kirk before us, as we trotted down the fells,
And nearer, clearer, o'er us, rang the welcome of the bells.

Ring, sing! ring, sing! pleasant Sabbath bells!
Chime, rhyme! chime, rhyme! thorough dales and dells!
Rhyme, ring! chime, sing! pleasant Sabbath bells!
Chime, sing! rhyme, ring! over fields and fells!

THE GUILLOTINE.

THE EXECUTION OF FIESHI, MOREY, AND PEPIN.

ABOUT one o'clock on a cold winter night in 1835, a party of four persons were seated in the coffee room of the Hotel Meurice at Paris. It was chilly, sloppy, miserable weather; half-melted snow mixed with the Paris mud, and a driving sleety rain hissed against the ill-fitting windows. Talk of the cold in London! when we have our clubs, and our curtained windows, and carpeted floors, and sea-coal fires, and our well-closed doors and sashes. Why, we have more real comfort in our three-pair-backs than their most splendid saloons, with all the mirrors and painted walls, and timber-fed stoves can offer.

Englishmen carry their customs with them. Our four convives were drinking—not the wines of sunny France, but something much more appropriate and homely—a curiously fine sample of gin, artfully compounded into toddy, by Achille, the waiter.

When the clock struck one, three of the party made a show of retiring; but the fourth, a punchy gentleman from Wolverhampton, entreated that the rest would not all desert him while he discussed one glass more—nay, perhaps, would join him. But here Achille was inexorable. The master was in bed and had taken the keys.

"Call him up, then—roust him out!"

"Mais, messieurs! you would not disturb madame! ah, non! madame so tired—so delicate—so harrassed with the noise all day—ah, non!"—and seeing the favorable impression, added a climax of silent pantomime to his eloquence. Raising his shoulders to his ears, spreading his hands to the front, and wrinkling his face into a smile, which said, "I knew you were too gallant for that."—he bowed himself out.

Our four friends have taken their candles and are moving from the room, when a cab drives rapidly to the door—there is a smart ring at the bell, and a gentleman in full evening dress, and enveloped in a Spanish cloak, hastily enters the room.

"Who is inclined to see Fieschi's head chopped off?" said the stranger, unfolding himself from the cloak. "The execution is to take place at daylight—I had it from a peer of France, and the guillotine has been sent off an hour ago."

"Where?"

Our informant could not tell. It was known only to the police—there was an apprehension of some attempt at a rescue, and ten thousand troops were to be on the ground. It will be either at the Place St. Jaques, or the Barriere du Trone—the first most likely, let us try that to begin with, and there will be plenty of time to go on to the other afterwards; but we must be early to get a good place.

We are not of those who make a practice of attending executions with a morbid appetite for such horrors. Under any circumstances, the deliberate cutting off a life is a melancholy spectacle. The mortal agony, unrelieved by excitement, is painful in the extreme to witness, but worse still is reckless bravado. Rarest of all is it to see the inevitable fate met with calm dignity. Here, however, was a miscreant, who, to gratify a political feeling—dignified, in his opinion, with the name of patriotism—deliberately fired the contents of a battery of gunbarrels into a mass of innocent persons, many of whom it was quite certain would be killed, for the chance of striking down one man, and probably some of his family. That this family, with their illustrious father, should have escaped altogether, is an instance of good fortune as remarkable as the attempt was flagitious. But the magnitude of the crime invested the perpetrators with a terrible interest, which overcame any lingering scruples, and the whole party decided upon setting out forthwith. We made for the nearest coach-stand, which was that upon the quay, near the Pont Neuf.

What terrible recollections is this old city of Paris invested with! scarcely a street, or a place, or public building, that has not some dreadful story. Neither is there any—at least in Europe—where the midnight rambler is more apparently exposed to maltreatment. In London, even at the latest hour, there is a sense of security in the broad glare of gas, and the occasional policeman; but neither of these, except in a very few favored spots, were to be found in Paris, in 1835. When the shops close, your only reliance is upon the light of other days, dangling from ropes across the street. No policeman is to be seen, and the scowling vagabonds—call them chiffonniers, or what you will—are about the very last kind of people which one would desire to meet by moonlight alone.

If ever ghosts are permitted to return to scenes of violence and crime, you might surely expect to meet them in Paris. In the short space between the hotel and the quay, we passed the spot where lay in one revolting heap—naked and exposed—the corpses of the fifteen hundred gallant Swiss guards, gazed at as a show during a whole forenoon, by the male and female thousands of Paris.

In something more than half an hour we jingled into the Place St. Jaques, and, pausing at the corner, had the satisfaction to hear the sound of hammers busily upon a dark mass rising in the centre of the square; it was the platform upon which to erect the guillotine. On all sides of this workmen were busily engaged; their labor quickened by the exhortations of one who walked about, lantern in hand, upon the top. This was the executioner who, seen by the light he carried, bore a remarkable resemblance to our great comedian, the late Mr. Liston. There was the same square form of the countenance, the small nose, the long upper lip, the mirth-provoking gravity, and the same rich husky chuckle. This curious likeness was at once acknowledged by all present, and an Englishman took the liberty of interrupting the grave functionary with the information that he was the very image of le plus grand farceur que nous avons en Angleterre, a piece of information which the French scion of the house of Ketch received, after the manner of Frenchmen, as a high compliment, being moved to bow and chuckle much thereat.

By this time the hammering had roused the dwellers in the place, and lights were seen rapidly moving about the windows. A café keeper had opened his saloon, arranged his little tables, and was bustling about with his waiters, attending to the wants of the guests already assembled. An execution is a godsend to the Place St. Jaques at any time, but the execution of three great state criminals such as these would go far to pay the year's rent of the houses. As cabs and fiacres began to arrive, we thought it necessary to make arrangements for securing a room from whence to see the execution, and chance conducted us to the corner house, one side of which looked upon the square, directly opposite the guillotine, from which it was scarcely fifty yards distance; and the other side fronted the road by which the prisoners were to be conveyed from their prison to the scaffold.

After the manner of Englishmen, who do abroad what they would never think of at home, our party walked up stairs, on the door being opened, and commenced a search along the passages, knocking at the doors of such rooms as we thought would afford a good view of the scene. In this way we met other parties of English and other foreigners, wandering about in the most authoritative manner, urging the people to get dressed and give up their rooms, and, in the case of unbolted doors, intruding into several little scenes of domestic privacy. One gentleman—the people said he was either Russian or English—was already ensconced; he had taken a whole room to himself, paid for it, shut himself up in it, and fortified the door with such moveable furniture as could be made available, in addition to the door fastenings. Though the proprietor of the apartment had no doubt received an ample rent for the occupancy, yet he attempted, on the strength of a good offer, to introduce more tenants, palpably trying, by his own showing, to falsify the original contract; but such attempts were without success. After several failures, through the bad faith and extortion of the different room holders, who made little scruple of breaking through agreements, and raising their price as fresh arrivals came, one of our party made a bargain, through the closed door, with an old gentleman and his young wife, Fanchon, to be received, at a napoleon each, into their apartment as soon as they were dressed—the whole of the money to be paid down at once, upon the distinct understanding that no more persons were to be admitted. The old man was soon ready to give up the premises, but madame, a demure-looking grisette, had no notion of appearing in dishabille before so many strangers, and kept us waiting some time, notwithstanding the interior murmurs of "Allons, Fanchon, dépeche toi." and the "Now, old girl—hurry up the room—never mind your stays," of some of the expectants outside.

We found the situation well adapted for our purpose; though only one window looked into the square, the two others were easily made to command a view of the scaffold, which was nearly in a line with that side of the house. Fanchon had also with much propriety made the bed, set the furniture to rights, raked up the ashes of the wood-fire, and put on another block or two; and the fact of meeting with an open fireplace instead of the eternal stove, made us feel at home at once. The Wolverhampton man declared that it was dangerous to British lungs to be out in these raw mornings in a foreign country, without something warm to qualify the air; so a bottle of brandy was sent for to the neighboring café, and our hostess had busied herself in producing hot water and tumblers, as if, through the frequenters of executions, she had arrived at considerable knowledge of the natural tastes. Our ancient host, being accommodated with a cigar, narrated the particulars of the many beheadings which had fallen under his observation since his occupancy of the house. One may be mentioned as exhibiting a rare instance of irresistible curiosity. The man had been guilty of an atrocious murder, either of a wife or some near relative, and when his neck was placed under the axe he contrived to turn himself partly round to see its descent, and had a part of his chin taken off in consequence.

At about two hours before daylight a body of mounted municipal guards arrived, and formed round the scaffold. The object of this appeared to be to hide the proceedings as much as possible from those on foot, who could only hope for a very imperfect view between the bodies and the bearskins of those troops. Soon after the municipal guard the infantry of the line began to arrive, and were formed in a circle four deep outside the municipals, and nearly as far back as the houses of the Place. A considerable crowd had also collected, though extremely orderly and good-humored; in fact, to see the general hilarity, and listen to the bursts of loud laughter, it would seem to be regarded in the light of a fête. There was certainly no appearance of sympathy with the criminals. Finding the municipals so materially interfered with the show, the people soon began to occupy the trees and lamp-posts, the adjacent walls, and the roofs of the neighboring houses; while the infantry, having piled arms, waltzed and danced to keep themselves warm.

Soon after daylight the hammering ceased, and the preparations appeared to be complete; and shortly afterwards strong bodies of cavalry began to take up their positions in all the streets leading to the Place. The first care of the officer commanding these was to clear the square of all the people who had collected in the rear of the infantry, and to drive them out along the adjacent streets; an order was also given to dislodge the people out of the trees, and from the walls and lamp-posts, and this caused much grumbling and swearing of all concerned. Some merriment, however, was excited by the discovery of some women in the trees, and their descent, superintended by the dragoons below, gave occasion for the exercise of much not over decent wit amongst the troopers. It struck me that in their manner of dealing with the crowd there was much unnecessary harshness on the part of the troops, and irritability and fretfulness often exhibited by persons doubtful of their own authority, and very unlike the calm, good-humored superiority with which our own men are wont to handle the masses.

Presently came two general officers with their staff, and each followed by a mounted "jockei," lads dressed as English grooms, one of whom, as well by his fair complexion and honest round face, the whiteness of his tops and leathers, and the general superiority of his turn-out, as by his firm and easy seat on horseback, was evidently a native of our own country.

About an hour after sunrise, three caleches came rapidly down the road, passing our window, each carriage containing three persons, the condemned and two police officers. The troops opened out, and the men were landed at the foot of the platform. It may be well to describe the general appearance of the scaffold.

On a platform, about twelve feet square, and seven feet above the ground, are erected the two upright posts, between which is suspended the axe. They somewhat resemble a narrow gallows, scarcely more than a foot between the posts. The axe, which is not unlike a hay knife, though much heavier and broader, is drawn up to the top of the posts, between which it runs in grooves, and is held suspended by a loop in the halyards, passed over a button at the bottom. The edge of the axe, as it hangs suspended, is not horizontal, or at a right angle with the post, but diagonal, giving the instrument a fearful power, in conjunction with its weight and long fall, of shearing through a resisting substance, of many times more opposing force than a human neck. On the centre of the platform stands a frame, or large box, much resembling a soldier's arm-chest, about six feet long by two and a-half wide, and probably as high. One end of this abuts upon the upright posts; at the other end is a small frame, like a truck, connected about its centre with the chest by hinges, and with a strap and buckle, to make it fast to a man's body.

The prisoners, having dismounted, were placed in a line on the ground facing the guillotine, their arms pinioned. They were very different in appearance. Fieschi had a sinister and most ferocious expression of face, rendered more so by scars, scarcely healed apparently, inflicted by the bursting of his gun-barrels. He was plainly dressed, and appeared like a workman of the better class; his age about thirty-five. Morey was a man advanced in life, perhaps seventy; his bald head was partly covered by a black cap, revealing the white hairs behind and at the sides; he was a corpulent, large figure, dressed completely in black, with a mild, intelligent face, and altogether a very gentlemanly air and manner. Pepin was a small, thin-faced, insignificant man.

Pepin was chosen first for execution. Having been deprived of his coat and neck-handkerchief, and the collar of his shirt turned down, he was led by the executioner up the steps of the platform. He ascended with an air of considerable bravado, shook himself, and looked round with much confidence, and spoke some words which we could not catch, and which the executioner appeared disposed to cut short. Having advanced with his breast against a truck, to which his body was rapidly strapped, he was then tilted down, truck and all, upon his face; and the truck moving upon small wheels or castors in grooves upon the chest, he was moved rapidly forward till his neck came directly under the chopper, when, the rope being unhooked from the button, the axe fell with a loud and awful "chop!" the head rolling down upon the bare platform. After the separation of the head, the body moved with much convulsive energy, and had it not been made fast to what I have called the truck, and that also connected with the raised platform, would probably have rolled down on the lower stage. The executioner then held up the head to view for a moment, and I suspect, from some laughter among the troops, made a facetious remark. The lid of a large basket alongside of the chest was then raised, and the body rolled into it.

Morey was the next victim. He ascended the steps feebly and required much assistance; he was also supported during the process of strapping him. His bald head and venerable appearance made a favorable impression upon the spectators, and elicited the only expressions of sympathy observable throughout the executions.

Fieschi came last, and was most unnerved of the three. He appeared throughout in a fainting condition, and hung his head in a pitiable state of prostration. Very little consideration was shown him; or rather, he was pushed and thrust about in a way which was indecent, if not disgusting, whatever might have been his crimes. Some little difficulty occurred in placing his head conveniently under the axe, from a recoiling motion of the prisoner. He was certainly the least brave of the three. The executioner, having rolled his body into the larger basket with the others, took up that containing the three heads, which having emptied upon the bodies, he gave the bottom of the basket a jocular tap, which, being accompanied with the lifting of his foot behind, and probably some funny and seasonable observation, created a good deal of merriment amongst the spectators.

The guillotine is apparently the most merciful, but certainly the most terrible to witness, of any form of execution in civilized Europe. The fatal chop, the raw neck, the spouting blood, are shocking to the feelings, and very demoralizing, as such exhibitions cannot fail to generate a spirit of ferocity and a love of bloodshed among those who witness them. It was not uncommon at this period in Paris to execute sheep and calves with the guillotine; and fathers of families would pay a small sum to obtain such a gratifying show for their children. In such a taste may we not trace the old leaven of the first revolution, and the germ of future ones.

The fate of poor Dr. Guillotine was a singular one. He lived to see the machine which he had invented from feelings of pure philanthropy, made the instrument of the most horrible butcheries, the aptness of the invention notoriously increasing the number of victims who fell by it; and he died in extreme old age with the bitter reflection that his name would be handed down to posterity in connection with the most detestable ferocities which have ever stained the annals of mankind.

THE "BERNER'S STREET HOAX."

THE maddest of Theodore Hook's tricks was that known as the "Berner's Street Hoax," which happened in 1809, as follows:

Walking down Berner's street one day, Hook's companion (probably Matthews) called his attention to a particularly neat and modest house, the residence—as was inferred from the door-plate—of some decent shopkeeper's widow. "I'll lay you a guinea," said Theodore, "that in one week that pleasant, peaceable dwelling shall be the most famous in all London." The bet was taken, and in the course of four or five days, Hook had written and posted one thousand letters, annexing orders to tradesmen of every sort within the bills of mortality, all to be executed in one particular day, and as nearly as possible at one fixed hour.

From "wagons of coals and potatoes, to books, prints, ices, feathers, jellies, and cranberry tarts," nothing in any way available to any human being but was commanded from scores of rival dealers, scattered all over the city, from Wapping to Lambeth, from Whitechapel to Paddington. It can only be feebly imagined what the crash, and jam, and tumult of that day was. Hook had provided himself with a lodging nearly opposite the fated house, where, with a couple of trusty allies, he watched the progress of the melodrama. The Mayor and his chaplain arrived—invited there to take the death-bed confession of a speculating common-councilman. There also came the Governor of the Bank, the Chairman of the East India Company, the Lord Chief Justice and the Prime Minister—above all, there came his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, and his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief. These all obey the summons, for every pious and patriotic feeling had been most movingly appealed to.

They could not all reach Berner's street, however—the avenues leading to it being jammed up by the drays, carts, and carriages, all pressing on the solitary widow's house; but certainly the Duke of York's military punctuality and crimson liveries brought him to the point of attack before the poor woman's astonishment has risen to terror and despair. Most fierce were the growlings of doctors and surgeons, scores of whom had been cheated of valuable hours.

Attorneys, teachers of every kind, male and female, hairdressers, tailors, popular preachers, Parliamentary Philanthropists, had been all alike victimized. There was an awful smashing of glass, china, harpsichords, coach-pannels. Many a horse fell never to rise again. Beer-barrels and wine-barrels were overturned and exhausted with impunity amidst the press of countless multitudes. It was a great day for the pick-pockets, and a great godsend to the newspapers.

Then arose many a fervent hue and cry for the detection of the wholesale deceiver and destroyer. Though in Hook's own theatrical world he was instantly suspected, no sign escaped either him or his confidants. He found it convenient to be laid up a week or two by a severe fit of illness, and then promoted reconvalescence by a few weeks' country tour. He re-visited Oxford, and professed an intention of commencing his residence there. But the storm blew over, and Hook returned with tranquility to the green-room.

THE FIRST BALLOON.—In an article on the history of aerostation, the Mechanics' Magazine thus refers to the first aerial voyage made with an "inflammable air" balloon, as it was originally called. The ascent took place on the first of December, 1783, from the Tuileries. The balloon was constructed by the Brothers Robert, famous philosophical instrument makers of the time; and Professor Charles, a young, but experienced physicist, was entrusted with the direction of the experiment. The balloon was made of varnished silk, the upper portion being covered with a net. It measured ninety-seven feet in diameter, and had attached to it a car or boat of basket work, measuring eight feet by four feet, by three feet six inches deep. The appareil of aerostation was created by M. Charles in connection with this ascent; for, in this balloon, he introduced the varnished silk, the valve to regulate the escape of gas, the car, which he attached by ropes to the lower edge of the network covering, the ballast to regulate, and the barometer to measure ascent and descent. In fact, it may be said that the art of aerostation at once attained perfection in Charles' balloon, and no essential change or improvement has since taken place. The gas balloons took their name from this aeronaut, and were afterwards known as Charlieres. The first voyage was safely accomplished by M. Charles and one of the Roberts, who travelled from Paris to Nelse, a distance of about twenty-seven miles, in an hour and three-quarters. After landing M. Robert, M. Charles shot up again and made a series of barometric and theometric observations.

A PHILOSOPHICAL cabman, in Mobile, thus speaks of the section over which his wheels make their tracks: "If you run over a youngster down here in this here ward," said he, "the folks don't say nothin'—kase they have got more children than wittles for 'em—but you jist run over a goat, or a kid, or a sow, or a pig, and blest if a mob ain't arter you in two minits!"

EARTHQUAKES.

SO far as modern times are concerned, Iceland, the western coast of Spain and Portugal, the south of Italy, and the Levant, have been the only portions of Europe where seriously destructive earthquakes have taken place. Though North America does not seem to have contributed very many earthquakes to the list just given, yet this is probably from the lack of records, as the whole region from California southwards, bordering on the Pacific, is subject to violent earthquakes. "Pacific" as the ocean may be, its borders are of a very different character, and both its Asiatic and its American coasts are so constantly visited with earthquakes that they, with the islands of the Caribbean Sea, will stand first on the earthquake districts of the globe. The Pacific Ocean is, in fact, fringed by a rocky, earthquake-visited territory. As to the times when earthquakes happen in the greatest numbers, there are but two facts which can be stated positively. The first is very singular, namely, that the greater part of the earthquakes which have been recorded occur near to the time of the new and of the full moon. It is, of course, very doubtful whether if we could throw into the calculation all the earthquakes which have gone by without bigrapher or record, we should still find the same curious rule holding good. Still, for all the hundreds, nay, thousands, of observed earthquakes, there is a preponderance of those which have selected either the time of full or of new moon for their occurrence; although no explanatory theory has yet been offered which we think worth presenting to our readers. The second fact is, that the majority happen in the colder half of the year. About four happen from October to March—both inclusive—for every three which occur in the other part of the year. The singular thing here is, the same rule holds for the British, the Spanish, the French, and the Italian earthquakes. On the south side of the equator, where the months from October to March are the warm months, they have, so far as our records go, the smaller number of earthquakes; but as our accounts of earthquakes there are by no means so full as in Europe, we cannot be so sure of the conclusions to be drawn. Thus much may be said, as being matter of observation as to the times when earthquakes happen. History also seems to point to something like a rule for the recurrence of serious and numerous earthquakes somewhat after the middle of each successive century. To go back over the last four hundred years, we observe that about the middle of the last century (1755) occurred the great Lisbon earthquake; and, subsequently, the great Calabrian earthquake; so also in the middle of the seventeenth century there were great earthquakes in the Mediterranean, and afterwards, towards its close, the great Jamaica earthquake; while, in the middle and later half of the sixteenth century there were great earthquakes both in Europe and China. In each of these cases, the earthquakes mentioned were the chief earthquakes of the century. Whether the present century is to follow this precedent, we are hardly yet advanced enough to say. Certain it is that the first fifty years saw but few serious catastrophes in the Levant, and in those which have occurred in the Eastern seas.—Eastern Paper.

THE JUDGMENTS OF WOMEN.—In a conversation I once held with an eminent minister of the church, he made this observation: "We will say nothing of the manner in which that sex usually conduct an argument; but the intuitive judgments of women are often more to be relied upon than the conclusions which we reach by an elaborate process of reasoning. No man who has an intelligent wife, or is accustomed to the society of educated women, will dispute this. Times without number you must have known them to decide questions on the instant, and with unerring accuracy, which you had been pouring over for hours, perhaps, with no other result than to find yourself getting deeper and deeper into the tangled mass of difficulties. It were hardly generous to allege that they achieve these facts less by reasoning than a sort of sagacity which approximates to the sure instincts of the animal races; and yet there seems to be some ground for the remark of a witty French writer: that when a man has toiled, step by step, up a flight of stairs, he will be sure to find a woman at the top; but she will not be able to tell how she got there. How she got there, however, is of little moment. If the conclusions a woman has reached are sound, that is all that concerns us. And that they are very apt to be sound on the practical matters of domestic and secular life nothing but prejudice or self-conceit can prevent us from acknowledging. The inference, therefore, is unavoidable, that the man who thinks it beneath his dignity to take counsel with an intelligent wife stands in his own light, and betrays that lack of judgment which he tacitly attributes to her."

THE total annual product of coffee in the world is set down in a recent circular at an average of about six hundred and seventy-two million pounds, or about three hundred thousand tons. Half of this is produced in Brazil. About fifty thousand tons come from Java and Sumatra, 30,000 tons from Ceylon, 25,000 tons from St. Domingo, and the remainder from a variety of other countries or islands in or near the torrid zone.

CIVIL POLICY OF AMERICA.*

ANY work from the pen of John Draper will be welcomed as a valuable contribution to scientific and historical literature. That he is one of the most thorough scholars and profound thinkers of the present time, must be admitted by all who have the slightest acquaintance with his writings. His first volume, published some years ago, although considered by the Faculty superior both in design and execution to the kindred (German) work of Lehman, was somewhat too professional to interest the general reader. But his Intellectual Development in Europe, published in 1863, secured the attention of all intelligent men, and placed Professor Draper, in his attempt to treat the history of man upon a scientific theory, by the side of the great English materialist, Thomas Buckle. The present volume may be considered a sequel to the Intellectual Development. In it is sought to be applied to the United States the principles announced in the former work as governing the progress of Europe; and what shall be our future legislation in regard to the many grave questions now pressing upon us, the learned author declares depends upon our geographical position and our physical being.

The theory of Dr. Draper is the Positive theory; and though it runs counter to many of the most cherished doctrines of the Church, and denies many of the approved maxims of the State, it is the theory which to-day commands the respect of the thoughtful and the assent of the wise. Sun, wind, rain, heat, and cold, determine the characters of men, and shape the destinies of nations. The moral nature of an individual is founded upon his physical nature, and the government of a State depends upon the influence of climate. A warm climate produces different plants and animals than a cold one. Not the less does it produce different men. The thoughts, feelings, morals, and religion of India, necessarily must differ from those of Lapland, and laws suited to the inhabitants of the frigid will be unsuited to the inhabitants of the torrid zone. It is the aim of Dr. Draper to show that there is little if any free will in this world; that the opinions and actions of man are not voluntary, but the result of the physical circumstance by which for the time being he happens to be surrounded. "We vainly attempt the improvement of a race, intellectually or morally, by missionary exertion or by education, except we simultaneously touch its actual physical condition. Any impression upon that gives the possibility of accomplishing the other." Having demonstrated thus much, the question is asked: "What, after all, does this amount to?" and the answer given is this: that the body of man can not resist external influences. It is helplessly modified by heat and cold, dryness, moisture—that is, by climate. The complexion of the skin changes, as also does the construction of the brain. In a restricted locality, there may be a sameness in population; but in a vast continent, like America, there will inevitably be all kinds of modified men. Their thoughts and their actions must necessarily be diverse. To unite them under one government becomes, then, proportionably more and more difficult as there is increase in numbers and in years.

Professor Draper then proceeds to point out the means by which the influence of climate may be modified, and its disorganizing tendency counteracted; and holds that these should be anxiously cared for by all those who share in the legislation of the Republic. Yet, after all has been done, it is insisted that the life of a nation can only be prolonged to its allotted time: "Nations, like individual men, are born to die." Death awaits every State, as it does every man; and Dr. Draper asserts, both in this volume and in his Intellectual Progress, that England now is what Egypt once was, and that the United States shall be what Egypt now is. However unpalatable this truth—however much we may dissent from it—no one can fail to perceive that the argument, as here presented and enforced, is of the strongest—if not unanswerable, as yet unanswered.

There are many special subjects glanced at, such as, celibacy; the rapidity with which dissensions caused by civil wars are healed: the absolute necessity for encouraging personal locomotion; the duty incumbent upon every one to uphold the freest expression of thought, etc., which we should be glad to notice, but must rest satisfied in recommending the entire work to the careful perusal of those interested in such topics.

That which will prove particularly interesting to our readers will be the author's remarks upon California and the Pacific Coast. Touching this, we extract the following:

"A few years more, and the influence of the Great Republic will resistlessly extend in a direction that will lead to surprising results. So importunate and increasing is the demand for human labor, so tempting its remuneration, so productive its use, that those stagnant Asiatic tribes, to which our attention in some of these pages has been directed, cannot fail to be affected. The stream of Chinese emigration, already setting into California, is but the precursor of the flood that is to come. There are the fields; here are the men. The dominant power on the Pacific Ocean must necessarily exert a controlling influence in the affairs of Asia. * * * * The Pacific front of the United States is destined to be the scene of an active Asiatic emigration. * * * The Chinese population of California is far from insignificant, and is steadily increasing. * * It is of no importance that for the present these people look upon the country they thus visit as merely a temporary abode, in which money is to be made, and that, as their moderate expectations of a competency are fulfilled, they hasten to return to their native place. That is the natural timidity of early adventurers.

But these, in due season, will be followed by others having more settled intentions. The dislike the American population has to them once abating—that temporary dislike which all races of men who differ in aspect, in ideas, in religion, from one another always entertain—the general principles of the system of the Republic will come into powerful effect. The facility for acquiring proprietorship in land, the certainty of its tenure, are temptations that no laboring class can resist. In the same street will be seen the Joss-house, the Synagogue, the Chapel, the Church.

Considering that, under the circumstances of the case, the individuals who are thus destined to disturb the Pacific Coast must necessarily issue from the lower social grades of the countries from which they come, their admixture with the native American population can not be viewed without anxiety. The Pacific States will do well to look to their public schools, laying broad and munificent foundations for their educational system, giving no encouragement to the use of any foreign tongue, and fusing into their mass, as thoroughly and rapidly as may be, their inevitable hybrid population.

With Eastern blood will necessarily come Eastern thoughts, and the attempt at Eastern social habits. I have already referred to the political power of polygamic institutions. It must not be forgotten that they are in accordance with the sentiments of Asiatics. Especially, also, should it be borne in mind that they have already obtained a firm root in Utah. There is imminent danger of the spread of those institutions in the West. As men approach to the confines of Asia, they seem to be affected by its moral atmosphere."

Prof. Draper is far too great a thinker to view the "civil policy of America," or of any other nation, wholly from the material stand-point. "Philosophical conceptions of historical progress must not be altogether of the material kind." Accordingly, having devoted one-half of his work to the control of climate and the effects of emigration, he dedicates the other half to the influence of ideas and importance of intellectual culture.

Ideas do much toward governing the world. The Arabs and the Jews are cited as examples. The idea, "There is one God, and Mahomet is his Prophet," has completely governed nine thousand millions of human beings. "The idea of a Messiah, or a Deliverer," has for more than twenty centuries kept the Jewish race an undestroyed nation. The author is careful to point out, what is too often forgotten, that it makes no difference whether ideas be true or false as regards their power. "It is with their force, not with their goodness or evil, that we are concerned."

As to intellectual culture, compared with moral culture, Professor Draper stands in the front rank of the Positivists. "The improvement of society can only be accomplished through the intellect." "The moral is in its very nature stationary. Alone, it is incompetent to guide the advancement of society. Social elevation can only be accomplished by appealing to the understanding, and that will influence the heart." These are the words of Dr. Draper; not of him alone, but of many of the most advanced intellects of the age, and to their truth we entirely and unreservedly subscribe. Dr. Draper does not think missions or missionaries have accomplished much for morality, but he thinks COFFEE has. "How much has the morality of the world been improved by coffee. It has refined society, imparted innocent comfort to individuals, and peace to many a family."

The defects of the work are, that it appears to be fragmentary, and somewhat overloaded with illustration. There is, too, at times, an effort at writing in what Mr. Arnold would call the Corinthian style. The book shows signs of haste. Otherwise we are certain such sentences as "A Virginia planter grows tobacco"; "I will still farther enforce these principles," etc., would not be found in it.

It is announced that a history of our civil war, in three volumes, by this author, is soon to appear. We earnestly hope he will remember the motto, "Festina lente." Prof. Draper can ill afford to act upon any other, for "Where much is given, much shall be required."

NEW BOOKS.

WE are indebted to A. Roman & Co., No. 417 and 419 Montgomery street, for the following new books:

Poetical Tributes to the Memory of Lincoln. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1865.

The shock which followed the assassination of our good Chief Magistrate was succeeded, as might be supposed, by a popular poetical outbreak. Every country newspaper throughout the Union contributed something to this emotional uprising. It is hardly necessary to say that much of this elegaic and lugubrious tribute was spasmodic and ephemeral. Nevertheless, the Messrs. Lippincott have collected with some patience and industry most of these fugitive pieces into a handsomely printed book of some three hundred pages. Conspicuous among them are the tributes of Bryant, Holmes, Mrs. Howe, Stoddard, the famous penitential offering of Punch, and the excellent response of Alice Cary, perhaps the best specimens of the volume. We are tempted to extract a few verses of the latter:

"What need hath he now of a tardy crown,
His name from mocking jest and sneer to save?
When every ploughman turns his furrow down
As soft as though it fell upon his grave.

He was a man whose like the world again
Shall never see, to vex with blame or praise;
The landmarks that attest his bright, brief reign,
Are battles, not the pomps of gala-days!

The grandest leader of the grandest war
That ever time in history gave a place;
What were the tinsel flattery of a star
To such a breast! or what a ribbon's grace!"

* * * * * *

"The mechanism of external forms—
The shrifts that courtiers put their bodies through,
Were alien ways to him—his brawny arms
Had other work than posturing to do!"

* * * * * *

"Forgive us, then, O friends, if we are slow
To meet your recognition of his worth—
We're jealous of the very tears that flow
From eyes that never loved a humble hearth."

With these are one or two clever anonymous pieces, and some names but slightly known; yet the greater part of the book is composed of impotent wailing and bathos. The London Fun, not wishing to be behind its cotemporary, whom it hitherto had excelled in malignity, has a poem commencing as follows:

"The hand of an assassin, glowing red,
Shot like a firebrand through the western sky;
And stalwart Abraham Lincoln is now dead!
Oh! felon heart that thus could basely dye
The name of southerner with murderous gore!"

Possibly, this poem might have been suggested by sympathy for the dead leader, but, as the poet seems more concerned for the reputation of the South than for the loss of Lincoln, the above will suffice. We have one western poetess asking:

"Why did we take him from fair Illinois?
He was young in her woods, he was fresh as a boy;
Why did we set him in that high place,
And bring all the furrows of care to his face."

and again, being evidently of a suspicious and inquisitive nature:

"Why do we show them the wound in his head,
And say not a word but, 'behold he is dead!'"

We may well ask why, indeed? but the poetess ultimately answers the question:

"We've let him die for us—yes, we've let him die
With his armor all on, as the soldier boys lie:
Not a moment of warning—a message to tell,
And we say he sleeps well—and we say he sleeps well!"

There is a refreshing simplicity about this ballad-like repetition. We certainly think that, under the circumstances, it is well that "he sleeps well" where nothing, not even western poetry, "can touch him further." Less equivocal though certainly no less remarkable, is the following:

"God bless Abraham Lincoln!
A mourning people cry;
God bless Abraham Lincoln!
The sighing winds reply;
God bless Abraham Lincoln!
Is tolled from every spire;
God bless Abraham Lincoln!
Troubles a nation's lyre."

When we reflect that this bland benediction is sustained with variations through twelve verses, we can only say "bless us," and turn to another. A Mr. Boylan tells us that

"Past ages their heroes and martyrs may boast,
The future may furnish a still greater host;
But when the historian the long roll shall call,
The name of A. Lincoln shall tower above all."

But this will do. It is not strange that, as the death of this good man was felt the most keenly by the homely and untutored masses of the country, it should have called forth from them some such crude and awkward expression. It is odd, however, that among the more learned and refined who have classically and extravagantly lauded the honest martyr, there should have been such a lack of that manly simplicity and homely pathos, which was the lesson that his life bequeathed to literature.

[For the Californian.]

"SEEING THE STEAMER OFF."

I HAVE sometimes thought, while watching the departure of an Eastern steamer, that the act of parting from friends—so generally one of bitterness and despondency—is made by an ingenious Californian custom to yield a pleasurable excitement. This luxury of leave-taking in which most Californians indulge, is often protracted to the hauling in of the gang-plank. Those last words, injunctions, promises, and embraces, which are mournful and depressiug perhaps, in that privacy demanded on other occasions, are here, by reason of their very publicity, of an edifying and exhilarating character. A parting kiss blown from the deck of a steamer into a miscellaneous crowd, of course loses much of that sacred solemnity with which foolish superstition is apt to invest it. A broadside of endearing epithets even when properly aimed and apparently raking the whole wharf, is apt to be impotent and harmless. A husband who prefers to embrace his wife for the last time at the door of her stateroom, and finds himself the centre of an admiring group of unconcerned spectators, of course feels himself lifted above any feeling save that of the ludicrousness which the situation suggests. The mother, parting from her offspring, should become a Roman matron under the like influences; the lover who takes leave of his sweetheart, is not apt to mar the general hilarity by any emotional folly. In fact, this system of delaying our parting sentiments until the last moment—this removal of domestic scenery and incident to a public theatre—may be said to be worthy of a stoical and democratic people, and is an event in our lives which may be shared with the humblest coal-passer, or itinerant vendor of oranges. It is a return to that classic out-of-door experience and mingling of public and domestic economy which so ennobled the straight-nosed Athenian.

So universal is this desire to be present at the departure of any steamer that, aside from the regular crowd of loungers who make their appearance confessedly only to look on, there are others who take advantage of the slightest intimacy to go through the leave-taking formula. People whom you have quite forgotten, people to whom you have been lately introduced suddenly and unexpectedly make their appearance and wring your hands with fervor. The friend, long estranged, forgives you nobly at the last moment, to take advantage of this glorious opportunity of "seeing you off." Your bootmaker, tailor, and hatter—haply with no ulterior motives and unaccompanied by official friends—visit you with enthusiasm. You find great difficulty in detaching your relatives and intimates from the trunks on which they resolutely seat themselves, up to the moment when the paddles are moving, and you are haunted continually by an ill-defined idea that they may be carried off, and foisted on you—with the payment of their passage, which, under the circumstances, you could not refuse — for the rest of the voyage. Acquaintances will make their appearance at the most inopportune moments, and from the most unexpected places—dangling from hawsers, climbing up paddle-boxes, and crawling through cabin windows at the imminent peril of their lives. You are nervous and crushed by this added weight of responsibility. Should you be a stranger, you will find any number of people on board, who will cheerfully and at a venture take leave of you on the slightest advances made on your part. A friend of mine assures me that he once parted, with great enthusiasm and cordiality, from a party of gentlemen, to him personally unknown, who had apparently mistaken his state-room. This party—evidently connected with some fire company—on comparing notes on the wharf, being somewhat dissatisfied with the result of their performance, afterward rendered my friend's position on the hurricane deck one of extreme peril and inconvenience, by reason of skilfully projected oranges and apples, not unaccompanied with invective.

Yet there is certainly something to interest us in the examination of that cheerless damp closet, whose painted wooden walls no furniture or company can make habitable, wherein our friend is to spend so many vapid days and restless nights. The sight of these apartments, yclept state-rooms—Heaven knows why, except it be from their want of coziness—is full of keen reminiscences to most Californians who have not outgrown the memories of that dreary interval when, in obedience to Nature's wise compensations, homesickness was blotted out by seasickness, and both at last resolved into a chaotic and distempered dream, whose details we now recognize. The steamer chair that we used to drag out upon the narrow strip of deck and doze in, over the pages of a well-thumbed novel; the deck itself—of afternoons, redolent with the skins of oranges and bananas—of mornings, damp with salt-water and mopping; the netted bulwark, smelling of tar in the tropics, and fretted on the windward side with little saline crystals; the villainously compounded odors of victuals from the pantry, and oil from the machinery; the young lady that we used to flirt with, and with whom we shared our last novel, adorned with marginal annotation; our own chum; our own bore; the man who was never seasick; the two events of the day, breakfast and dinner, and the dreary interval between; the tremendous importance given to trifling events and trifling people; the young lady who kept a journal; the newspaper, published on board, filled with mild pleasantries and impertinences, elsewhere unendurable; the young lady who sang; the wealthy passenger; the popular passenger; the—

[Let us sit down for a moment until this qualmishness, which such associations and some infectious quality of the atmosphere seems to produce, has passed away. What becomes of our steamer friends? Why are we now so apathetic about them? Why is it that we drift away from them so unconcernedly, forgetting even their names and faces? Why, when we do remember them, do we look at them so suspiciously, with an undefined idea that, in the unrestrained freedom of the voyage, they became possessed of some confidence and knowledge of our weaknesses that we never should have imparted? Did we make any such confessions? Perish the thought. The popular man, however, is not now so popular. We have heard finer voices than that of the young lady who sang so sweetly. Our chum's fascinating qualities, somehow, have deteriorated on land; so have those of the fair young novel-reader, now the wife of an honest miner in Virginia City.]

—The passenger who had made so many trips, and exhibited a reckless familiarity with the officers; the officers themselves, now so modest and undemonstrative, a few hours later so all-powerful and important—these are among the reminiscences of most Californians, and these are to be remembered among the experiences of our friend. Yet he feels as we all do, that his past experience will be of profit to him, and has already the confident air of an old voyager.

As you stand on the wharf again, and listen to the cries of itinerant fruit vendors, you wonder why it is that grief at parting and the unpleasant novelties of travel are supposed to be assuaged by oranges and apples, even at ruinously low prices. Perhaps it may be, figuratively, the last offering of the fruitful earth, as the passenger commits himself to the bosom of the sterile and unproductive ocean. Even while the wheels are moving and the lines are cast off, some hardy apple merchant, mounted on the top of a pile, concludes a trade with a steerage passenger—twenty feet interposing between buyer and seller—and achieves, under these difficulties, the delivery of his wares. Handkerchiefs wave, hurried orders mingle with parting blessings, and the steamer is "off." As you turn your face cityward, and glance hurriedly around at the retreating crowd, you will see a reflection of your own wistful face in theirs, and read the solution of one of the problems which perplex the California enthusiast. Before you lies San Francisco, with her hard angular outlines, her brisk, invigorating breezes, her bright, but unsympathetic sunshine, her restless and energetic population; behind you fades the recollection of changeful but honest skies; of extremes of heat and cold, modified and made enjoyable through social and physical laws, of pastoral landscapes, of accessible Nature in her kindliest forms, of inherited virtues, of long-tested customs and habits, of old friends and old faces—of HOME!

NEW BUILDING FOR THE MERCANTILE LIBRARY.—The want of larger and more independent accommodations for this Association has long been seriously felt. An institution of so much importance and public benefit, as the principal library of the principal city of our State—a literary resort for all classes—and reckoned as one of our foremost claims to civilization and enlightenment, should have a proper and commodious building of its own, and one adapted to its requirements solely. It is with some satisfaction, therefore, that we observe that the Board of Trustees have lately taken action in the matter, and that they now propose to raise the amount required, by the sale of life memberships and the soliciting of donations. They hope to raise $20,000 by the sale of two hundred life memberships, at the rate of $100 each, and we trust that our citizens will not allow such an opportunity for good investment to pass unheeded, even if they do not subscribe through public spirit. A new library building, larger reading rooms, and increased facilities for literary culture and the highest form of recreation, are advantages that cannot be too highly prized or too liberally compensated.

THEATRICAL TALK.

ON Monday, at Maguire's Opera House, Mr. Daniel E. Bandmann appeared in the character of "Hamlet." The house was filled to its utmost capacity, and scores testified to the appreciation in which the works of Shakspeare are held in San Francisco, by standing throughout the whole performance. Mr. Bandmann's impersonation is different, in many respects, from others which have been witnessed on the San Francisco stage. Mr. Daniel E. Bandmann, in many instances, satisfied the unhealthy craving for new readings and new conceptions of Shakspeare which has risen of late. Because a reading is new it by no means follows that it is better than or even as good as that which has been accepted on the stage for the last hundred years. Some of Mr. Bandmann's readings were decidedly bad, and he can scarcely be said to have given us an improved edition of Hamlet. In his address to the ghost his reading is far better than in many other portions of the play. Most actors read:

"I'll call thee, Hamlet,
King, father, royal Dane: O answer me!" etc.

No one can object to Mr. Bandmann's reading it

"I'll call thee, Hamlet,
King father. Royal Dane O answer me," etc.

He thus reaches the climax of his entreaty, the endearing title, "father." This may be admitted to be an improvement; would as much could be said for other innovations on the old style, which Mr. Bandmann has introduced. After the ghost has left him, "Hamlet," as impersonated by Mr. Bandmann, is entirely unmanned, and does not make the slightest effort to disguise the fact from "Horatio" and "Marcellus;" even the jesting words which Shakspeare puts into his mouth are, by Mr. Bandmann, moaned forth in the most agonizing tone of voice imaginable. The words

"Well said, old mole," are pronounced in the same solemn manner as

"Rest, rest perturbed spirit."

The scene between "Hamlet" and his mother is sadly marred by "Polonius" being concealed behind curtains, at the back of the stage, and occasionally thrusting his head forth. After "Hamlet" has stabbed him, and the Queen exclaims:

"O me, what hast thou done?"

Kean, in this character, makes a telling point by rushing back suddenly and delivering the words:

"Is it the King?"

with immense force. Mr. Bandmann slurs this over entirely. Mr. Bandmann's "Hamlet" may be highly original, but it is certainly not so fine a conception of the character as that of Mr. Dillon, while Mr. Kean, by carefully adhering to stage traditions, gave a more consistent and finished whole. On Friday Mr. Bandmann played 'Shylock." Mlle Vestvali appeared on Tuesday as "Lagadere," in The Fool and his Master. On Thursday, in consequence of her sudden indisposition, The Streets of New York had to be substituted for Fazio. This afternoon the drama of Miriam's Crime, which has never been produced in California, will be played; in the evening, Mlle. Vestvali will appear in Planche's romantic drama of the Brigands. On Monday, Mr. G. C. Boniface an actor who has achieved considerable reputation in the East by his Shakspearian renditions, will make his first appearance at the Opera House in the character of "Jack Cade."

On Monday the Academy of Music will be opened under the management of Mr. Dan Setchell, who will be supported by the Worrell Sisters, Mrs. Saunders, Miss Louise Clarkson, Miss Kate Archer, D. C. Anderson, Fred Woodhull, H. Sinclair, J. W. Griffiths, E. N. Thayer, and C. P. Morris, who will form a burlesque and comedy company of considerable strength. The pieces chosen for the opening night are Setchell's specialty—The Dutch Governor—and the Worrell Sisters' specialty—the burlesque of Fra Diavolo. If Mr. Setchell produces novelties in sufficiently rapid succession to keep the interest of the public alive, I should think that he might be successful, with such excellent support as he has, in keeping the Academy of Music open all the winter.

At the Metropolitan Theatre, as there is no probability of the play being suppressed by the Government, as has been the case in England, I suppose Arrah-na-Pogue will continue to draw crowded houses during the coming week. On Thursday evening Mrs. Sedley Brown was the recipient of a substantial benefit, which she was richly entitled to. Mrs. Brown's voice appears to have gained in strength and richness since her stay in California; she sang the prison song most beautifully on the occasion of her benefit.

The funeral of W. Stephenson took place from the residence of his step-father, Col. Stephenson. I understand that the estrangement between Mr. Stephenson and his relatives was not caused by his adoption of the stage as a profession, they having no prejudice against actors, but rather holding them in the estimation which Shakspeare accounts them worthy of. I hope, therefore, that Col. Stephenson will not have their ill report through the assertion which I made last week.

TOUCHSTONE.

THE DEPARTED CABLE.

BROKE, broke, broke,
On thy cold, gray stones, O Sea!
And I would there were more Connection,
In the thoughts that arise in me!

Oh, well for the Fisherman's Buoy,
That he swings with the breakers at play!
Oh, well for the Iron-Clad,
That she heads for Valentia Bay!

And the stately ship goes on
To the haven under the hill:
But oh for the touch of the Grappling-Hooks,
And the sound of a Click that is still!

Broke, broke, broke,
At the foot of thy crags, O Sea!
But the slender "trust" of a day that is dead
Will ever "go back" on me!

[Mrs. Grundy.

MAN MAGNIFIED.

THE flea magnified, until he looks as large as an elephant, and as ugly as a crawfish, is an old friend with all sight-seers. Neither are such marvels of the microscope, as the terrible combat displayed in the circle of light on the walls of the Polytechnic Institution—where animals, like all sorts of tigers and snakes, beetles and flying fish, dart and twist and jerk, in all directions—unfamiliar even to juvenile and nervous spectators. These are amongst the chosen subjects for popular illustrations. But far more startling objects may be seen through the lenses nearer home. Man may be magnified as well as fleas. The fancies of Swift have been paralleled by the discoveries of the microscopist. The rough skin of the Brobdignagian has been shown in reality under the object glass, with other things much more strange than any the Dean ventured to imagine. Nowadays, from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot, every tissue of the human frame has, in turn, become the subject of investigation. The bones on which the body is built—the muscles that move it—the brain that exerts the will—and the nerves that convey that will to each limb—the blood that vitalises and repairs—and the lungs which feed the blood with air—have all been put to the test, and made to reveal their peculiarities.

We need not, to see all this, set up one of Ross's fifty guinea microscopes, or trouble anatomists for specimens. The whole task has been gone through by various medical inquirers, and we have the results told in scientific terms by Dr. Arthur Hill Hassall, in his volumes on the Microscopic Anatomy of the Human Body, in Health and Disease. Without troubling the doctors for terms, let us see what facts they afford us.

No microscope ever was made (nor ever will be made, probably) large enough to grasp any whole specimen of the genus homo at once. You cannot catch a lifeguardsman, or even a Tom Thumb, and put him under the power of eight or nine hundred diameters. But though we cannot magnify the entire animal at once, we can yet examine him in detail, portion by portion. One hair, or one drop of blood, displays the characteristic features of its construction, just as completely as though the whole scalp, or the entire contents of the heart, could be seen at once. Knowing one, we know all.

A small piece of skin, for instance, displays a series of ridges and furrows, having a somewhat scaly surface; between the ridges, little openings are seen. They are the mouths of the perspiratory ducts. Under the surface, and forming the most important and interesting portion of the skin, is the layer in which resides the sense of touch; but if this be valuable, it is even less beautiful, as we see under the microscope, than the scaly cuticle provided for its protection, for it looks more like a dense crop of double teeth than anything else—each tooth having four sharp tubercles. Between each tooth, we see the continuation of the perspiratory duct winding its way deeper into the frame; just as a good farmer places tiles to drain his lands. These fleshy teeth are known as the papillary portion of the skin, and where they are most numerous, there is the sense of touch most keen. On the soft, sensitive hand and fingers of a young lady, looking the perfection of whiteness and delicacy, they are ranged thick and threefold; and so, too, are they on the skilful fingers of the workman trained to the more delicate manipulations of art. In the rough laborer, they become buried under a hard crust of coarse cuticle. The naked eye can easily detect the ridges into which the papillæ are arranged; each ridge being, in fact, two rows of papillæ—two rows of double teeth—but the microscope is wanted, if we wish to behold them in their exact forms—beautifully adapted to the work they have to do, but rougher than the rind of a pine apple, or the scales of a French artichoke, and by no means so picturesque as the scale armor of the magnified flea.

The hair may be called the offspring of the skin: and in health and disease, youth and age, there is a close sympathy between the two. A fine growth of hair, when magnified, might be compared to a plantation of osiers, when the leaves are off: with some differences, of course. Human hair is not perfectly round, as it seems to be when seen with the naked eye; nor is it of the same thickness through its whole length. At its origin in the skin, it swells out into a bulbous form, like a crocus-root, or the body of a young spring onion, before the leaves opened. From this base the hair springs forth, and gradually becomes bulkier as it lengthens. This goes on to a certain point, at which the greater growth is attained; and then the hair grows fine by degrees and beautifully less; until, if allowed its full growth, as on the head of a young damsel, its point is many times smaller and more delicate than the portion near the centre of its length. Some hair is much rounder, more cylindrical, than other; some being oval, and some flatted. The flat hair it is that curls most. Adonis and the negro are, therefore, alike in one point at least. Hairs vary very much, both in thickness and in length; those on the female scalp being, naturally, the longest of all; and those of the beard of men being next in length, and longer than those of the male head. The hair of the female scalp is not only longer than that of the male, but, in proportion to its length, is larger in diameter. The thickest of all human hair, however, is that of the beard of men; and the investigations of this subject tend to justify the assertion of the barbers, that frequently cutting and shaving the hair has a tendency to make it thicker. Every hair has a stem and a root, just as a tree has; the root being bedded in the skin, just as the tree is in the earth. But the comparison does not end here. The tree has bark, medulla, and intervening substance; the hair has the same. The bark (or cortex) of the hair displays a series of scales placed, one overlapping another, just as we see tiles overlap on a house-top. Immediately below this scaly bark we have a fibrous portion, forming two-thirds of the bulk of the hair. These fibres are seen to separate when the hair splits from being left too long uncut. The centre of the hair has a little canal, full of an oily, marrow-like substance, containing the greater part of the coloring matter; black in black hair, brown in brown hair, and almost absent when the hair has become gray. The marrow of the hair, and its two outer coatings, are well seen in a section of a hair from a well-shaved chin. The razor, day by day, cuts it across; it cannot grow longer, so it grows thicker and stronger; and each slice taken away by the matutinal shave looks, under the microscope, like a section of a bone; just as a bone is cut across when a ham is cut up into slices for broiling; whilst the stump remaining on the chin has just the same look as the bone on the section of grilled ham ready for the breakfast table. The primly shaved mouth is thickly dotted round by myriads of hideous hair stumps, with inner layer and marrow all exposed. Fashion, ever since the days of Louis Quatorze, has demanded the daily sacrifice, and men continue to pay it. Happily, they do not see the stumps of their beards through a microscope, or razor-makers would starve.

Fat appears to be a series of little globules, each enclosed in a vesicle. A collection of fat, therefore, is like a series of receptacles, each full of oily matter. The hold of a Dutch or Irish trader, full of well-filled bladders of lard, resembles the material which makes up the rolls of fat that traditionally hang, like robes of office, about an alderman. The consistence of fat varies in different animals, and varies also in hot and cold weather. The fat of an ox or a sheep is harder than that of a pig; that of the human subject being intermediate between two extremes. The quantity of fat secreted varies (as is well known) in different animals, and in different constitutions; the tendency to its increase varies also at different times of life. In man, the unwieldy accumulation of fat usually indicates that he has passed the meridian of life. A moderate proportion of these bladders of oil, however, adds both to health and beauty. Their uses are many. They give softness to the skin, symmetry to the human outline; they are a garment to keep out cold; often (as on the soles of the feet) act as guards against injurious pressure on bones, and nerves, and muscles; and, in certain cases, form a reserve of nourishment, on which the system can draw for sustaining life, when food cannot be taken, or is not to be had. So, if the fat of the frame, when magnified, does look like a portion of the contents of a provision shop, the similitude is as great in fact as in appearance.

Marrow only differs from fat in this respect: the cells are rounder, and it is less encumbered with cellular tissues. Inside a bone, the fat requires, in fact, less tying together than is needed in other situations on the body.

From this partial substitute for food to the masticators of it, is no very violent digression. The teeth, under the microscope, are seen to be made up of three different portions: the enamel on the surface above the gum; the ivory, making up the bulk of the tooth beneath the enamel; and the coating of the fang. The ivory of the tooth is full of small tubes, running from the cavity in the centre towards the outer surface of the tooth. These tubes get finer and finer as they approach the surface, and many of them branch out like little tubular trees. The microscope gives strength to the supposition, that decay of the teeth, with the horrible aches which accompany it, arises from a parasitical growth promoted by a vitiated condition of the secretions of the mouth. The tartar that accumulates on neglected teeth consists of lime mixed with mucus, and the refuse from the lining substances of the mouth. This substance contains, in the case of negligent and dirty people, animalcules and vegetable growths. Imagine a human being with a small zoological and botanical collection between, and round about, the teeth.

We have spoken of the skin, the hair, the fat, and the teeth; all contributing to the appearance of the surface of the body. One other of the materials of which the frame is made up must be mentioned; for, from it all the rest are built up; upon its presence their vitality depends; and, to its brightness and visibility is due that great charm of the beauties of our land—a blooming complexion. We speak of the blood. It seems simply a crimson fluid till scrutinised under the magic glass of the microscopist. Instead of appearing one evenly bright red stream, we see that it is made up of globules, some of which are white, and others red. The white ones, indeed, are largest, and roundest; but the red ones are by far the more numerous. On they flow, whilst life lasts; the red dots being too many in a plethoric alderman, or fox hunting squire; and too few in a pale love-lorn maiden. But in both alike, on they flow through the arteries, like myriads of red and white billiard balls running through a series of tubes.

This revelation of the ultimate forms of living structure may not altogether make up a flattering picture. Man magnified may be less handsome than man seen by ordinary unassisted eyesight. Skin, rough as the bark of an old pine tree; hair, a winter osier-bed; teeth, encrusted by earthy matter; and blood shown sometimes gluttonously rich, and sometimes indolently poor, make no flattering picture for self-satisfied contemplation. But the roughness of the skin, covered by its myriads of perspiratory ducts, teaches the need for careful cleanliness; the hair, tortured by frizling irons and mutilated by razors, suggests a thought as to the purposes for which portions of the frame were thus carefully covered by the Author of all things; teeth becoming sources of agonizing pain, and falling to decay, teach the wise necessity of giving them proper care—both direct, by washing, and indirect, by keeping the juices of the mouth pure by proper food and wholesome temperance. Blood too white or too red warns us against gluttony on the one hand, or indolence or innutrition on the other.

There is not one particle of the vast natural kingdom but has its lesson, if we do but take the trouble to read it. Surely there is an obvious code of morals plainly indicated in this one glimpse of Man Magnified.

HEROINES AND THEIR GRANDMOTHERS.

WHY do women now-a-days write such melancholy novels? Are authoresses more miserable than they used to be a hundred years ago? Miss Austen's heroines came tripping into the room, bright-eyed, rosy-cheeked, arch, and good-humored. Evelina and Cecelia would have thoroughly enjoyed their visits to the opera, and their expeditions to the masquerades, if it had not been for their vulgar relations. Valencourt's Emily was a little upset, to be sure, when she found herself all alone in the ghostly and mouldy castle in the south of France, but she, too, was naturally a lively girl, and on the whole, showed a great deal of courage and presence of mind. Miss Edgeworth's heroines were pleasant and easily pleased, and to these may be added a blooming rose-garden of wild Irish girls, of good-humored and cheerful young ladies, who consented to make the devoted young hero happy at the end of the third volume, without any very intricate self-examinations, and who certainly were much more appreciated by the heroes of those days than our modern heroines, with all their workings and deep feelings and unrequited affections, are now by the noblemen and gentlemen to whom they happen to be attached.

If one could imagine the ladies of whom we have been speaking coming to life again, and witnessing all the vagaries and agonizing experiences and deadly calm and irrepressible emotion of the grand-daughters, the heroines of the present day, what a bewildering scene it would be! Evelina and Cecelia ought to faint with horror. Madame Duval's most shocking expressions were never so alarming as the remarks they might now hear on all sides. Elizabeth Bennett would certainly burst out laughing, Emma might lose her temper, and Fanny Price would turn scarlet and stop her little ears. Perhaps Emily Odolpho, more accustomed than the others to the horrors of sensation, and having once faced those long and terrible passages, might be able to hold her own against such a great-grand-daughter as "Aurora Floyd" or "Lady Audley." But how would she deal with the soul-workings and heart troubles of Miss Kavanagh's "Adele," or our old favorite Ethel May in the "Daisy Chain," or "Cousin Phillis," or "Margaret Hale," or "Jane Eyre," or "Lucy Snowe," or "Dinah" or "Maggie Tulliver's" distractions, or poor noble "Romola's" perplexities? Emily would probably prefer any amount of tortuous mysteries, winding staircases and passages, or groans and groans, and yards and yards of faded curtains, to the task of mastering these modern intricacies of feeling, doubting, and sentiment.

Are the former heroines women as they were, or as they were supposed to be in those days? Are the women of whom women write now women as they are, or women as they are supposed to be? Does the modern taste demand a certain sensation sentiment, only because it is actually experienced?

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM

—OF—

WILD CHERRY,

HAS BEEN USED FOR

NEARLY HALF A CENTURY,

With the most astonishing success in curing

Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of

The Throat, Lungs and Chest,

INCLUDING EVEN

CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last-named and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the "medicinal gum" of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaints is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great the popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry there are commingled with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of

has induced many physcians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

S. H. Finley, M. D., San Francisco, Cal.
E. Boyden, M. D., Exeter, Me.
Alexander Hatch, M. D., China, Me.
R. Fellows, M. D., Hill, N. H.

W. B. Lynch, M. D., Auburn, N. Y.
Abraham Skillman, M. D., Boundbrook, N. J.
H. D. Martin, M.D., Mansfield, Pa.

The proprietors have letters from all classes of our fellow-citizens, from the Halls of Congress to the humblest cottage, and even from beyond the seas; for the fame and virtues of WISTAR'S BALSAM have extended to the "uttermost bounds of the earth," without any attempt on our part to introduce it beyond the limits of our own country

TO CALIFORNIANS AND OREGONIANS.

In future all genuine WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY for the Pacific Coast will be enclosed in a new wrapper which will bear the printed names of both *SETH W. INTERIOR ITEMS.

The Virginia Enterprise says: "A few items will show the immensity of the work undertaken by the Central Pacific Railroad Company, to build a railroad to Salt Lake. To lay the track from Colfax to Salt Lake will require fifty thousand tons of iron, chairs and spikes, and one million one hundred thousand ties. The iron, if all loaded on cars, would make a train twenty-eight miles long, requiring four hundred and sixteen locomotives to draw it over the Sierras, increasing the train to thirty-two and a half miles in length. The transportation of the ties would require three thousand cars and two hundred and fifty locomotives, making a train of nineteen and a half miles long. The iron and ties together would make a train fifty-two miles long.

A new Toll Road has been commenced, leading from Polley's Station, on the Dutch Flat Road, to the Enterprise Mine, Excelsior District, Amador county. The road will be but about five miles in length. Without this road, remarks the Enterprise, machinery cannot be taken into the mines of that region of country mentioned. The road from Webber Lake to Summit City is in a very good condition for the passage of teams, but must yet be made some five feet wider.

The Copperopolis Courier, October 14th, says: An Italian at Murphys met with an accident, from the effects of which he died shortly after. Anticipating a visit from a burglar, he had placed a pistol in a drawer in such a manner as to shoot any person who should attempt to open it. In the morning, having forgotten all about the matter, he opened the drawer, and received the charge which was intended for the robber.

The Montana Post says that Messrs. Taylor and Blodgett were travelling on the road to Salt Lake, about twenty-five miles from Virginia City, in Cedar Cañon, recently, when they were attacked by four men on foot, with blackened faces. Blodgett was killed at sight, two balls striking him, one in the back of the head, and the other in the shoulder. His partner escaped.

The Portland Oregonian, of October 3d, says immigrants from off the plains are pouring into the valley by every possible avenue. Every arrival of the up-river boat brings a vast throng of these fatigued and travel-worn pilgrims. Their dust-begrimmed wagons are almost everywhere to be met with—in the streets and around the suburbs of the city.

The Nevada Transcript, of October 17th, says: Four tons of rock, from the Pacific ledge, Meadow Lake District, were crushed at the French Mill on Saturday last. The quartz paid $53 50 per ton in pure gold. The sulphurets are yet to be worked. Another lot of ore has been shipped, and is expected to arrive in a day or two.

At an early hour, Wednesday morning, G. Brown, proprietor of the National Hotel, on K street near Front, Sacramento, was stabbed under the left eye, with a knife, by a man named Andrew Fleck. A quarrel arose about the payment of a liquor bill, when a fight ensued, in which the injury stated was inflicted. Fleck was arrested.

From the Superintendent, Mr. Pope, we learn, says the Esmeralda Union, of the 14th inst., that the Wide West shaft has attained a depth of 320 feet from the surface. He also states that the company are in good cheer, and are bound to see if there is not something in store for them.

The Red Bluff monument to Lincoln, which was erected a few days ago, is a plain shaft, cut from native freestone, and is about fifteen feet high above the base. It stands in the local cemetery, and bears simply the name of Abraham Lincoln.

The Marysville Appeal, of the 19th, says: We were pleased yesterday to see Gen. Sutter, the old Pioneer, in town, looking healthy and hearty. The General leaves for Europe in a few weeks, to be absent two years.

A Spanish-American child, residing in Alameda county, was bitten by a rattlesnake, while playing in the bushes, Sunday, October 15th, and on Sunday evening was not expected to recover.

It is stated that among the Chinamen who had treasure on board the Yosemite, and were killed, was one who had a check on a bank in San Francisco for sixty thousand dollars, and another who had a check for twenty thousand dollars.

T. Mitchell, one of the proprietors of the Placer Herald, was waylaid by a highwayman, between Colfax and Bear river, lately, and robbed of about $50.

The status of Caleb Lyon, of Lyonsdale, has, says a late Washington dispatch, been determined, and Caleb continues to be the Governor of Idaho.

At Sacramento, on Monday, Joseph C. Townsend, aged nine years, was kicked by a horse near the Tivoli, and died soon afterward.

A quarterly dividend of one per cent. has been declared on the California State Telegraph stock, payable immediately.

The sum of $1,700 has been collected by the Fenian Committee, of Sacramento.

M. About on Newspaper Writing.—It was said that M. Edmond About had broken with L'Opinion Nationale in consequence of the editor's refusal to publish an article jeering the decoration given to Mlle. Rosa Bonheur. This was a mistake. The true reason he gives is as follows: "If by accident any of our readers perceived my silence, I cordially thank him, and make him here my most humble excuses. A newspaper writer has no claim to six months' vacation, like senators and deputies, nor even to two, like judges, lawyers, professors, and pupils. The very name of our profession, journalist, sufficiently indicates that we must always be ready, and work every day. We are like bakers, the slaves of a daily necessity: bread is not more indispensable to the life of civilized men than inked paper. But though one be a newspaper writer, he is none the less a man subject to all of life's vicissitudes, happiness included. If violent emotions do not paralyze the baker's arm, they do somewhat disturb the writer's brain. I think it is better to appear empty-handed than to offer the public the lucubrations of a troubled brain. Is it not better to say nothing than to utter nonsense? I knew a writer who rose early in the morning the day after he was married, and who wrote all day long until evening. [The writer alluded to was M. About himself. His contributions to the Revue Contemporaine were its chief attraction.] It was absolutely necessary. The newspaper or review reckoned absolutely upon him. It said to him that he alone was able to save a publication in very infirm health. As may readily be believed, he saved nothing at all, and very probably what he wrote that day had not a grain of common sense in it. Let a man exert himself as he may, he cannot draw from his mind aught but what is in it. Now it sometimes happens that a sentiment or an idea so invades our mind as to drive everything else out of it. Happiness is like a king who condescends to enter a poor man's house—there is room for nobody but him. So this happy, poor fellow, whose history I relate to you, was obliged to talk of everything except that which filled his heart and head. I think the exertion is still more difficult when one is called on to write near a new cradle. Although true hearts never become indifferent to public affairs, we see things which touch us nearest occupying the first place. It is not selfishness; it is optics. Put your hand before your eyes; you can perceive nothing in the chamber. Interpose a little head in a tiny cap between the world and you, you will witness a beautiful phenomenon, which astronomers have not yet studied—the total eclipse of the world."

Sights in China.—After inspecting shops, and elbowing, and being elbowed in the crowd, till afternoon, when I was ready to drop with heat and fatigue, my pilot steered me to a small square, flagged with stone, on which the sun shone fiercely. He called it "beggar square," and told me that all the destitute and abandoned sick in the city crawled, if they could, to this spot, because those who died there received burial at the expense of government. While he spoke, my eyes were fixed upon some heaps of dirty, tattered clothes upon the ground, which presently began to move, and I discovered, to my horror, three miserable creatures, lean and covered with odious filth, lying in different stages of their last agony, on the bare stones, exposed to the burning rays of the sun. They came here to die, and no one heeded them, or gave them a drop of water or morsel of food, or even a little shelter from the noontide glare. I had seen shocking things of this kind in India, but nothing so horrible. To insure a climax of disgusts, my guide led me straight to a dog-butcher's shop, where several of the nasty fat oily carcasses of those animals were hanging for sale. They had not been flayed, but dangled there with their smooth shining skins, which had been scalded and scraped clean of hair, so that at first I took them for sucking pigs. There were joints of dog, ready roasted, on the counter; and in the back of the shop were several cages in which live dogs were quietly sitting, lolling their tongues out, and appearing very unconcerned. I saw several cats also in cages, looking very demure; and, moreover, I saw customers, decorous and substantial-looking householders, inspect and feel the dogs and cats, and buy those which they deemed fittest for the table. The cats did not like being handled, and mewed loudly. "What cappen think o' that?" said my guide. "Cappen, s'pose never eat dog?—dog very good, very fat, very soft. Oh, number one dinner is dog!" "And are cats as good?" I asked. "Oh, Chinaman chowchow everything. Chowchow plenty cat. Chinamen nasty beast, I think, cappen, eh?" My cicerone had been so long mixed up with European and American ship captains and missionaries, that he had learned to suit his ideas to his company, if his ideas had not actually undergone great modification, as is the case in India with those educated natives of the present day, known to us as specimens of "Young Bengal."—All The Year Round.

The famous rose-tree, planted a thousand years ago, by the Emperor Louis le Débonnaire, in the eastern choir of the cathedral at Hildersheim, it is said, has been in particularly fine bloom this season, and looks fresher and greener than ever.

LITERARY NOTES.

Ruskin's new volume, under the provokingly affected title of Sesame and Lilies, has been published. It consists of two lectures, delivered last year at Manchester, England. The first, entitled "Of King's Treasures," answers the questions "How, What and Why to Read?" and is full of suggestive matter. The second, "Of Queen's Gardens," is a beautiful tribute to Woman, and abounds in delicate interpretative criticism of some of the ideals of womanhood found in the great poets. Both aim at the improvement and elevation of human character. The volume is characteristic of Ruskin, and will be read with pleasure if not always with assent.

With the new year a new magazine will appear under the auspices of the publishing firm of Moxon, Loudon; its specialty will be poetry. Mr. Cholmondely is to be the editor, and it is said that Tennyson, Browning and other less known poets will be numbered among the contributors. Moxon's Magazine will be the title.

Thomas Carlyle is at present in England, on a visit at the residence of Henry Inglis, Esq. He is in search of relaxation and rest, his Life of Frederick the Great having involved the investigation of years, and well-nigh the health of the illustrious author.

Longfellow is occupied with the notes for his translation of Dante's great poem. The whole work of translation of is finished. but as the notes will be very full, the publication is delayed until the entire body of illustrative matter is finished.

Mrs. Childs has put into her publishers' hands a new book great interest which will soon be issued. It is understood to be a biographical and anecdotal volume of special import to the present state of our country.

The principal manager of the London Index, the rebel organ lately defunct, was Hery Hotze, who, like Henry Werz, is Swiss by birth. He was formerly editor of a paper in Alabama. These two natives of the Free Republic performed most efficient service to their masters.

The London University has decided to grant a degree of "Literary Doctor." Those who are selected for this honor will be entitled to write "L. D." after their proper names.

Newspapers must be cheap in New Orleans; the Delta establishment was sold at auction for $5,200. Five years ago the same paper would have brought at least ten times that amount.

Bayard Taylor will spend the summer of 1866 in Europe, visiting the relatives of his wife in Germany, and in making a tour of Spain and Portugal He will have a new novel ready for the press before the autumn sets in.

Emerson is preparing a series of essays for the Atlantic Monthly. Prof. Holmes and Mrs. Stowe are also occupied in the preparation of good things for the same periodical.

An English paper will shortly be started in Paris, as a rival to Galignani's Messenger. It is to cost five sous, and will contain all the London news of the previous evening.

It is stated that William Chambers, of Glenormiston, the head of the well-known publishing firm, will be proposed as the next lord-provost of Edinburg.

Lowell is carrying through the press a second series of his Biglow Papers, adding much that is new and timely to them.

The work upon which Mr. and Mrs. Agassiz have been engaged recently, Seaside Studies, is nearly ready for the press.

Gen. Wm. H. Morris, having been honorably mustered out of service, has returned to literary pursuits.

Brownell's poems are soon to be issued by Ticknor & Fields.

A book entitled A Summer in Skye, by Alexander Smith, will be issued shortly from the press of Ticknor & Fields.

M. Renan's work on St. Paul will soon be published.

"2:19" Beaten.—This, the fastest trotting time by Flora Temple, was beaten, at Baltimore, by the young Hambeltonian colt Dexter, who made the mile in 2:18 3-4, being matched to beat Flora's celebrated time. E. W. Teackle, of this city, is half owner of Dexter.

Mosgrove & Blakely's new Dry Goods Store is in Colton's building, 222 Third street, between Howard and Tehama. Their stock consists in part of the following goods, all of which will be found to be of the very best materials, and at prices which must command the notice of purchasers: Dress Goods—a large assortment tastefully selected. Their Empress Cloths, Poplins, Melanges, Chenes, and particularly that rich new fabric, "Moonlight on the Lake," cannot be surpassed for Ladies' Fall and Winter Suits. Hoyle's genuine English Calicoes. Irish Linen Goods—all from the celebrated manufacturers, Richardson Sons & Owden, Belfast. Mission and Eastern Blankets and Flannels. Ladies and Gents' Furnishing Goods; and a large assortment of all goods usually kept by a first class Dry Goods Store.

A Month of Sensations.—Gentlemen are wondering and admiring the delightful smoothness and purity of the complexion and skin of our ladies on the streets. It is owing to the fact of their using Davidson's Circassian Bloom.

AN INTERESTING LETTER.

Very few persons, even among physicians, would have been willing upon any terms to have been in the condition of the writer of the following letter on the 14th of February last. I will anticipate somewhat his report of the facts, by saying that on the 15th August, 1865, he made me a visit, "the very picture of health." Time, which tries and proves all things, has sufficiently tested this case, and shown that neither relapse or collapse having followed, the cure is perfect, and can be cited among the scores of similar cases, the result of my improved mode of treating disease without medicine.

G. M. BOURNE,
Water Cure Physician,
No. 10, Masonic Temple, Post street.

August 27, 1865.

Sacramento, April 30, 1865.

Dr. G. M. Bourne—Dear Sir: It is with pleasure and satisfaction that I now let you know of my good health. Looking back on what I have passed through, it seems as if I was lifted from the grave, and I think it my duty to acknowledge to you and the world the benefit I derived from water treatment as administered by you in your celebrated baths. It was in August, 1864, when disease developed itself with a severe cough. I then took medicines, getting worse, with chills, fevers, loss of strength, and was pronounced consumptive. This set me to thinking, and finally I determined to leave my business and go to the Sandwich Islands, having been informed that I could not be cured here. I went to San Francisco, and while waiting for a ship, called upon Dr. Bourne, who stated that a trip to the Sandwich Islands would probably result disastrously, was wholly unnecessary, as I could then be speedily cured at his establishment. I placed myself under his treatment, and in one week was so much improved that I thought I could risk returning home and to my duty as Engineer on the Central Pacific Railroad. The doctor objected; but I thought I knew better, and returned to my duty. In about two weeks my cough returned, and I kept getting worse, and, contrary to Dr. Bourne's injunction never to take medicine again, committed that folly, and soon was so completely run down that I could scarcely walk; so, as a last resort, I concluded once more to try the Water Cure. I went to San Francisco—few of my friends expected me to return; in fact, I thought my return doubtful. On arriving at Dr. Bourne's establishment (February 14, 1865,) I was not able to get into the bath without assistance, but in a few days I began to gain. I remained with him only six weeks, when I left, "a wiser and a better man," without the aid of medicine. I have now been at work several weeks, and find that I am gaining every day, and at present bid fair to be stouter than ever before. Persons visiting the Doctor's establishment will find it just what it should be, in both Ladies' and Gentlemen's Departments, and I cannot say too much in praise of the Doctor's kind attention to his patients.

This letter I write for the benefit of the afflicted, to be used as the Doctor decides, and should it be the means of directing any one to his care and treatment who (as they assuredly will) find relief, I will be paid for my trouble. Your obedient servant,

JAMES CAMPBELL,
Engineer Central Pacific Railroad.

San Francisco, August 25, 1865.

Advised by the undersigned, Mr. James Campbell, of the Central Pacific Railroad (who was then in a most deplorable state of ill health,) placed himself under the care of Dr. Bourne, the Water Cure Physician. Some six months or more afterward he visited this city, when I accidentally met him at Dr. Bourne's establishment, and, I am happy to say, restored to the enjoyment of good health and in fine spirits. JOHN SULLIVAN.

☞ Dr. Bourne treats all diseases of the throat, chest, and lungs—which includes diptheria, bronchitis, incipient consumption, pleurisy, croup, etc.—with the greatest success. Great relief is afforded in advanced stages of consumption. Rheumatism, paralysis, neuralgia, fever and ague, dropsy, etc., etc., are also cured quickly, pleasantly, and economically. No medicine whatever.

Visit Haskell's Mammoth Tea Store, and examine the splendid display of choicest Teas, Wines and Groceries, now selling at greatly reduced prices, at Wholesale and Retail.

Store fronts on Market and Sutter streets, below the Market House. Open every evening until seven o'clock, and on Saturdays until ten P. M

Home Manufactures.—It is the duty of every Californian to give encouragement to the productions of our own State, and, all other things being equal, preference should be shown to our manufactures. Now, in the matter of cloth, things are at least equal, and when we examine the fine suits of fashionable clothing for sale at Quincy Hall, we incline to the idea that our productions have the advantage. This is the pioneer establishment in manufacturing clothing from California cloth, having commenced it in April last. Their work gives general satisfaction, and we are pleased to learn that their business in this line is steadily increasing. Our advice to our readers is, to call and examine for themselves at Nos. 545, 557 and 549 Washington street.—Call.

A Dainty Branch of Art.—A high reputation awaits Mrs. Read for the exquisite workmanship and general adaptability to their purpose of the Ladies' Skirt Supporters and Chest Expanders, of which she made such fine display at the late Fair. Her "Lady's Bust" is another aid to feminine beauty, which confers perfection on the wearer. Mrs. Read's establishment, 109 Montgomery street, is richly worth a visit.—San Francisco Sunday Mercury.

A TRUE STORY.

DEDICATED TO THE SICK.

There dwelt in Sacramento a pale, bilious mechanic,
His muscles were strengthless, his blood it was chill;
And the wife of his bosom believed, in her panic,
The husband she worshipped was hopelessly ill.
Seeking daily for help, in her wifely devotion,
All vainly she tried pill, powder and potion—
Till at last, when a prey to grief's wildest emotion,
Of HOSTETTER'S BITTERS she heard from a friend.

She purchased the cordial, half hoping, half fearing,
A prayer on her lip and a tear in her eye;
And taking his hand, with words kindly and cheering,
Besought him the tonic for her sake to try.
As he drank, a new life through his system seemed stealing,
Each following draft did its mission of healing,
Until, strong in health and most grateful in feeling,
He told the "true story" here twined into song.

It is also proper to state that the Bitters are sold exclusively in glass, and never, under any circumstances, by the gallon or barrel. Imposters and imitators are abroad, and the only safeguard the public have against them is to see that the Bitters they buy have the engraved label and note of hand of Messrs. Hostetter & Smith, and their proprietary stamp over the cork of the bottle.

Dentist Work.—Messrs. Knowles & Clark have an improved method of combining their gold and vulcanite material in the manufacture of dentistry, which renders the work superior in finish and durability. The samples of their handiwork on exhibition at the late Fair were much admired, and we observe that they were awarded a special premium silver medal.—Mining and Scientific Press.

Trimmings.—Mrs. Norcross, No. 5 Masonic Temple, Montgomery street, is prepared to fill orders for civic and military at the shortest notice; also, invites the ladies to call and examine trimmings for Opera Cloaks received per steamer from New York. Mrs. Norcross has a Show Case on exhibition at the Fair, containing goods which for elegance and taste are not surpassed by any other establishment on the Pacific coast.—San Francisco Leader, Sept. 16th.

Dr. C. W. Moore's Medical and Surgical Institute.—In speaking of this Institution, the Sunday Mercury says: "Aside from the most skilful treatment and nursing, the large, airy and elegantly-furnished rooms, will enable the patients to enjoy all the comforts and luxuries of a home. All in all, we regard Dr. Moore and his Institute a most valuable acquisition to the Pacific Coast—the need of which we have long since felt." See advertisement.

Many of the Diseases which hitherto baffled and defied the highest medical skill, are now speedily cured by Dr. H. A. Benton, whose processes of applying electricity receive the approbation of all prominent physicians. The nerves are directly reached, and patients suffering from chronic complaints find almost immediate relief, and rapidly recover their former healthy condition. Dr. Benton is a physician of excellent reputation, and as a Medical Electrician occupies the front rank in his profession.—Golden Era.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

TO THE LADIES OF CALIFORNIA.

IT IS A FACT, which all should know, that

Washing may be Done for Half the Cost,

and in half the time, required by pursuing the method now in use. An enormous waste of time and materials attends the old and ordinary process. And this is not because a better method is not known, but because housewives persist in treading in the beaten track followed by their mothers and grandmothers before them, opposing every change, and refusing even TO MAKE A FAIR TRIAL of these new inventions which scientific research has produced.

If the housekeepers of San Francisco and of the State will try the

California Washing Extract,

simply by way of experiment, they will be amazed to find how much unnecessary labor may be saved by its use. It may be obtained at all the principal Groceries of the city, or in quantities of the Agents, HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN.

The use of the EXTRACT renders "rubbing," "pounding," "washboards," and all the severe drudgery of the usual method quite unnecessary. It thoroughly cleanses, without injuring the clothes. In short, it works such wonders as no one will credit without witnessing them. All that the inventor asks of any doubting housewife is

A SINGLE TRIAL.

The following certificate from the State Assayer, furnished after an analysis of the EXTRACT, speaks for itself:

A. ENQUIS—Dear Sir: I have examined the sample of liquid handed me, and find it free from acid or any substance that would be injurious to clothing.

Very respectfully, B. B. THAYER.

Campaign of 1865!

FIRST PREMIUM
AWARDED THE FLORENCE!
AT THE
State Fair of California,
BY A COMMITTEE COMPOSED OF THE
BEST MECHANICAL TALENT OF THE STATE.

THE REPORT:

"FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE.—After a careful investigation of this NEW AND BEAUTIFUL MACHINE, viewing it as we do in a mechanical point of view, we consider that it is in many respects worthy of much praise, particularly that portion of its mechanical arrangement by which the REVERSIBLE motion is obtained, which is simplicity itself, and in our opinion worthy of special consideration; also, the
COMPLETE AND POSITIVE CONTROL OVER THE TENSION,
as exhibited in this Machine, along with the mechanical arrangement for taking up the slack of the thread, as was shown in sewing without any alteration, and without any stoppage of Machine,
FROM THE FINEST LACE TO FOUR THICKNESSES OF LEATHER.
"Your Committee, therefore, after a close and careful investigation, consider it ONE OF THE BEST AND MOST IMPORTANT IMPROVED MACHINES NOW IN USE.
"We, therefore, in view of the above facts, award it FIRST AND HIGHEST PREMIUM.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

[For the Californian.]

MY FRIEND.

I HAVE a friend who is so true to me,
We may not parted be.

Though I have strayed on to the uttermost,
Yet is his voice not lost.

If I am madly-deaf, for having erred,
Still may I hear his word.

If sin hath slain mine honor, straight appears
The river of his tears,

Wherein I find redemption; tenderly
He woos my fear away,

And searches out some star of hope, above,
So boundless is his love.

When from the loathed grave I shall arise,
He 'll hail me from the skies.

Who else would seek me in corruption's dress
With a so kind caress?

Though I am week, there is a hope of power;
He is my mighty tower.

Like as a flame to fright the gloom away,
He is my perfect day.

I am the homely bulb that tops the reed—
He is the precious seed.

I am the rudest shell the vext waves whirl—
He is the priceless pearl.

Thou art indeed my friend, while ages roll,
O thou, my deathless soul!

"We that have free souls, it touches us not."

HAMLET—Act III., Scene 2.

HOW thankful we ought to be that we do not live in the Dark Ages, when people believed in ghosts, charming, witchcraft, and other absurdities! At the present day people believe in "spiritual manifestations," but laugh at ghosts; and, while they deride the folly of their ancestors, who believed in witchcraft," they acknowledge the truth of the "science" of "electro-biology," or "animal magnetism." A correspondent of the London Times gives an account of the trial of a man of the name of Castellan, at the Assize Court of the Var, in France. The prisoner was charged with magnetizing (not bewitching—such an accusation would be scouted with disdain by any Court) a young girl, under the following circumstances: He went to the house of a farmer named Hogues, pretended to be deaf and dumb, and obtained supper and a night's lodging. In the morning, he persuaded the farmer's daughter, a modest girl of twenty-six, to run away with him; and the indictment alleged that he obtained an irresistible influence over her, entirely by means of magnetism. The Times' correspondent says:

"The moment she came to her senses she was filled with remorse, but whenever he magnetized her, she was a mere instrument in his hands, and submitted to whatever he told her. Three doctors of Toulon gave their opinion in accordance with that of Dr. Tardieu, of Paris, and many other medical men of the highest reputation, that it is possible, by means of magnetism, to obtain such influence over a young girl as completely to annihilate her will. Castellan boasted of his magnetic power while standing at the bar, and offered to magnetize the presiding judge. He actually tried to magnetize the Procureur-Imperial, and frightened him so much that he angrily ordered the prisoner to lower his eyes. Being found guilty by the jury, he was sentenced to twelve years' imprisonment, with hard labor."

What a good thing it is for Castellan that he did not live in the period when silly people believed in witches, wizards, and witchcraft; he would in those days of ignorance and superstition have been burned at the stake for "bewitching" the young girl, instead of suffering imprisonment for twelve years, with hard labor, for "magnetizing" her. What fools our forefathers were! It is wonderful what changes this world has undergone. In former times, men used to be possessed by devils; now, they have delirium tremens. Foolish old women used to pretend to cure diseases by "stroking" and "charming" their patients. Now, professors of "animal magnetism" cure disease by "magnetic passes." Had Castellan been a powerful magnetizer, he could, no doubt, have brought the jury "under the influence," and, by annihilating their respective wills, forced them to bring in a verdict of not guilty. Had his trial taken place in the Dark Ages, the Procureur-Imperial would not have been frightened, as he would have protected himself from the evil influence of the prisoner by having the Court room sprinkled with holy water, and placing a Bible with two straws, in the form of a cross, and a pinch of salt on it, on the desk in front of him. How thankful we should be that we live in the nineteenth century. Our poor, benighted forefathers did not know that what they called "witchcraft" was simply "animal magnetism," and the persons whom they foolishly supposed to be "wizards" and "witches" merely "professors of electro-biology." If they had, how much happier they would have been!

THE cattle plague is sweeping over the continent of Europe and causing more alarm and uneasiness than the cholera. An International Veterinary Congress is being held at Vienna to consult what measures should be taken to stop the progress of the Rinderpest, and the London papers have sent special correspondents to report its proceedings. The cattle plague really causes John Bull far more uneasiness than the Fenian insurrection. The roast beef of old England is in danger. The unhealthy political condition of the land of bulls causes John Bull no anxiety—his word for it—but he thinks he can cow the Irish with an extra police force; the cow herds of England mourn their sickly herds. If beef continues to rise in price, the beef-eaters who guard the Tower of London, will be set upon by the hungry populace. The French sneer at John Bull for his ridiculous prejudices against horseflesh and other articles of food which they believe perfectly as good "as flesh of muttons, beefs, or goats." Jean Crapaud just now, is much delighted with a certain plump and nutritious kind of snail which is cultivated as carefully as oysters, eaten more eagerly, and declared to be twice as nutritious. While Jean Crapaud cares little for the scarcity of beef, and contentedly eats his snails, John Bull bites his nails savagely, and groans over beef being a shilling a pound.

THE Bulletin was unfortunate on Monday. It placed the editorial comment, "very doubtful," against the telegraphic dispatch stating that John Mitchell had been unconditionally released at the request of the Fenians. The Bulletin has ever since been "very doubtful" as to the course it should pursue with regard to the Fenian movement; it has hitherto discouraged it; but circumstances alter cases, and we should not be the least surprised if, some of those fine days, the Harp of Erin were seen flying on the top of the Bulletin office, and the proprietors appeared wearing the green.

THE iron-workers of this city held a meeting last night, at Dashaway Hall, to settle definitively the question of what was the form of circulating medium best suited for California. The iron-workers unanimously declared themselves in favor of metal. "No paper money for California" was their watch-word. "Banks are as liable to burst as boilers!" cried the boiler-makers. These mechanics are men of iron will; they have declared that the Specific Contract Act shall not be repealed—so the matter may be considered settled.

THE Quiver, a London illustrated paper, is advertised as being "on fine-toned paper." This wonderful fact is repeated twice in the advertisement; the proprietors hope to produce a favorable impression by "printing the Quiver on Fine-Toned Paper." What does it mean? Does this "fine-toned paper" consist of sensitive pages which it is easy to make an impression on, and put in a quiver, or is it intended to suit the fine tone of the class among which the Quiver is expected to circulate.

IN the September number of Temple Bar, is an article on the subject of pre-Adamite man, in which mention is made of pre-Adamite manufactures which have been discovered in Switzerland. A number of villages have been discovered at the bottom of Swiss lakes. The writer after giving an account of implements of stone, horn, and bone being discovered among the remains of a village at the bottom of Lake Moosedorf near Berne, continues:

"At Wangen, near Stein, the relics discovered were still more curious. Here hatchets of serpentine and greenstone were found, and arrow-heads of quartz; specimens of cloth too, not woven, but plaited, the material seemingly flax. Professor Heer has discovered masses of half-burnt wheat—the wheat of two varieties; barley also: round flat cakes of bread; carbonized apples, pears; stones of the wild plum; seeds of the raspberry and blackberry, beech-nuts and hazel-nuts—the latter in profusion. The discovery of these lake-dwellings, then, has proved the existence of man in times belonging to the present geological period: that is to say, since our planet has assumed its present consolidation and outline; yet so far as relates to the Danish peat records, and the Swiss lake villages, at times before the earliest historical notice."

It will no doubt appear terrible to some persons, that it has been actually proved that at the time when Eve used fig leaves to make aprons "cloth, not woven but plaited, the material seemingly flax," was in existence. More terrible still, is the theory of "natural election" as expounded by Mr. Darwin, which, if we understand it right, traces the origin of the human race to a cabbage or some other vegetable which was, in course of time, developed into an animal, and the animal at length developed into man. Bah! That cannon ball and fossil carrot and fossilized prime Havana cigar discovered in Nevada, knock his development-theory sky high. This continent is ahead of the rest of the world in geological discoveries as well as in everything else. If man ever was a cabbage, it was so many millions of years ago, that he ought, by this time, to have got over his greenness. We believe that long before Adam was created, pre-Adamite men puffed their pre-Adamite cigars, and had their pre-Adamite boots cleaned by pre-Adamite boot-blacks. Those old fogies in Europe will go on digging among the ruins of lacustrine dwellings, and cackling like a young pullet who has laid her first egg when they discover a stone arrow-head or a pre-Adamite doughnut. Let them come over here if they wish to make really important discoveries. They'll never find any pre-Adamite cannon balls and cigars in Europe; it takes Californians to discover them. The excavations in the Star Spangled Banner ledge are being carried on with the greatest energy, and it would not cause us the least surprise to hear of the discovery of a pre-Adamite sewing machine. We have no opinion of Mr. Darwin. We do not believe Bishop Colenso would approve of his attempt to prove that man should look upon vegetables as distant relations. "Probably," he says, "there does not exist one organized species, whether animal or vegetable, that is not in some way correlated with all other species, though the links of correlation are not often manifest." It is certainly more comfortable for man to believe in Adam and Eve as the founders of the present human race, than to look upon himself as a cucumber in an advanced stage of development, having attained his present position by passing through the intermediate states of fish, bird, and beast. We await with intense anxiety the discovery of the pre-Adamite sewing machine in the Star Spangled Banner ledge, to support our theory that the present race of men are the successors of a race equal to them in the arts of civilization, and explode Mr. Darwin's degrading theories of spontaneous generation, and subsequent "natural election."

THE French fleet had a magnificent reception at Portsmouth; among the ships drawn up in line to salute the French vessels, was Nelson's old ship the Victory. In spite of the entente cordiale between the two nations, it is doubtful whether the French appreciated the honor paid them by the presence of the Victory; they had seen that vessel before.

GEO. W. MATSELL, of the New York Police Gazette, has been sued for libel by a member of the bar, whom he called a "mutton-headed lawyer." "Mutton-head" is not a proper epithet to apply to a lawyer; there is generally nothing sheepish about a member of the bar; but, to call one a bar lamb would scarcely constitute a libel, we should imagine. We don't believe the member of the bar will recover damages.

THE English Government, to raise Internal Revenue, tax servants. "An English paper says the duty last year on servants was £211,487 3s. 4d." It is to be hoped that, as the Government was not done out of its duty, the servants did their duty. Many English flunkies appear to consider themselves duty free, and ought to be so considered by the Government.

WE notice "Decker pianofortes" advertised in a New York paper. We should think a rival manufacturer might successfully oppose these by advertising "Two-decker pianofortes."

TREM.

MIZZEN-TOP MUSINGS.

THE staunch old ship Good Cheer lies at her wharf. She has comé in from a long and tedious voyage, during which she has met with unusual buffetings, and she now seems resting from her toil and danger, and recruiting her energies for another adventurous tour of the world. As some old gentleman, when wearied with his long tramp through crooked, crowded, and dusty streets, rejoices to reach his home, and there, in order to enjoy his leisure to the utmost, unbuttons his coat and vest, stretches out his legs, and rests his aching head against the wall, so does it seem to me that the ship Good Cheer has determined to make the most of a few short weeks of inactivity, and has thereto placed herself in negligent attitude and attire: stripping off her sails, folding up her bowsprit and studding-sail booms, loosening her rigging, opening her hatches, as though for breath, and throwing out upon the wharf the heavy cargo which for months has held her head pressed down into the waves.

It is a pleasant sight to see the old ship again, even under the negligent air of easy contentment. She is far from being in trim order, to be sure; nor does she appear to the same advantage as when, "once upon a time," I was wont to watch the spray fly to either side, as she dipped into the brine, or, leaning against the bulwarks, gazed upon the graceful swell of the distended sails, enjoying, all the while, the pleasant rolling motion. She lies now almost as lifeless as the dingy warehouses which line the shore. She floats in a pool of unhealthy-colored water, in which the sport of dolphins and albicores is usurped by the rotation of a wretched circle of cocoanut-husks, chips, and half-decayed lemon-rinds. Men, in miserable little punts, bump up against her sides, and she has no power to resent the familiarity. Hideous steam-tugs fly past, and snort defiance; but she is helpless as to reply. And, if the truth must be told, her deck is very dirty. But, even in the midst of such discouraging influences, I can recognize here and there a trait to awaken my old fondness and fill me with pleasant associations of the past. Here, lashed behind the wheel, is the old double cask life-preserver, upon which I have so often sat, and, leaning over, watched the play of the phosphorescent water of the tropics. There is the quarter deck hand-rail, scratched from one end to the other with tallies of unnumbered games of cribbage. And there, up aloft, is the mizzen-top, where I so often sat, and read, or mused, or watched the horizon, in the vain hope of being the first to signalize myself by discovering a strange sail. And now, moved by a passing whim, I leap over the quarter-rail, cling to the shrouds, and begin to ascend. It is harder work than it used to be. Either I have grown more portly and less elastic in my limbs, or else it is the fault of my long-skirted coat and high-heeled boots, which, indeed, are not well-adapted for climbing. But I resolutely persevere, rise from ratlin to ratlin, swing myself clumsily over, and at length seat myself once more upon the mizzen-top as of old, with my right hand grasping the shrouds, and my feet hanging over the edge.

* * * * * * *

Would you like to know, Tom, what I thought of when seated up there? I thought, at first, of you, and that it might have been a good thing for you if you could have been there with me. I fancied that, as we recalled the past, some bright spot might have glowed in your encrusted heart, and made you, at least for a little while, something like the man you were when we two sailed together; for I do not believe that you are yet entirely lost, Tom. It is true that you have changed—that you have become that idol of the world, a practical, unimaginative, business man—that your delight is now in dingy counting-houses and mouldy ledgers, and that your conversation is always upon the price of stocks and corner lots. But I believe that there may yet be a tender spot in your soul—a relic of your other life; and that there are glimpses of the outer world which may yet have power to recall you to yourself, if properly presented to you. Hard and unromantic as your heart has been growing for the last ten years, I do not believe, Tom, that you could have stood on the mizzen-top with me, and have heard me talk to you of past adventures, and have looked with me down upon the deck which once so pleasantly rolled beneath us, and not have thought of something besides the number of chests of tea and barrels of flour our good ship could carry.

Well, you were not there, Tom, and so I will tell you what I recalled. I believe that of late your only reading has been the price-currents, and interest-tables, and that you affect to despise all lighter influences. But it may happen, by some strange chance, that you are at some time placed where you must necessarily see these pages—in a car or stage, for instance—where you can get no stock-lists, can find no commercial friends to talk with, and so must either listen to me or be idle. And if that time does come, Tom, remember that I write this for you, with pity for your present fallen state, and a feeble hope that the only remaining tender spot in your heart may glow once more with something of its old native fire, and burn off the hard crust with which the world will soon smother every spark of pleasant reminiscence forever. And I thought, first, of the time when the brave little ship Good Cheer cast off from the shore and carried us out upon the ocean, which, until that day, we had never seen. Shall I recall that picture, Tom?

We stood together at the stern. Around us, and, like ourselves, gazing towards our rapidly-disappearing home, were a number who were to be our companions for many a month—some friends from our native place; a German, with long, red beard, flat cap, and hooded travelling-cloak; a Frenchman, short and withered; a Scotchman, from the very bosom of the Tweed; and many others. The ship, with her broad sails set square, gayly broke her way through the white-crested waves which hissed madly against her sides, and then fell behind, baffled and frowning. At our right, far off, was a speck—our pilot-boat, already in search of another prize. At our left, a long, low steamer trailed her wreath of smoke through the air. In advance, and rapidly drawing near, was an inward-bound bark, toilsomely beating towards the land, and rolling up and down in the yeasty sea-trough, until we could even see the yellow planking of her deck. Behind, and slowly sinking below the horizon, were the heights of Nevesink, with a few white dots at their feet, where cottages stood, and two white lines above, for light-house landmarks. And, as we gazed, the sun touched the mountain brows, a flood of brightness streamed up from the west for a few brief moments, and then sank into dim twilight; the swift-paced night came on and shut out the sight of our native shores, save where the glimmer of lighthouses began to mark their position, and the blue of the sea changed to blackness, while the waves seemed to leap and hiss more madly, and with a more sullen moan than before. There we stood—sad but excited—with a timorous instinct of dread throbbing in our hearts, and an exulting gleam of courage leaping to our eyes—with eyelids moistened with regret at the fading away of that land which we might never see again, and a secret joy swelling the soul at the thought of the wild and daring life of excitement which our hopes had so lavishly spread out before us. And so the night closed in above us.

Tom, I am afraid that if we once again stood thus together, and saw spread out before us the same rich glories of wave, and shore, and sky, you would only complain of the cold, draw your cloak more tightly about you, and go below.

And now recall a certain tropical night, that even you long remembered. The air was warm, the waves light, and the wind feeble; and our good ship was slowly forging ahead, with a gentle, rocking, lullaby motion. From deck to truck she was one pile of canvas, narrowing gradually to the light sky-sail, which, with every swell, described its little arch upon the heavens; while, at the sides, the studding-sails projected far out, until, as a heavier roll than usual now and then swept along, they dipped their corners carefully in the water. Behind us, the vessel left a trail of fire, as she ploughed up the phosphorescent sea; and, in the distance, the rugged crags of the little isle Fernando de Noronha darkly broke the line of the horizon, and added to the enchantment of the scene. And, above all, the full moon rode the heavens, silvering the waves, gleaming upon the light sails, brightening up the freshly-scraped deck, and even, here and there, tingling with a mellow glow some jutting peak of the old distant isle. Clad in light garments, we sat upon the spanker-boom, and braced our backs against its tightly-stretched sail, yielded ourselves fully up to the romance of the hour. A group of passengers sat near us—among them the German and the Frenchman. Three or four had musical instruments—a flute, a guitar, and that favorite of the seas, an accordion; while there were others who rejoiced in well-tuned voices. The group essayed a lively negro melody; but the strain, though sweet, did not, somehow, succeed, for the quickness of the air was hardly in symphony with the more leisurely dreaming of our souls. But suddenly from the accordion came the first few plaintive notes of the "German Hymn." The player merely rattled a few of the keys, as a forlorn experiment; but the effect was electric: at once it was felt that a chord was touched in every heart—at once all voices and instruments joined in, and the grand old tune swelled grander and louder, stretching over the unmeasured waters in holy concord, and rising in reverential harmony to the heavens, while the old ship herself seemed to catch the spirit of the thing, and to time her gentle rocking in unison. That old tune, written to be sung through the echoing arches of some time-honored cathedral, never yet was pealed forth with more heartfelt fervor than there, in that waste of waters—God's own cathedral; and, as the last strains died softly away over the deep, there was moisture in every eye, for, somehow, it led our thoughts to the home we had left behind us.

Tom, I am afraid that now the chink of gold and the rattle of crisp bank-notes would bring more music to your ears than a seraph's song.

And recall that day before we entered Rio, and how we stood upon the quarter-deck and gazed upon the beetling crags of Cape Frio, worn and rugged, and scarcely less distorted than the surf which splashed thirty feet high at the base! And how we sat upon the mizzen-top in the evening, as, in sight of the hospitable port, we forged slowly up and down the coast, guided by the light-house and the Southern Cross, and awaiting the hour when, with the break of morn, would come the breeze which would waft us safely in. And how, when the morning-breeze had come, we pressed the quarter-rail and joyfully watched the line of shore, as, while we drew nearer, it changed from blue to brown, until palm-trees could be distinguished girting the rounded mountains, and villas nestling at their feet, and forts and shipping appeared, and, at last, as we passed the wondrous Sugar Loaf, we saw the city itself, crouching down amid the hills. And then think of that loveliest, most enrapturing scene of all—a picture which I have often in my dreams seen since—when at night our anchor was dropped in the bay, and we lay before the town. There was no moon, and by the feeble glimmer of the stars we could but faintly see the line of mountain-tops against the sky. Two miles off was the city, lit up as if for a festival. Each side, along the shore, were batteries, marked by three rows of eighteen, twenty, and twenty-two lights, set regularly within their port-holes. In advance of us lay a frigate; upon each side of us were barks, adventurously bound, like ourselves. The soft dip of oars was here and there heard, and the phosphorescent sea was bright with the trails of unnumbered fish, sporting under our stern. We were all on deck—for who could stay below? An awning had been stretched across to shield us from the dew; lanterns had been hung about the rigging, and we broke forth into song after song, the chorus of each of which was gayly taken up by ship after ship, until the whole harbor rang with the melancholy complainings of "Lucy Neal" and "Mary Blane," while the German attempted to roll forth a native ode, but was silenced by the obstreperous laughter of us others, who could not understand the language. And suddenly our noise was hushed; for, from our frigate, the band burst forth with our national anthem. We had all heard and liked it at home, but it never sounded half as grandly as then, when listened to in a foreign country. And as the last strains died away over the water, there came a gentle tink-tinkle here and there, echoed from one ship's bell to another, in every variety of tone, but all invested with the same musical charm. It was the striking of eight bells; and as I recalled this picture, Tom, upon the mizzen-top, I sat for many minutes with closed eyes, and mused upon it.

Do you remember, Tom, how, that night, we conjured up a scheme to leave our good old ship, and, in reckless adventuring, strike across that unexplored country, to meet her again at her Pacific port? We did not attempt it, to be sure; for our hastily-formed resolution soon died away, under the pleasant and luxuriant attractions of the city life; and it is as well that we forbore, since we would probably have never reached the other coast alive. But does it anger you, Tom, to think that there was a time when you did not count the cost of everything?

That was a wilder but not unpleasant scene, when we passed through the Straits of le Maire. We were muffled to ears in shaggy coats, with buttons like plates; for it was very cold. The sun described a very low arch in the heavens, far to the north, and gilded the waves, without deigning to shed any genial warmth upon them. The sea was rough, and the vessel drove so uneasily before the wind, that we were obliged to grasp the quarter-rail to maintain our footing. Upon one side rose the coast of Terra del Fuego, a rounded mass of mountain-land, while, upon the other side, was Staten Land, a pile of giant snow-capped pinnacles and crags, like a crystallized, many-steepled city. The German stood, with one hand upon the rail, trying to copy the outlines of the scenery; but, as the ship progressed, new crags came into view, and old ones assumed other positions, and continually defeated his efforts, until a gust of wind carried off his paper, and, as he loosened his hand from the rail to tear his beard, he lost his balance, and rolled upon the deck, uttering some wonderful, jaw-breaking Dutch oaths. So with the musical passenger, who had come upon deck to breathe defiance through his cornopean, and who was dashed from one side to the other, to the imminent danger of his instrument. And while we shouted applause, the gathering mists rolled down the broken sides of Staten Land—an arch of clouds gathered towards the south, forming a vast semicircle of brightness, streaked with unearthly radiations—the sea and the wind rose higher together in a devil's chorus—the good ship labored more uneasily—the clouds spread out apace, and descended, filling the air with drifting snow—the sun was blotted out—the land extinguished; and so we drove on into the jaws of the great Southern ocean, with no other company than the white albatrosses and cape-pigeons, which wheeled, screaming, to and fro in our track.

That gale passed over before long, Tom, and the sunshine again appeared. When will your corroding heart feel a little of its former sunshine?

Do you remember one day that we passed in Valparaiso? Not in the city itself, however. We had wandered a mile or two off, on the northern side of the bay, and the little white town had become indistinguishably confused in the distance. We could only detect, at the foot of the mountain, the long custom-house, the plaza, the cathedral, a church or two, and, further up the hill, the round-topped cemetery chapel. The rest had become blended into a straggling, undefined line, trailing, like a serpent, along the water's edge. In front of us was the bay, with a few hundred vessels at anchor, at suitable distances, with their sails hanging loose, and their national bunting now and then lazily puffing out from the gaffs, and then, as the passing breeze died away, slowly sinking back into a loose roll. There was an English frigate at one side, and she, alone, manifested life; for it was Coronation Day, and her lines were hung with flags, from truck to bowsprit, while her ports were pealing forth a broadside for a national salute. All other vessels were lifelessly basking in the hot sun, which poured down its hot rays until the air was scarcely a degree less than oppressive. We were not warm, however; for, in our walk, we had chanced upon a little cottage by the bay—not comfortably built, perhaps, for it was of sun-dried brick, which gaped open in various places, but, upon the whole, rendered wonderfully picturesque, by thick vines, which trailed over the roof, and formed an arbor in front, and were loaded down with rich, purple clusters. We sat in the shade of this arbor and ate our grapes, while, now and then, down a sloping road between us, and the bay, came trains of mules with tinkling bells upon their necks. And while we sat and eat, the daughter of the establishment appeared before us. She was a native Spanish beauty—brown as a nut—well formed—with beautifully-shaped bare feet, which her short dress could not hide—and rejoicing in a bright black eye, and pearly teeth, and long, curling hair, which reached beyond her waist. She bore a guitar, and, taking her place opposite to us, sang. What her song was, we knew not. It might have been humorous—it might have been of the lowest kind of Chilian minstrelsy—perhaps it was a love madrigal designed to captivate us. Whatever it might be, we only knew that the strain was pretty and the voice sweet, and that those were tender and languishing eyes which glanced upon us; and we yielded to the fascination of the scene. You said that you would be content to remain for months and years in that rustic arbor, and gaze upon that beautiful bay, and eat those purple grapes, and listen to that soothing melody.

Tom, what would Miss Janet MacNinny, of Gramercy Square, with her Roman nose, her long, straight back, and her two hundred thousand dollars in state-sixes, say, if she knew that her devoted cavalier had uttered such a heresy?

One more recollection. We were far from our ship, and up among the environs of the Sierra Nevada—in a little mountain-begirt valley. Upon each side rose lofty hills, covered from top to bottom with giant pines. In the circle below, our little white tent was pitched, near a pleasant brook, and between the tent and the brook was our fire. Around this fire we would gather—a company of six willing, friendly hearts—sheltered only by the moonlit boughs of the nearest pines, which stretched in friendly protection over us. In the indistinct light we could no longer mark the slender pass which served our valley for an outlet, and, at the first sight, we seemed as though shut in to dwell among those hills forever. But we were careless and jovial; nor did it trouble us that we were thousands of miles away from home, or that we were poor in pocket and shabby in attire, or that the vein of quartz, from which we had expected to reap such profits, had suddenly come to naught. With the mountain life, its reckless, adventurous spirit had come over us; we would plan new enterprises with unabated confidence; and, when we thought of absent friends, we would think of them as though to see them once again required but a quiet stroll around the corner. And as we would pile on the logs to make a ruddier flame, and pull our blankets closer about our shoulders, we would tell our several tales of past adventure. The German, who was still with us, would dilate upon his career in the universities of his own country; and the Scotchman would tell about his native salmon-fishing—and Burns and Schiller would be freely quoted—and still we would sit around the fire, and pile on fresh logs, until the night would be far advanced. There may be greater bodily comfort by a well arranged grate-fire in a tightly-closed room; but no civilized refinements can produce that jovial exhilaration of soul which an evening by a camp fire, in the midst of wild mountain scenery, will awaken.

So you then thought, Tom; but would you think so now? I fear not. You would say that this is all nonsense and foolish romance, and that the real business of man is to abandon all desultory wanderings, and work hard for comforts to be enjoyed in another manner. And you would point to your great stone house and shining carriage, and show me what I, too, might have had, if I had only chosen to do as you have done.

In this you may be partly right, Tom. I will not deny that I may have too much failed in prosecuting some of the great schemes of life, and may have too often yielded my sense of duty to my keener sense of taste and romance. And it must be a pleasant thing to own a great house and a prancing pair of horses. But Tom—dear Tom—while I thus sat upon the mizzen-top and mused, I could not but think that there might be a welcome medium between my listless life and your energetic absorption; and that a few of the pictures in your gallery, or a few of the pictures of rich plate in your closet, might well be exchanged for the ability, once in a while, to turn aside from daily care and enjoy a little of the refreshing spirit of your other days.

* * * * * * *

"Halloa, there!—You, sir!"

I look over the edge of the mizzen-top and see an angry, purple faced mate shaking his knotty fist, as he calls up at me. He is not the mate with whom I sailed, and with whom, upon the night-watches, I shared my cigars, but another newer mate who knows me not.

"Come down from there!" he shouts. "Who the deuce told you to go up? Is this your ship, I'd like to know?"

Slowly and awkwardly I descend, while the mate still continues to swear and shake his fist, and a group of little boys collect on the wharf to laugh at me. I reach the deck, commence an apology, which is drowned by a new torrent of oaths; and I step upon the wharf and walk away, followed by a farewell volley of jeers from the little boys. And so I pass, crest-fallen, along the wharf and up a narrow street, until the great stone warehouses intervene, and the friendly mizzen-top is lost to view.

THE CHEMIST'S CAT.

CELSUS PHIPPS was a chemist, not one of your ordinary men, who put their trust in huge colored glass bottles, and drive a large trade in lozenges. No, Phipps was an experimental chemist, and he acquainted the public with the fact by means of an inscription to that effect over his door, while he confirmed the neighbors in the belief by occasional explosions, more or less violent. One one occasion, he went so far as to blow the roof off his house, but that, he said, "was an accident." Moreover, Phipps was a licentiate of Apothecaries' Hall, and jobbed the paupers at 1 1-d. a head, including pills and plasters. Mr. Phipps' establishment was evidently the home for natural philosophy. Experiments abandoned by every one else were eagerly sought after by Mr. Phipps; and he had a valuable auxiliary in his cat.

When science slumbered, the cat might be seen comfortably dozing on the door-step; but when anything new in medicine or chemistry turned up, the cat had an active life of it. The poor thing had taken poison enough to kill hundreds of rich husbands, and antidotes sufficient to restore double the number. It had a stomach-pump kept for its especial use. You might generally guess when anything extraordinary had happened, by missing the cat from its usual place, and seeing Dick, Mr. Phipps' boy, who had the job of holding it during the experiments, with slips of diachilon plaster all over his face and hands. It had become familiar with prussic acid and arsenic in all their insinuating forms, and had some slight knowledge of the smaller operations of surgery; still it went purring about, and was always at hand on an emergency, ready to have any drug tested on its person. Phipps was proud of it. "My cat, Tom, sir," he would say, "has done more for its fellow animal, man, than all the philanthropists that ever taught people to be discontented."

All went on smoothly till the introduction of ether, when Phipps determined to see if he could extract a tooth under its influence. The cat, of course, was to be the especial patient. Dick was summoned, Tom caught, the ether administered, and Phipps selected one of the largest tusks. But the ether could not have taken proper effect; for, with a frightful yell, Tom freed himself from Dick's grasp, favoring him at the same time with severe marks of his esteem, which made him roar, and disappeared, a la Harlequin, through the plate glass window, doing immense damage to the chemicals and Galencials displayed therein.

But Tom soon came back, for no one would have him. Science, who labels some men F. R. S.'s, or tags half the alphabet to their names, had not forgotten to mark her humble follower, the cat. He lost one ear in some acoustic experiment; one eye was closed forever, from having the operation for squinting practically illustrated some dozen times; and he was lame in one of his hind legs, the tendon having been cut to exemplify the method of operating for club-foot; while his coat, once remarkably glossy, had such a second-hand, seedy appearance, that it would not have tempted a Jew.

At last, he died, a martyr to science. Phipps had invented some wonderful pulmonic lonzenge, containing a great deal of morphia, which was to cure coughs at first sight. Tom had been rather asthmatic for some time, owing to inhaling noxious gasses; so Phipps gave him a good dose to begin with. Next morning, he was found very fast asleep, and extremely rigid in his limbs. Dick suggested that he was dead, but his master indignantly repudiated the idea; so Tom was kept, in full expectation that he would one day start up quite lively, till as length the moth got into his coat, and Phipps was compelled to consign his furry friend to a grave in the garden. Phipps never had his usual spirits again. His experiments were at an end; for, though he would sometimes furtively introduce some drug or other into Dick's tea or beer, that young gentleman soon found it out, and took his meals ever afterward with his mother, who was the proprietress of a veal and ham-pie depot in an adjacent court. Phipps wanders about the College of Surgeons, a melancholy man, and amuses himself dreaming over experiments he would perform if he had another cat! He is not best pleased, however, when he meets any young friend of Dick's, who violates private confidence, by running after him and inquiring at the very top of his voice, "Who killed the cat?"

How a Minister Found the Place.—Not long since, the worthy pastor of one of our city churches, who combines divinity and humor in a woof of wit as bright and rich as "cloth of gold," was called upon one evening by a nameless gentleman, and informed that his services would be required at an early hour in the morning for a peculiar and delightful duty, and took his leave.

Bright and early the reverend gentleman was ready and waiting, when a carriage was driven up by a "sorrel" boy with "freckled" horses, who rang the bell, which was answered by the dominie in propria persona. The following dialogue ensued:

Boy—"Is the pusson 'ere as goes to the cars?"

"No, sir! I am going to a wedding!"

The boy's face fell as he said, "Git in, sir."

"But," remarked the gentleman, "do you know where to go!"

"No, sir."

"Nor do I. Who sent you?"

"Mr. ——, sir."

"Well, go and find Mr. ——, and inquire where I am required."

Off went the boy with the carriage, and in a short time returned, and the conversation was renewed.

"Have you found out the place?" asked the minister.

"No, sir, but I've found out what street he went on; you'd better get in, sir; think I kin find it."

And in he got. After riding some distance the carriage was stopped, the driver got down, opened the door with a most sober countenance, and said, "There's a feller a courtin' a gal here; you might try the place." And the dominie did try it, and found the precise place his services were needed, by two anxious and palpitating hearts, which he quickly bound together in the indissoluble bonds of matrimony. And after the services were concluded, the story was told, and a happier, jollier laugh has seldom been heard.—Buffalo Express.

What a Glassful of Water will Hold.—It is generally thought that when a vessel is full of water, any solid substance immersed in it will cause it to overflow, and such will be the case if the substance is not soluble in the water; but the philosophic truth that in dissolving a body, you do not increase the body of the solvent, may be proved by a simple and interesting experiment. Saturate a certain quantity of water, at a moderate heat, with three ounces of sugar; and when it will no longer receive that, there is room in it for two ounces of salt of tartar, and after that for an ounce and a drachm of green vitrol, nearly six drachms of nitre, the same quantity of sal ammoniac, two drachms and a scruple of alum, and a drachm and a half of borax—when all these are dissolved in it, it will not have increased in volume.

We should observe that the salts used are to be "anhydrous;" that is, free from the water which they take up in crystalization. Nearly all salts can be rendered "anhydrous" by exposure to a high temperature, which dries out the water. It is interesting to observe that during this operation nearly all metallic salts lose their color; the sulphate of copper, for instance, is blue in its crystaline state, but becomes white when "anhydrous."

Another, although somewhat similar experiment, may be shown thus: Fill a goblet with fine cotton wool, now take out the cotton and replace it with water "to the brim," then very gently let the cotton down into the water, and it will be found that the glass will hold both water and cotton at the same time; thus it is twice full at one and the same time.

Observe: In this latter experiment, it is necessary to cleanse the cotton from the natural grease always adhering to it, by first boiling the cotton in an alkaline ley, such as soda or potash in water, then drying it and combing it out into its snowy white form again.

A Subterranean Theatre in Paris.—The fearful heat of summer weather in Paris proves fatal to the purses of all managers of theatrical entertainments. A Dutch speculator, M. Bischoffsheim by name, hopes that he has discovered the secret which will solve the problem of how to enjoy a theatrical performance while Fahrenheit marks 90 in the shade. M. Bischoffsheim has conceived the idea, which he is in the course of carrying out, of a subterranean theatre. Startling as this may read, it nevertheless a fact, as any one who walks along the Rue Scribe can attest, the excavation being commenced at the angle of that street and the Rue Neuse des Matthurini, behind the new Opera. The theatre will cost M. Bischoffsheim the trifling sum of £120,000 sterling, the purchase money of the ground being included in that calculation. The subterranean theatre will not be completed for two years. The pit is to be 24 feet below the surface of the ground; the stage will measure 100 feet in length and 60 in width. It consists of a pit and two galleries, which will accommodate 700 spectators. The theatre itself will be 36 feet high. A circle of iron columns are intended to support the floor of the first tier of boxes. The atmosphere of the pit is to be cooled by several jets d' eau. Five tiers of boxes will rest on the capitals of the iron columns.

ALLAQUIZ.

BOHEMIA REVISITED IN A DREAM.

THE other evening I was present at a literary séance where, perforce, I distinguished myself by a masterly silence; for, in a small room and a general company, five are as many as can, without inconvenience, talk at a time. Retiring home and to bed, I fell into a troubled sleep; and, in my dreams, I went over again passages of old travel. Things took strange shapes. The past, present, and, for aught I know, the future, blended themselves in queer anacronism. The topography of countries, and the aspect of peoples, though weirdly distorted, were identified oddly with scenes which I had visited in my waking moments. For there is a strange omniscience in dreams—a principle of "swan and shadow." The spirit seems to soar far into the empyrean, above the waters of its humanity, while its dim reflection floats darkling upon the surface.

I entered the borders of a country which I, somehow, knew to be Bohemia. I stood upon the bridge, at Prague, at the exact point whence the sainted Nepomuck was precipitated into the river, because he would not divulge the secret of the queen's confession. I looked over to see the familiar statue erected to the martyr; and lo! the Moldau was a stream of ink, and white statues gleamed for miles upon its banks.

"What can this mean?" I asked of a little man who stood beside me.

"Those," said he, "are monuments to good and great men who have been martyred by the Bohemians."

Now this little man would have been a strange sight anywhere out of a dream—or Bohemia. His body was a large ink-bottle, whose stopple terminated in the shape of a Tyrolese hat. His legs and arms were colossal pens with holders, and his face was dexterously contrived out of a large pair of scissors, open and astride a roll of commercial note-paper for a nose; the handles thus forming the sockets of his eyes which were two expressive ink blots. I noticed that all the gentlemen passing us were similarly formed. The bodies of the females, I observed, were bottles of greater length. In fact, I may say that the lady Bohemians were, generally speaking, long-waisted. The holder, forming their right arms and hands, terminated not in a pen as in the case of the gentlemen, but, singularly enough, a forefinger; and this was invariably checkered with ink-stains. They also wore blue paper stockings and waterfalls of curled proof-sheets, scented with vinegar.

"You seem to be a stranger in Bohemia?" said the little man whom I have just described, bowing, taking out his cork—or off his hat, I should say—and disclosing a head of mouse-eaten manuscript hair, parted in the middle.

Answering this question in the affirmative, and innumerable others as quick as I could, to the effect that I was from California, and was not exactly aware how I came to be in Bohemia, he exclaimed excitedly:

"What, from California, where gold flows in rivers! A hero, a hero! Will call upon you at your hotel Will speak to the manager of our theatre, and secure private box gratis. Great card! Sensation! I will not leave you, believe me, sir, I will not leave you!" and, taking out a note-book, he commenced writing hurriedly.

Of a sudden, a horrid noise broke in, which I soon discovered to proceed from the prolonged rattle of multitudinous lunch-dishes and soup tureens.

"That," said the little man, in answer to my anxious inquiry, "that is the martial music of the Bohemians. Behold our new King, Frederick V., Elector Palatine! Do you see his lovely wife? She it was who said she would rather eat brown bread, a queen, than white bread as an Electress. The cavalcade wound along the banks of the inky Moldau, down from the White Mountain which arose above the city, metamorphosed, since my last visit, into a colossal mass of exchange papers. The courtiers all looked hungry; and, strange enough, the queen was eating brown bread. My companion pointed out to me the great Protestant warriors as they passed over the bridge into the city of Prague. I remember only the name of the doughty Prince of Hohenzollern, who wore a magnificently embossed armor of ink-rollers, and rode on a Hoe's printing-press for a chariot.

We followed the cortége till it disappeared in the castle yard. My little man was true to his word. He did not leave me. While walking down the Hoch-strasse which leads from the palace, we were met by the din of another martial band of soup-plates and beer-glasses.

"Those are 'strikers,'" said my self-constituted cicerone. "They are going to storm the palace for higher wages."

As they passed on, I caught sight of innumerable banners, on which were such legends as these;

"No More Poetry for Nothing, and Board Ourselves!"

"Down with Grammar!"

"Hurrah for the Irrepressible (Dramatic) Conflict!"

"Come Down with Your Postage Stamp a Line!"

"What is his line?" asked I, not exactly understanding this latter announcement.

"It is general abuse, now; it will be hemp, hereafter," was the response.

From this mild facetia I learned two things: That the Bohemians do sometimes indulge in bad jokes; and that they do not like one another any better than the world likes them. The procession, in the meantime, disappeared, singing a Bohemian melody, the refrain of which was:

"Stamp, stamp, stamp!"

—and we proceeded on our perambulations. The streets were paved with rejected manuscripts. Like Ariosto's valley in the moon, things lost to the world were treasured here—with this exception: The good Knight Astolfo is represented to have found that folly had been rejected and everything else retained. Here folly was retained and everything else rejected.

We had not gone far when we came upon a crowd hovering lugubriously together on one of the sidewalks. "There must be a funeral here," I remarked, in a low, respectful tone.

"No," said the little man, "this is where a saloon was lately burnt down. You see, we Bohemians are people of regular habits. These persons were wont to come here every morning, between the hours of ten and twelve o'clock; and that is why they stand about mournfully now, like Marius of old, among the ashes of Cabbage."

"Are those people on the opposite corner also disappointed of lunch?" asked I, sympathetically.

"Oh! no," said he, "those are foreigners, called Brokers."

"Do you ever naturalize people here?" I demanded.

"Yes; we sometimes do take in a defunct politician, or "figure-head" editor; but we never naturalize Brokers. They would make poor Bohemians. They have not the requisite honesty," said the little man, bowing and pretending to stub his toe, as he made a futile pass at my watch-guard.

"We will now go to dinner at your hotel," remarked my companion, after we had seen more sights than I dare describe.

"Is it not rather early?" I asked, looking at my watch and finding it just four o'clock.

"Well, no," he answered. "You see, it is always dinner-time in Bohemia."

Reaching the hotel, he posted a waiter to stand guard in front of my room, while I made my toilet and he went to carry his items to his newspaper office, as I supposed. When I came forth, some fifteen minutes afterwards, he met me, seemingly in perfect readiness for his dinner. We entered the dining-room, which was festooned in a most indescribable manner; adorned with bouquets of carrots, clusters of parsnips, etc., etc., and hung round with cages of parrots. "For," said my cicerone, "the parrot is held in great veneration with the Bohemians. That glorious songster holds the same relation to us as the owl did to Minerva—it is our symbol!"

The table was of the finest workmanship of dime-novels, and still-born cloth volumes; and (must I tell it?) I found the Bohemians to be cannibals!—actually living on one another. After a mild poet soup, we demolished several female reputations, with sauce piquante, and devoured the roasted character of several gentlemen, with salad á la she Bohemienne, vinegar unnecessary. By the way, it is due to the truth, to remark that I prefer breast of lamb to the substitute for it, which was put before me. Breast of Bohemian I found exceedingly bitter.

The remains of pens, pen-holders, etc., were cleared away, and we were left to our ink—the wine and life-blood of Bohemians. What was my surprise when a tall gentleman, who was evidently president of the meeting, got upon his pins—no, his pens—and proposed a toast to me, as the generous host of the occasion; hoped, and so forth, that I might be spared to spatter, he would repeat it, spared to spatter broad-cast the dippings from my California gold-streams; and that the sun of my generosity might never be obscured, etc., etc.

The sentiment was drunk with enthusiasm. I was very much confounded and embarrassed, and arose to tell them so. Just as I was going to say something about my being unconscious that I was the "host," or even the guest of all those people, my little Mentor at my side pulled me down upon my seat bodily, by the coat-tails, whispering in my ear, when my accelerated motion had been rather emphatically and abruptly terminated by the inertia of my chair: "It is the highest compliment can be paid a stranger in Bohemia to assure him that he is the 'host of the occasion.'"

I thought to myself, if those people do eat one another, they have pleasant and original ways of paying compliments. The company did not seem to notice any hiatus in my remarks, or their hasty termination. They were all apparently too anxious to say something themselves. While one of the ladies entertained the company with a poem of one thousand and three hundred lines, five feet iambic, my little man, who still stuck by me, pointed out the celebrities of the feast. I noticed all the time that the other people were continually looking daggers at my little man, who was making himself, they thought, unduly conspicuous by monopolizing "the host of the occasion."

"That gentleman there, with his hair parted all over his head," said my companion, squinting through his scissor-handles, "that is Doozleton. He writes twelve columns a week, for which he receives the princely stipend of five guldens. He writes on any subject with equal facility. Like Southey's, his is a 'pen of all work.' He is exceedingly skilful in adjusting a bucket of blood to each column of his sensation stories." This was said in rather a loud voice. Then, whispering in my ear: 'He is an egregious ass. He abused a whole city and State the other day, because one of its citizens would not trust him to free lunch."

I had not extricated myself from the labyrinth of these contradictions, when I observed an antique-looking damsel smirking and smiling at me. In a few moments more, she sent me five stanzas of poetry, which must have been impromptu on many and many such occasions as this. She assured me that I had her bosom "moved"—was the only person she ever "loved." I was her "affinity," rhyming with "divinity," with something about "love at first sight" 'neath the "queen of the night," etc., etc. I repulsed her, as was proper I should in my lonely and unprotected condition. The red ink rushed to the face of my little man of my side. "I blush for you!" he exclaimed in affright. "No one column will hold the abuse you will get in the next week's Literary Spanker."

I am sorry that I cannot give a verbatim report of the speeches which followed the reading of the long poem mentioned above. While one gentleman was speaking, my little man—whom, by the way, I have very properly called my cicerone, since he guided me among the ruins of intellect—eyed me impressively, as he whispered in my ear: "That is Mudquill, who quotes so eloquently, without credit, from an old peripatetic philosopher, named Cornelius Dow, Jr."

"Is there no imprisonment for theft in Bohemia?" I inquired in surprise.

"No, sir, though we have thought some of building a jail for honest people, as the cheapest way of separating them from the majority. There are some, however, who are in favor of following the rest of the world, and advocate turning all the dwellings into prisons."

One Winkleberry, the correspondent of a Vienna paper, was speaking as the company broke up. They took one of his inadvertent pauses as the close of his peroration.

I was so confused by this scene and by the unusual beverage of these people, that I do not remember anything till I found myself in the morning reading the most horrid abuse of myself and my country in all the city papers. But, strangely enough, I took notice that actors whom they had abused most villainously in their speeches were lauded to the skies in their papers. I was musing upon the perplexing idiosyncracies of this odd people, when my door opened, and my little man ushered in the proprietor of the hotel, who politely presented me a bill of four hundred guldens for the entire dinner of the preceding night. It was in vain to protest that I had not ordered any such dinner. My little man and the proprietor both swore that I had. I now fully appreciated my title of "host of the occasion," and in despair felt for my pocket-book, resolved to pay the bill and leave the country immediately.

Pocket-book, watch, chain, tooth-brushes, and combs—all were gone! Now, the rage of the proprietor turned upon my little man, whom he accused of robbing me, before he himself had got a chance. The proprietor was evidently a man of great power in those parts, for he ordered a band of servants to bear my little man away, to be roasted and served for dinner, with cranberry sauce, that very day. And that was the last I saw, and his excruciating howls were the last I heard, of my little man of Bohemia. In the next instant, the hotel was stormed by an infuriated rabble, who clamored for the life of the hated stranger. I looked out of my window upon them, and beheld the identical persons who the night before had so enthusiastically toasted me as the "host of the occasion." Kindly Providence at that moment sent a "balmy" earthquake, and the walls of the hotel toppled and fell crashing upon the mob of Bohemians beneath. I awoke with a start, to find myself almost smothered by a whole file of weekly papers, that had fallen down from over the head of my bed, and with a shuddering prayer that I may never again be made the "host of the occasion," or obliged to revisit Bohemia, even in a dream! ALLAQUIZ.

New Music.—M. Gray, Music dealer, 613 Clay street, has laid upon our table Lascalles' ballad composition entitled, "Ye Swore by Moon and Stars, Laddie," sung by Mme. Anna Bishop. From W. A. Frey, No. 404 Kearney street, we have received the original version and music of "The Wearing of the Green," which has attained such popularity through its introduction in Arrah-na-Pogue.

Papers and Pamphlets per Steamer.—We are indebted to Loomis, corner of Washington and Sansome, for a file of Eastern dailies per Opposition steamer. Also for "Hall's Guide to the Great West," a very useful and reliable pamphlet for the Western voyager and travellers via the Overland route.

LATENT SKEPTICISM.

[We give place to the following communication without indorsing the writer's propositions, which will possibly be met by the gentlemen to whom he addresses his suggestions. If his inquiries tend to create an interest in the course of lectures soon to be delivered, their publication will at least further the immediate object the reverend lecturers have in view :]

I SAW a recent announcement in one of the morning papers. that a course of lectures is to be soon delivered by several of the most prominent clergymen of the different denominations in our midst. It is proposed that each shall present the peculiar tenets of his particular sect; and, no doubt, the projectors of the series, as well as the polemic advocates, hope to enlighten the popular mind upon the knotty problems of "fate, free will, foreknowledge absolute." But the query will suggest itself to the mind of the layman, whether, at the end, we will be any wiser, or any better, or any happier than before. Will these reverend prelates bring us any nearer the great mysteries of life, of death, of eternity?

We live in an age of doubt; the general march of knowledge has left the church in the rear, and we give a tardy assent from habit and early influences to what we cannot believe from conviction. The church has had its day. It is in the sere and yellow leaf. It is being undermined from within and without; and yet the most marked evidence of the vast power that the hierarchy has in past times exercised over the general mind is to be found in its present influence in preventing inquiry in its chosen domains, and, notwithstanding the tardy powers of knowledge are pushing their explorations into all other fields where truth is supposed to be, yet, in this, the most important of all, how few dare go? True, we see stately edifices rising up on all sides, dedicated to the rites of this or that denomination; we see the most eligible pews bid off at high rates, and highly respectable congregations betaking themselves to them every Sabbath, to listen to well-turned sermons from well paid divines, and to listen to delightful music from high-priced choirs, and we thank God we live in a Christian land. We do these things much as we do very many other things, because of custom and habit. But, of the thousands who each week sit under the drippings of our sanctuaries, how many believe without qualification? The burning faith that braced the souls of the early Christians has died out, because its work is done, and because the necessity to germinate the seed of a new civilization in the midst of an effete paganism is past. Yet the men of to-day are as earnest and brave as when Paul preached and died. For pure, simple faith and unselfish courage, old John Brown was undoubtedly the peer of any martyr who ever trod a scaffold. How many apostles and disciples of liberty marched cheerfully to nameless graves, when our Union was threatened by the barbarous hordes of slavery! You need only give men a noble cause, and the blood of its martyrs is poured out like water. But why is it that the Church can no longer marshal its crusaders to battle for the holy places?

Our churches are kept alive, and sustained mostly by women. The sex is emotional, and apt to believe without caring why it believes. Our wives and daughters are gregarious in their habits, and indulge this laudable propensity through the medium of a church organization, with its concomitants of prayer meetings and fairs. The husbands and sons naturally take part, and we are very properly expected to pay the bills. In addition to all this, it is certainly quite pleasant to go once a week to a fine church, sit in a comfortable pew, hear an intellectual man deliver a finished essay, look upon a well dressed congregation, and solace oneself with the thought that a necessary social duty has been well performed; and, to that class whose minds have a tendency to empty themselves, it is absolutely essential to have a fresh supply of ideas every week.

But it is remarkable that, among those who can think, there are few who do not doubt—who are not skeptics. They may attend church service regularly, and may even say and think that the well-being of the community is promoted by a generous support of church establishments; but still, when the home question is put to them, "Do you believe?" their answer too often is vague and unsatisfactory. At the best they give you opinions—seldom convictions. It is the rapid spread of this latent skepticism that is so quietly and surely undermining ecclesiastical institutions, that their eventual overthrow seems a matter of logical neccessity, and by a process so gradual, that probably no one will be able to point to the day or decade when they finally died out, or to define the heresy which destroyed them.

When men believed that all between the lids of the Bible proceeded from the direct inspiration of the Most High, then Christianity flourished in its fullest vigor; as soon as the first inroad was made upon that implicit faith, the decay began. When geology told us that the Mosaic narrative of the creation was a fable, and the demonstrations of the sciences have taught how orderly and uniform are the laws of Nature, and how improbable that those laws should ever have been suspended, to permit the enactment of the numerous miracles detailed in Scripture; when critical analyses have shown the manifest contradictions of the Scriptures itself, where can doubt stop? Can we say, thus far shall we question, and no further? That is impossible. Once the inquiry is commenced, it must go on until the mind reaches some ultimate conclusion. But, in speaking thus of the skepticism of the day, it is not to be understood that the general mind is lapsing into a gross Atheism, and falling back on a dreary and stagnant non-belief. On the contrary, the strides of knowledge having carried us beyond the traditions of the past and the narrow dogmas of the sectarians, who have tortured the original simplicity of Christ's teachings into a thousand meaningless shades of belief, there has resulted a wide-spread, but, to a certain extent undefined, desire to subject Christianity to the same tests that we subject all other problems presented to us for solution—not to be forced to swallow it as a matter of blind faith; and, if it is inconsistent or unreasonable, that it be rejected either entirely or in part, and truth sought in other directions. It is this tendency of the age which has recently found expression in the Essays and Reviews, and Colenso's works. The great popularity of these works is a strong indication of the skeptical tendencies of the times. A half century ago they would have fallen unheeded from the press; or, if not unheeded, would have raised a storm of indignation sufficient to have driven the author from the pale of the church; but, now, edition after edition is bought up, and the reverend authors boldly defy the hierarchy, and this, notwithstanding they have attacked the very foundations of Christian faith, in seeking to disprove the authenticity of many of the supposed facts upon which faith has rested.

It is a melancholy reflection that the Church has become nearly fossilized. In past times it attracted to its service the most vigorous intellects; but now, with here and there an exception, our weakest material drifts into the pulpit, and, as a consequence, we are being constantly deluged with showers of theological platitudes. It is to be hoped, in view of this wide-spread half belief or no belief, that the reverend gentlemen who propose to discuss the specialities of their several creeds, will drop them occasionally, and, forbearing to chop logic upon doctrinal points, will turn their attention to a candid discussion of the many grave doubts that stand bristling upon all sides. Let them go to the root of the question, and, if possible, satisfy their hearers that the Bible itself is to be accepted as the inspired word of the Most High; and why it is to be so accepted as such in all its parts, or which part must we retain and which reject. These are vital questions, of much more moment to laymen than whether this or that sect is the special favorite of our all-wise and kind Providence.

ON THE NATURAL LOVE OF FLOWERS.

THE love of flowers is so universally inherent in youth, that scarcely an exception can be found amongst children; whether inhabiting the confines of our cities, or exclusively nurtured in the country, all have a peculiar interest in the vegetation of the various seasons, as it unfolds its several charms.

We have all of us, in the Spring of life, felt ardently, and with singular enchantment, the vernal floral developments. Who, in his suburban rambles, can forget the ecstatic exclamation at the first discovered snow-drop, primrose, or violet?—the unalloyed delight in returning with the first tributes of approaching spring? How the eyes would sparkle with a peculiar lustre when, in the elasticity of youth, we culled from some seemingly inaccessible spot a rare and favorite gem, to enrich our posy, which the gentle meadow could not afford! And who is there, whose senses have not been regaled with the rich and refreshing perfume of such a nosegay? Alas! where are those senses and those feelings which conduced so much to the bliss of by-gone days? Has the lily lost its sweetness, the primrose its fragrance, and the violet its hue? or, rather, is man, from entering on a field of enterprise and speculation, become so completely overwhelmed in cares for his personal aggrandisement and the accumulation of wealth, as to be estranged from the unmingled charms of a garden, with all its endless varieties of pleasures and luxuries? Can man be so dead and insensible to the beauties of nature?—so ungrateful to a benificent Providence? Is there no poetry in his composition?—no benevolence in his organization? Has the love of gold rendered all his better feelings callous and obtuse? And has he neither time nor inclination to revert to scenes where the avarice of maturer years found no sympathy?

Let us attribute the situation of such a man to the miseries of an age out of which we are progressively escaping, when all such narrowed and sordid views must eventually fall a sacrifice to the inroads of science, and the consequent enlargement of human happiness.

The suburban residences, which are already thickly studded around our cities, and are daily becoming more numerous, bid fair to invite other feelings and to cherish better hopes; but, alas! as we approach to examine these spots, our hearts are sickened at the portals. Common-place shrubs, numbering some half-dozen species, which economy has taught the builder to distribute, are alone to be found. Had the owner of such a residence retained but a tenth of his schoolboy enthusiasm for flowers, his collection of plants would at least have been numbered by the hundreds; and, be it remembered, every plant has its name—and he would have known it. He would have watched it assuming different characters, and clothed in its various garbs; and it would have imbued his mind with interesting associations and numberless pleasing incidents. What thousands of moral lessons he would have been taught amidst recreations which the cynic and the latitudinarian never dreamed of! Could I but disengage him from his calculations, and invite him from his couch, by the fragrance of the hawthorn or the rose, to admire the majesty of the oak or the grandeur of the lofty pine, I should not despair of calling forth his latent feelings. Even though his looks indicated that the freshness of youth was succeeded by maturer years, there would still be in store for him, in this department of natural history, endless sources of the highest order of intellectual gratification, endearing him to his family and his abode.

REAL ESTATE VERSUS IMAGINARY POSSESSIONS, POETICALLY CONSIDERED.

MY KINGDOM.

I HAVE a kingdom of unknown extent,
Its treasures great, its wealth without compare;
And all the pleasures men in pride invent
Are not like mine, so free from pain and care.

'T is all my own: no hostile power may rise
To force me outward from its rich domain;
It hath a strength that time itself defies,
And all invaders must assail in vain.

'T is true sometimes its sky is overcast,
And troublous clouds obscure the peaceful light;
Yet these are transient and so quickly past
Its radiance seems to glow more clear and bright.

It hath a queen—my queen—whose loving reign
No daring subject ever may dispute;
Her will is mine, and all my toil her gain,
And when she speaks my heart with love is mute.

She sits beside me, and her gentle hand
Guides all my hopes in this estate below;
The joys of life, the products of the land,
Beneath her smiles in ceaseless pleasures flow.

My heart, her subject, throbs beneath her eyes,
And sends its tides full with unbounded love,
As ocean's waters swell beneath the skies
Drawn by the placid moon that rolls above.

What king or ruler hath a state like mine,
That death or time can never rend apart,
Where hopes and pleasures are almost divine?
Yet all this kingdom—One True Woman's Heart.

—[Evening Bulletin. PAUL DUOIR.

OH, stuff! Is that all? I like your poetry, Mr. D., but I don't "admire" to see a man raise such a thundering smoke on such a very small capital of fire. I may be a little irritated, because you fooled me, D., you fooled me badly. I read your ramifications—I choose the word, D., simply because it has five syllables, and I desire to flatter you up a little before I abuse you; I don't know the meaning of it myself—I noticed your grandiloquent heading, "My Kingdom," and it woke me up; so I commenced reading your Ramifications with avidity, and I said to myself, with my usual vulgarity, "Now here's a man that's got a good thing." I read along, and read along, thinking sure you were going to turn out to be King of New Jersey, or King of the Sandwich Islands, or the lucky monarch of a still more important kingdom, maybe—but how my spirits fell when I came to your cheap climax! And so your wonderful kingdom is—"A True Woman's Heart!"—with capital letters to it! Oh, my! Now what do you want to go and make all that row about such a thing as that for, and fool people? Why, you put on as many frills, and make as much fuss about your obscure "kingdom" as if it were a magnificent institution—a first-class power among the nations—and contained a population of forty million souls, (and maybe it does, for all you know—most kingdoms of that kind are pretty well tenanted, my innocent royal friend.) And what does your majesty suppose you can do with your extraordinary "kiugdom?" You can't sell it; you can't hire it out; you can't raise money on it. Bah! You ought to be more practical. You can keep your boasted "kiugdom," since it appears to be such a comfort to you; don't come around trying to trade with me—I am very well content with MY RANCH.

I HAVE a ranch of quite unknown extent,
Its turnips great, its oats without compare;
And all the ranches other men may rent
Are not like mine—so not a dern* I care.

'T is all my own—no turnstile power may rise
To keep me outward from its rich domain;
It hath a fence that time itself defies,
And all invaders must climb out again.

'Tis true sometimes with stones 'tis overcast,
And troublous clods offend the sensitive sight;
Yet from the furrows I these so quickly blast,
Their radiant seams do show more clear and bright.

It hath a sow—my sow—whose love for grain
No swearing subject will dispute;
Her swill is mine, and all my slops her gain,
And when she squeaks my heart with love is mute.

[Here the machine "let down."] MARK TWAIN.

* This imprecation is a favorite one out in the ranching districts, and is generally used in the society of ladies, where a mild form of expressionmay be considered.

PARADISE LOST.

A LOVE STORY.

MY knapsack was on my shoulder. So said Armand, a young artist, when a little company ol us were sitting together the other evening.

My knapsack was on my shoulder, my ashen stick in hand; three leagues of dusty road had whitened me like a miller. Whence I came, whither I was going—what matters it? I was not twenty years of age. My starting point, therefore, was my home; my goal was Paradise—any earthly Paradise I could find. The country was not particularly picturesque; and the weather was very hot. Great undulations of harvest-laden fields rolled irregularly on all sides. Here was a hamlet; there a solitary farm-house; yonder a wood; on each eminence a wind-mill. Some peasants that were in the fields sang; and the birds chirped at them as if in mockery. One or two wagons, dragged by oxen and horses, slowly moved along the tree-bordered road. I sat down on a heap of stones. A wagoner gruffly asked me if I was tired, and offered me "a lift." I accepted; and soon I was stretched, where dirt had been; jolted into an uneasy, half-slumber, not without its charm, with the bells of the lazy team softly jingling in my ears, until I thought fifty silver voices were calling me away to a home that must be bright, and a land that must be beautiful.

I awoke in a mood sufficiently benign to receive an apology. The man had forgotten me when he turned off the high road, and had taken me half a league into the country. Where was the harm, honest wagoner? I am not going anywhere; "I am only going to Paradise." There was no village of that name in the neighborhood, he said; but he had no doubt I would be pleased to see the grounds of the chateau. Of course, I had come on purpose for that. I handed him his pourboire. "Drink my health, good man, and injure your own. Let us see these grounds." The man showed me through a meadow near the farm (to which he belonged) and left me, tossing the silver piece I had given him in his hard hand. I soon observed that the place was worth seeing.

A hasty glance showed it to be a fragment of wild nature, occupied in its original state, and barricaded against civilization. There were woods, and solitary trees, and lakes, and streams of sufficient dimensions for grandeur; and, when once the wall disappeared against the heavy foliage, I could at first discern no traces whatever of the presence of man. However, on closer examination, I discovered that nature had been improved upon; that all objects which might ungraciously intercept the view, or deform a landscape, had been removed. There were no sham ruins nor artificial cascades; but the stranger's steps were led, by some ingenious process of plantation, insensibly to the best points of view. I felt, and was thankful, for the presence of the art which so industriously endeavored to conceal itself; but being, at that time, as most young men are, inclined to compare great things with small—thinking to be epigramic and knowing—I exclaimed aloud: "The toilette of this park has been admirably perlormed."

"A vulgar idea, vulgarly expressed," said a clear firm voice above me. I looked up, thinking that somebody was hidden in a tree; and, to my surprise, saw a young woman upon a fine large horse, holding a riding-whip playfully over my head. She had approached across the turf unheard, und had heard my exclamation, which, I assure you, was meant for no ears but my own.

"Madam," replied I, when I had recovered from my confusion, "I think you misunderstand me. There is no vulgarity in comparing a prospect, in which every superfluity is thus tastefully pruned away, to a woman, who, instead of loading herself with ornaments, uses the arts of the toilette to display all her beauties to the best advantage."

"This explanation will not do," she replied. "It wants frankness. Your phrase simply meant that you were ashamed of the admiration this view had at first excited; and that you thought it necessary to exert the manly privilege of contempt. If I had not seen you yonder using your sketch-book, I should take you for a travelling hairdresser."

The tone and manner of my new aequaintance puzzled me exeeedingly; and I was at first rather irritated by the hostile attitude she assumed on such slight grounds. It was evident she wished to provoke an intellectual contest; for, at the moment, I did not understand that her real desire was to suppress the formalities of an introduction. I returned to the charge; she replied. A broadside of repartee was fired off on either side; but insensibly we met upon common ground; affectation, was discarded; and, as we streamed irregularly along the swardy avenues, or stopped at the entrance of a long vista—she gently walking her docile genet; I, with my hand upon its mane—we made more advances towards familiarity and friendship in an hour than would have been possible, under other circumstances, in a season.

Let me describe my impressions as I receceived them. Otherwise, how will the narrative illustrate the theory? I am endeavoring to show, by example, what an immense structure of happiness may be built upon a very flimsy grouud; that the material sequence of this life's events need have no correspondence with the sequence of our sentiments; that—But I must not anticipate.

The lady, dressed in a green riding-habit, was remarkably handsome, as this miniature will show—

—And Armand drew a small case from his breast.

"It is made from memory; but I will answer for its exactitude."

"We all know the face well enongh, my friend," quoth Prevost; "it re-appears in nearly all your pictures, like Raphael's Fornarina. Last year you made it do duty for Medea; this year, modified to suit the occasion, it will appear in the Salon as Charlotte Corday. Why have you so carefully avoided that type in your Juliet and your Heloise? One would imagine that, instead of being associated with pleasant recollections, it suggested nothing but strife, violence, and despair."

"Were that the case, you know," quoth Armand, with feigned sprightliness, "my theory falls to the ground; and, in telling you my story, I am only impertinently taking advantage of your good nature to make a confession, and thus ease a somewhat troubled mind. Listen to the end; it is not far off."

We reached a grotto on the borders of a little lake, where, to my surprise, an elegant breakfast was laid out. There were two seats placed ready; and Fifine, the maid, was there to serve. We partook of the meal together, talking of everything except ourselves; but thinking of nothing else. Once or twice a reflection of the oddity of this reception flitted across my miud; but I thought that I had fallen in with some eccentric mistress of the castle—such as one reads of in middle-age romances—who was proud to give hospitality to a wanderiug artist. The lady called me Hector, and I called her Andromache; and, under the influence of some generous wine that came in with the desert, I went so far as to declare that my love for her was unbounded, and that she must be my bride. I was thrown into ecstacies of delight by the frank reply, that it only depended upon me to fix the day! What follies I committed I scarcely recollect; but I know that Fifine scolded me; aud said that, for a well-educated young man, I was dreadfully forward.

What a delightful half-hour was that which snceeeded! The entrauce of the grotto was wreathed with vines. The ripples of the lake broke upon a little beach of sand, that seemed of gold dust; the path by which we had come along at the foot of a precipice for about thirty yards, and then climbed a steep bank; the expanse of water—possibly it was merely a large pool, but these things magnify in memory—uestled at the feet of some lofty wooded slopes, which, with its pure blue sky, it reflected. We sat, side by side, hand in hand; but Fifine, whose notions of propriety were extremely rigid, expostulated vehemently. I whispered that she ought to be sent away; and Andromache was, perhaps, of my opinion; but she did not venture to agree with me aloud. Thus the honr passed in silent happiness; for our hearts soon becume too full for words; and I solemnly declare that, to spend such another day, I would discount ten years of my existence.

As evening drew near, and I began to dream of the delights of a twilight stroll along the margin ol the lake, Fifine pitilessly suggested an adjournment to the chateau. The word grated harshly on my ear. I had almost pictured to myself the lady as a dryad, or a nymph living ever amidst trees and grottoes. But prosy Fifine carried her point; and, in half an hour, we were in the saloon of a most comfortuble modern dwelling, furnished with Parisian elegance. Several very common-place looking servants stared at me as I entered. My romantic ideas at once received a shock. Five minutes afterwards a postchaise rolled up to the door, and a stout old gentlemau, accompanied by a tall handsome young man, issued therefrom.

Why should I give you the ludicrous details of the explanation? Andromache was betrothed to Hector Chose; but she had never seen him. Her father, a wealthy naturalist, had gone that day to meet the bridegroom at a neighboring towu. The young lady (who was of a romantic disposition) had descried me in the park, and had fancied this was a prearranged surprise. She had got up the breukfast in the grotto; and had made my acquaintance as I have related. I answered to the name of Hector; she naturally retorted Andromache. This was the whole explanation of the mistake. I was overwhelmed with shame, when the father and the real Hector, with vociferous laughter, undecived me; and the young lady herself went away in tears of vexation. For a moment, I hoped that I had produced an ineffaceable impression; but I was soon undeceived. In my mortification I insulted Hector. A hostile meeting was the result. I received a severe wound, and lay a long time helpless in a neighboring hamlet. Still my love was not cured. Even when I heard that the marriage had been celebrated, I persisted in looking upon the bride as my Andromache; but when Madam Duclique, her cousin, came to see me, she destroyed all my illusions. Andromache, she said, though with much affectation of romance, was a very matter-of-fact personage, and remembered our love-passage only as a very ridiculous mistake. She had married Hector, not only without repugnance, but with delight. He brought her everything she desired—a handsome person, a fine fortnne, an exalted position; and she was the first to joke on the subject of "that poor counterfeit Hector."

This interview cured me at once. I discovered that I was strong enough to leave the Paradise I had lost. Madam Duclique, an amiable and beautiful person, gave me a seat in her carriage, and drove me to the town of Arques. I feel grateful to my Andromache for having impressed upon my mind an enduring form of beauty.

"Let us drink her health!"

A FLORIST'S BOUQUET.—Take a daisy, and look at it with a strong magnifying glass. You will see that it is made up, both border and middle, both rays and disk, of a number of little forests clustered together. Our fall bouquets are made after the same model. I have now to make one large circular flower with the separate forests in my basket. I first tie my bunch of box with a string, and clip its top with shears, so that it resembles a circular piucushion or an artichoke bottom. It is the foundation of the structure; botanists would call it the receptacle of my composite flowers. Here I have bits of common rush, about ten or eleven inches long; there, I have bits of non-elastic iron-wire, about as thick as a horse-hair, some three inches long. With a twist of wire I attach each flower to the end of a rush, giving it thus an artificial stem. You see how quickly it is done, especially when one has three or four helping hands. We will now stick the rush pins into the box cushion—the flowers on their common receptacle. In the centre I put my Glorie Dijon rose, surrounding it with a circle of heliotrope; next comes a circle of Aimee Virbet; next of scarlet geranium; next of yellow calceolaria, and next of fancy pelargoniums. The whole is surrounded with a loose and hazy framework of glistening and trembling gypsophilas. The floral surface is even and convex. The shears shorten the rushes to a convenient length, and the bouquet is slipped into a funnel-shaped holder or case of card fringed with paper stamped into lace. All the scaffolding is hidden; the blossoms only meet the eye. As a finishing touch, the fuschias are inserted round the edge, so as to droop like pendants over the lace.

But a bouquet so built cannot last long. Of course not. Putting it into water to preserve it would be as efficacious as putting your wooden leg into a foot bath to cure a cold. A vapor bath and a slight sprinkling, through the instrumentality of a tin box, or a cool wet towel, might refresh it a little. But, que voulez vous? 'Tis their destiny. To-night's bouquet graces the day after to-morrow's dust heap.—All the Year Round.

SUBLIMATION OF BREAD AND BUTTER.—Hall, in his Journal of Health, gives us the following bit of wisdom: "Bread and butter are the only articles of food of which we never tire, from early childhood to extreme old age. A pound of fine flour of Indian meal contains three times as much meat as one pound of butcher's roast beef; and if the whole product ol the grain, bran and all, were made into bread, fifteen per cent. more of nntriment would be added. Unfortunately the bran, the coarsest part, is thrown away; the very part which gives soundness to the teeth, and strength to the brain. Five hundred pounds of flour give to the body thirty pounds of the bony element, while the same quantity of bran gives more than one hundred and twenty-five pounds. This bone is lime, the phosphate of lime, the indispensable element of health to the whole human body, from the want of the natural supply of which multitudes of persons go into a general decline. But swallowing phosphates in the shape of powders or in syrups to cure these declines, has little or no effect. The articles coutained in these phosphates must pass through Nature's laboratory; must be subject to her manipulations, in alembics specially prepared by Almighty power and skill, in order to impart their peculiar virtues to the human lrame; in plainer phrase, the shortest, safest, and most infallible method of giving strength to the body, bone, and brain, thereby arresting disease and building up his constitution, is to eat and digest more bread made out of the whole grain, whether of wheat, corn, rye, or oats."

VALUABLE INK.—An Englishman has recently patented an ink or writing fluid for preventing fraudulent alterations in written documents, to be used in combination with a peculiarly prepared paper, the color in which is discharged, and the texture changed, by the action of the ink. The writing fluid is composed of dilute sulphuric acid, colored with indigo, and the paper is ordinary writing paper, tinted with ultramarine or any other suitable color which is capable of being discharged by the acid. By this means, the texture of the paper, in the parts affected by the acid, will be so changed and weakened as to prevent the possibility of alteration or erasnre, and the ink or writing fluid, by penetrating through the paper, will be seen on both its sides. We learn from the French journals that a vegetable ink has been discovered by M. Plessis, which is not only unalterable in color, but also in limpidit y

HOW TIME WAS KILLED FOR ME.

MY greatest trouble is that I have too much money. My greatest virtue, in one view of it, is that I don't want any more. If the latter fact accounts for my being so lazy, let it go at that.

I am lazy, surely; and ennuied, most of the time, and blasé, and all that sort of thing. I've been the round of mortal amusements, until nothing in that way gives me any satisfaction. It has been suggested to me that it might be a good idea if I would go to work. I may do that yet out of sheer despair. I go to theatres, and yawn all through the play. I go to balls and soirées, and am disgusted; these girls all know I'm rich. I lolled away a week at Newport in July, and bathed once or twice; but what a bore it is to bathe! There's no taking your ease in the water, the surf knocks a fellow about so.

One day last week I had been taking a drive in the Park, and toward evening strolled down Broadway, a little more ennuied than usual, if possible. What should I do to kill the time? As I reached Taylor's I glanced in, and remembered with a sigh the delight with which I had looked upon the gaudy glories of that big saloon, one evening six or eight years ago, when I was making my first visit to New York, with a party of school-boy friends. That was about a year before I came into my property, you know, and I was as fresh as a daisy. Stirred by the sweet memory of that happy, impecunious time, I strolled into the saloon and sat down, ordering something to eat and a bottle of wine. While engaged in poking a piece of chicken with a fork, and trying to pretend I enjoyed the wine, I was very much surprised at beholding a good-looking middle-aged lady, in a black silk dress, come up to me and sit down opposite at my table.

"This is Mr. Smith, I believe, isn't it?" said she.

"Not at all," said I; "my name is Jones."

It isn't, however; it is St. Clair; but I did not deem it necessary that the woman should know my name.

"Why, I was sure this was Mr. Smith," said she.

"It's all the same," said I; "it's very near it—Joncs is. Will you have a glass of wine with me?"

"Sir!" said she, with some asperity.

"I asked you—a glass of wine, you know. It's not the best, but such as it is—"

"Your impertinence will not avail you, Mr. Smith," said the woman; and she gathered up her black silk skirts and left me.

I raised my eyes a trifle, and languidly watched her cross the room as I sipped my wine. She approached a group of two ladies and one gentleman, and exchanged some observations with them, upon which they all bent an earnest gaze meward. Then they went out. A minute after I strolled out also, and there they all were in a group on the sidewalk, evidently waiting for me. The gentleman—quite a well-appearing chap he was, too—came up to me and said:

"I think this is Mr. Smith, is it not?"

"It is not," said I; "I am familiar with the name of Smith, but I do not own it."

Then I stepped within and lit a cigar. I had just come across a lot of the primest Havanas, up town, and had put a whole bunch of them in my pocket. My friends remained at the door, and I offered the gentleman a cigar, which he courteously declined. The whole group then approached me more closely.

"Certainly, it is Mr. Smith," said a gushing little creature in a blue silk.

"Of course it is," said another gushing little creature in a green silk.

"It is useless for you to deny your name, Mr. Smith; you see we all recognize you perfectly."

"And in case my name were Smith, sir, may I ask what Smith could do to serve you and your fair companions?"

"A good deal, sir," said the gentleman; "as much, I believe, Mrs. Jones, as two hundred dollars, is it not?"

The lady in the black silk nodded.

"That's not a good deal," said I.

"Then perhaps you'll pay it at once, Mr. Smith, and save further trouble."

"Assuredly I will," said I, "when I owe it."

"Do you mean to deny, sir," said the gentleman, very deliberately, "that you owe Mrs. Jones here that sum for board; that you left her house on Thursday night last; and carried off besides—quite by mistake, I dare say—a valuable ring belonging to this young lady, Miss Julia Joncs?"

I raised my hat to Miss Julia Jones.

"Then I judge," said I, "that I must have been on agreeably intimate terms with this young lady at the time my name was Smith?"

"Was there ever such impertinence!" ejaculated Miss Julia Jones.

"Really, about the hardest case of cheek I ever saw in my life," said the gentleman, staring curiously at me.

"I bid you good day, ladies," said I, "and you, sir."

I strolled up the street smoking. They followed me, and presently I felt a policeman's hand laid on my shoulder.

"Beg y' pardon, sir," said the protector of innocence, "this gentleman directs your arrest."

"Arrest!" said I. "Well, this is interesting. On what charge, pray?"

"Grand larceny," said the gentleman, nodding to the officer.

I bit my cigar nervously. At first I had half a notion to pay these people what they demanded, but on second thought I concluded that would be a little too ridiculous.

"These people," said I, "are mistaken in the man. My name is not Smith. It is St. Clair. You may have heard it."

"Yes, I've heard it often," said the policeman; "it's a werry nice sort o' a name, too, an' quite a favorite with some—not the sharpest sort, though. It's a gittin' wore out."

"He told me his name was Jones," said the lady in the black silk.

"Oh, he did?" remarked the policeman. "Well, Jones is a nice name, too. Do you want him shut right up, sir? It's too late to take him afore the judge now, you know."

"No," said the gentleman; "give him every chance. It is about dinner-time now. We will go to the house and confront him with the other boarders. It's not too far."

"Since you will have it so, sir, and ladies," said I, "I suppose I may as well go with you. Especially as I have plenty of leisure. But I prefer to take a carriage, if you do not object—at my expense, of course."

So the policeman, the gentleman, and myself rode to Mrs. Jones's boarding-house in Blanque street.

"We shall take no unfair advantage of you, Mr. Smith," said the gentleman. "You shall enter the dining-room alone. The officer will remain in the hall and listen. If the boarders receive you as a stranger, very well; but otherwise—"

I obeyed orders; entered the dining-room and took a seat at the table.

"Why, you're back soon, Mr. Smith," said a gentleman in spectacles at my left.

And then the boarders all about the table looked up and nodded their salutations to me.

"It's all right," said the policeman, entering. "Nothing could be snugger. Come on, my man."

"One moment," said I, arising to my feet. "I appeal to the ladies and gentlemen here present to scrutinize me with careful eyes. I am not Mr. Smith. There is some strange mistake. My name is Edward L. St. Clair. Here is my card. I reside at No. — Fifth Avenue, and can prove my identity to the most stubborn appreciation."

The male boarders shook their heads. The ladies simpered, and exchanged glances that said, "Did you ever?" as plainly as you ever did.

"Come along, my gentleman," said the policeman, "we're up to all that sort of thing, you know. It won't work. I want you now."

He took me. Nothing easier.

In vain I asked that I be taken to my residence—that one or any of my friends be sent for—Judge Carmel, the Reverend Percy Fitzspout, the Honorable Samson Montgomery, any one.

"Don't you want to see Barnum, or Fernandy Wood?" queried the officer, sarcastically. "You must think I'm a flat. It's played out, I tell you."

In the shadow of the falling night he led me away to the Tombs. I felt quite a chill run over me as I was ushered into the long corridor of that cheerful abode of murderers and cut-throats. The first thing I found there was a man's hand in my pantaloons pocket. He was an officer. He "went through" me with great celerity, took away my pocket-book and watch, scrutinized keenly a ring of keys he found in one pocket, and demanded sharply, "What's this?" concerning an ingenious silver watch-box that I brought from Paris, and which he clearly thought was some burglarious utensil. They put my name and offence down in a big book, and then a man tapped me on the shoulder, with a gesture to follow him.

"What are you going to do with me?" I asked, as I followed.

"Lock you up," said he, in the most cold-blooded manner, "till morning."

"But I've done nothing," I said, weakly.

"Them never has as comes here," he said cheerfully.

He put me into a cell and turned a big bolt on me; and there I was, behind an iron door, with no light save that which came through a grated opening in the door, there being lamps burning in the corridor. I soon became accustomed to the light and surveyed my cell. The dirt there was astounding. There were two rough men already occupying the apartment, and the soles of their bare feet were crusted with the dirt from the stone floor. There was a narrow bed, with a most disgusting mattress and a hideous flannel blanket, for us three to sleep on. Us three! Ohe jam satis.

One of us was a sailor. He was in, he said, on a charge of robbing a mess-mate.

"And did you?" I asked.

"Do I look like or thief?" he asked, with proud scorn.

I certainly thought he did, but I didn't say so. I offered him a cigar instead.

The other of us was in for an attempted burglary.

"And did you?"

"Who? Me? No! It's a base conspiracy."

He took a cigar also. Fortune never quite forsakes us. That lucky package of Havanas became my spar in this wide ocean of distress. I kept myself awake with them through all the long night, during which I never once left my feet. The bed was too nasty even to sit on, of course, and the only other seat in the cell was still nastier. So I paced the stone floor till day broke. I can't say I was especially disturbed in a mental sense. I rather—upon my word—I rather liked the idea of it, viewed as an idea. But I was very tired in a physical sense.

They stuck three tin dishes full of some nauseating mess through the door somewhere about seven o'clock, I judged (I hadn't my watch, you know;) one mess for each of us. My companions ate their messes with greedy relish. Then they ate mine; and relieved me very much by doing so, as I was not entirely certain but that prison discipline would compel me to eat it; and I feared it was a little too rich for my stomach, and should certainly have thrown it up if I had ever got it down.

Of course, when I was taken before the magistrate it was a simple matter to establish my identity. There was great indignation in our set for a few days about it, and all sorts of vengeful threats were made, principally by young fellows like Perkins Porter, Jr., who would run from a caterpillar with its back up. One was going to have Acton discharge that policeman off the force.

"Let him alone," said I; "he did his duty. It was no fault of his."

Another was going to cowhide that young gentleman—Harris his name was. He was engaged to Miss Maria Jones; apologized in the handsomest manner about it.

"Pooh!" said I; "let him alone too. It was not his fault either."

"Then whose fault was it, St. Clair?" demanded Perkins Porter, Jr.

"Why, Smith's," said I.

And this is to warn Smith, in a friendly manner, to keep away, unless he is prepared to settle with Mrs. Jones, and bring back Miss Julia Jones' ring. I wouldn't mind lending him the money for the board-bill if he stands ready to do the entirely fair thing by Miss Julia, and will settle down.

COMBATS OF ANIMALS.—At one of those sanguinary exhibitions of animal combats, I witnessed a contest between a Buffalo and a tiger; the buffalo was extremely fierce, and one of the largest kind. It commenced the attack by rushing towards its adversary, which retreated to a corner of the arena, where, finding no escape, it sprang upon the buffalo's neck, fixing its claws in the animal's shoulder, and lacerating it in a fearful manner. It was, however, almost instantly flung upon the earth with a violence that completely stunned it, when there appeared a ghastly wound in the side, inflicted by its antagonist. The conqueror now began to gore and trample upon its prostrate enemy, which it soon despatched, and then galloped round the enclosure, streaming with blood, the foam dropping from its jaws, its eyes glancing fire, occasionally stopping, pawing the ground, and roaring with maddened fury.

A small rhinoceros was next introduced, which stood at the extremity of the arena, eyeing its foe with an oblique but animated glance, though without the slightest appearance of excitement. The buffalo, having described a circuit from the centre of the ground, plunged forward toward the rhinoceros, with its head to the earth, its eyes appearing as if about to start from their sockets. Its wary antagonist turned to avoid the shock of this furious charge, and just grazed the flank of the buffalo with its horn, ploughing up the skin, but doing no serious mischief. It now champed and snorted like a wild hog, and its eyes began to twinkle with evident expressions of anger. The buffalo repeated the charge, one of its horns coming in contact with its adversary's shoulder, which, however, was protected by so thick a mail that this produced no visible impression. The rhinoceros, the moment it was struck, plunged its horn with wonderful activity and strength into the buffalo's side, crushing the ribs and penetrating to the vitals; it then lifted the gored body from the ground and flung it to the distance of several feet, where the mangled animal almost instantly breathed its last. The victor remained stationary, eyeing his motionless victim with a look of stern indifference; but the door of his den being opened he trotted into it, and began muching some cakes which had been thrown to him as a reward for his conduct in so unequal a contest.

A BURGLAR entered a young lady's bedroom at Amherst, Massachusetts, one night lately, and was mistaken by her for a somnambulist, a returned volunteer visiting at the house. She arose, accordingly, led him to the soldier's room and left him. The next morning the soldier found himself locked in and the mysterious visitor gone.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1865.

BENEVOLENCE.

PROBABLY no place in the city affords such an opportunity for study as the rooms of the San Francisco Benevolent Association, not for what is seen there, (because the Institution works silently, and, when necessary, secretly, through its members,) but for what may be learned from its officers. We have in San Francisco the Protestant Orphan Asylum, the Industrial School, the Ladies' Protection and Relief Society, and other charities which are doing much good, and which should be visited and generally patronized by our citizens. But of all the eleemosynary institutions with which an advancing civilization has blessed our city, none cover so broad a field, none extend the hand of charity so bountifully and so universally, and none can, from the nature of its organization, assuage so much suffering as the Benevolent Association.

We scarcely think our people appreciate the importance of this well-conceived charity. We have been permitted to examine some of its statistics, (for, although but an infant of a few months, it is yet old in service and already has a history,) and have been astounded to find that, in the brief period of six months, it has rendered assistance to more than three thousand persons, aided many hundreds to obtain permanent employment, saved scores from despair, and perhaps an untimely end, reclaimed as many from dens of poverty and hunger, and raised a large number from the "slough of despond" to honorable and responsible positions. And all this in a city which enjoys the enviable distinction of being the metropolis of the Golden State, where capital concentrates, where luxury abounds, where remunerative industry is rewarded, and where ease and plenty, to the superficial observer, appear to be the universal rule.

But it would seem that San Francisco, in this regard, can furnish no exception to the law that governs all large cities, and here, as elsewhere, poverty goes hand in hand with wealth, idleness with industry, hunger with luxury, and want, as by a natural instinct, walks side by side with tranquility and affluence. What volumes of human history may be found in the already massive books of that Institution, which privately record the narrative of each tale of woe that is cautiously whispered in the ears of its officers, and which register the process by which relief is afforded; now supplying food and raiment to the starving and chilled sufferers; now administering consolation, through its agents, at the bed of disease and death; now encouraging the despondent, for whom employment is found at last; now furnishing passage for the homeless and friendless to some point where the hand of a parent, or a brother, or a sister, is waiting to extend relief; and now performing the last solemn rites, perhaps, to one whose case has escaped its vigilant, watchful eye, and who found welcome succor from the trials of this world in eternal sleep. Within speaking distance of the abodes of wealth, disease and poverty dwell; the air resounds alike with the mirth of the happy and the wail of the despairing; and but a single step may carry those who seek to ameliorate suffering, from the parlor of luxury and mirth to the cold habitation of the hungry and hopeless. If there be those of our citizens who think that this picture is overwrought, let such visit the office of the Association, and learn for themselves its solemn truth and its emphatic warnings.

Some very interesting circumstances may be there presented to the mind. Human nature is there revealed alike in its beauty and its deformity. Gratitude, the noblest principle of the human breast, there at times is found in all its broad and ennobling proportions. We were told the story of a young man who had for months sought for employment in vain. Asking assistance of the Association, whose system is so perfect that it combines the functions of an intelligence office and the good Samaritan, he was directed to a neighboring town, where it was known that such a person was wanted, and means were furnished him. Soon after, he returned the following letter, with $5, in part payment for the assistance rendered:

MONDAY, October 16, 1865.

GENTLEMEN: With thanks for the kind treatment I have received at your hands, I send you this, hoping you will accept it as a debt which I owe you. If it had not been for your kind efforts, I know not what I would have done. I got work the day I arrived in ——. I have earned since then $29 50, which enables me to pay my debts. I have paid back the $4 which I owed for coming up to —— in the ——. So now gentlemen, thanking you again for your kindness, I will conclude with nothing more from

Yours truly, with respect, ——.

A little bright-eyed boy, about ten years of age, was presented to us. He had just arrived on the steamer which brought troops from the East. His father was a sergeant, who had sickened and died on the passage. He had not a single friend or relative here—not one to whom he could apply for aid—not one upon whom he could rely for a meal or shelter. It was a hard ordeal for one so young and innocent in a distant land, and among entire strangers. But he had been provided for. A friend had been found to support and train him in the path of rectitude. Instead of his being cast upon the cold charities and relentless mercies of the world, he may perchance become an ornament to society, and an honor to the nation.

With so many cases for consideration, it would be strange, indeed, if some impositions were not practiced. But the circumstances of each applicant for relief are investigated so closely, that fraud cannot be long continued. The blind man, with his little girl, whose haunts are on Montgomery street and elsewhere where people "most do congregate," could not practice his tricks long without being detected. That individual received assistance in the shape of food and clothing at various times. His wife was in a condition which unfitted her for any service. A nurse was provided. Another little sufferer was soon born. But, before many days, the mid-wife discovered, between the mattresses, which had been furnished by the Association, and which had served as a cover for deception as much as a couch for the sick, a bag of gold, containing several thousand dollars—the hoardings of years of pitiful, but not unprofitable begging. His house, too, was full of groceries, which he had accumulated. And when the discovery was made known to our pauper friend by Mr. Allen, the Secretary, he poured forth a volume of foul and offensive anathemas upon those who had revealed the practices of the imposter, that would have disgraced the worst purlieus of Five Points.

Our space will not permit us to dwell longer upon this fruitful subject. We intend to recur to it again, and contribute our mite towards awakening our citizens to a sense of their duty towards this society—a duty which is made the more imperative, inasmuch as there is in this State no public almshouse, whose work the society is performing. In the meantime, we can do no less than to enjoin upon our people the necessity of extending a liberal hand to this broad and well organized charity, and to impress upon them the importance of refusing alms to professional street beggars, whose occupation it is a part of the mission of the Association to destroy.

THEATRICAL TALK.

ON Monday, Mr. George C. Boniface, by permission of Edwin Forrest, who, no doubt, had not much fear of being rivalled, appeared in the character of "Jack Cade." I think it is a pity Mr. Boniface chose this part in which to make his first appearance in San Francisco. However well calculated to display the strength of Edwin Forrest, the character is certainly not adapted to bring out Mr. Boniface's merits. There are many fine passages in this tragedy, but I fancy that Forrest is required in the leading character to ensure its proving a success. Mr. Boniface's style is not good; he appeared afraid of frightening the ladies, and anxious to "roar as gently as any sucking dove." Had he played "Jack Cade" in the stereotyped "Ercles' vein," and treated it as "a part to tear a cat in," he would have pleased better. On Wednesday, when he gave the public a touch of his qualities as a light comedian, he acquitted himself so well, that it is a matter of wonder to me that he does not rather adhere to that line of business than attempt muscular tragedy. Grief, rage, and despair, are emotions which Mr. Boniface is not happy in depicting successfully, while in comedy and farce he appears perfectly at home, and, when he laughs, makes the whole house join in chorus. The pieces in which he appeared on Wednesday were the comedy of Laugh While You Can, and the capital farce of Cool as a Cucumber. The character of "Plumper," in the latter, affords a good test of the abilities of a light comedian, and Mr. Boniface stood the test most satisfactorily. His style is rather broad for light comedy, and when he rattles off a speech quickly, he is apt to become indistinct, but, with these exceptions, his impersonation of the cool "Plumper" was all that could be desired, and caused the most uproarious shouts of merriment. Mr. Boniface's initial performance of "Jack Cade" had spoilt his second house. The public must not judge of this actor's ability in comedy by his appearance in tragedy; those who attend at the Opera House on Mr. George C. Boniface's comedy nights will assuredly get the value of their money, if he has in his repertory other characters which he can play as successfully as "Plumper" in Cool as a Cucumber. On Tuesday and Thursday, Mr. Daniel E. Bandmann appeared as "Hamlet." Mr. Bandmann's rendition of "Hamlet" improves on acquaintance with it, but it is no less true that Mr. Bandmann has improved on his first presentation of this character. It is very possible that Mr. Bandmann may, unlike his adulators who pronounce his conception, reading and acting of the character "faultless," be willing to believe that, even at this day, after many years of study, he may still improve on it. Last night Mr. George C. Boniface appeared in the drama of Jocrisse the Juggler, which I did not witness. To night Mr. Daniel E. Bandmann appears for the last time in the character of "Hamlet," and takes a benefit. On each occasion of the representation of Hamlet during the week, the theatre has been crowded; I hope that many who have derived pleasure from Mr. Bandmann's acting will acknowledge it by mustering to-night to give him a substantial token of their appreciation of his genius. On Monday evening Mr. Bandmann will appear in an entirely new line of character. He whom we have seen as the cynical "Narcisse," the cruel "Shylock," and the melancholy "Prince of Denmark," will impersonate the jovial rollicking "Don Cæsar de Bazan."

At the Metropolitan Theatre, Arrah-na-Pogue has drawn good houses all the week. The Shields' Guard Relief Fund had a benefit on Monday, which crowded the house, and the benefit of Knickerbocker Engine Company No. 5, on Thursday evening, drew an immense audience, which filled the aisles and overflowed into the corridor. On the withdrawal of Arrah-na-Pogue from the stage a highly sensational drama, with gorgeous scenic effects, which has lately been received from London, will be produced. It is entitled Savannah. It has been thoroughly rehearsed, and every attention to insure its success will be paid to its production. Mr. Wheatleigh has other dramas in an advanced stage of production, and will produce novelties in rapid succession.

Mr. Dan Setchell opened at the Academy of Music on Monday to a splendid audience, and has played to good business every night this week. He has produced the Dutch Governor, Fra Diavolo, John Jones, Ici on Parle Francais, and Toodles; to-night he presents his novelty, The Live Indian; or Love in a Cigar Shop. This piece was played last night, but The Californian, going to press on Friday evening, I can of course say nothing concerning its merits. This piece was followed by Nan, the Good for Nothing; how excellently little Jennie Worrell acts the character of "Nan," every one knows; the concluding piece was John Jones, in which Mr. Dan Setchell, as "Guy Goodluck," kept the audience in continual roars of laughter. Mr. Setchell's speeches are a great feature in the entertainment at the Academy; he possesses an inexhaustible fund of wit, and however often he may be called upon for a speech never fails to say a good thing or two each time. The Worrell Sisters have, as yet, appeared in but one burlesque, Fra Diavolo; others, which are in preparation and will shortly be produced, with fine scenery and music, will serve better to display their talent, than the minor parts which they have filled in several farces. A matinee is given to-day, when the same capital bill will be performed.

On Tuesday, Mrs. Myers, the widow of the young comedian, G. E. Myers, who lost his life by the accident which occurred to the steamer Yosemite, will receive a benefit, at the hands of Mr. Dan Setchell and the company of the Academy. All connected with the establishment have tendered their services gratuitously on this occasion; therefore all the money taken on Tuesday night will go to succor the poor widow, so sadly bereaved, and help her to secure a provision for her little child. I need say no more. San Francisco people always, on such occasions as these, look to it that the house is crowded. TOUCHSTONE.

GUY HEAVYSTONE;

OR, "ENTIRE."

A MUSCULAR NOVEL.

By the Author of "Sword and Gown," "Border and Bastile," etc.

CONDENSED BY "BRET."

CHAPTER I.

"Nerei repandirostrum incurvicervicum pecus."

A dingy, swashy, splashy afternoon in October; a school yard filled with a mob of riotous boys. A lot of us standing outside.

Suddenly came a dull, crashing sound from the school room. At the ominous interruption I shuddered involuntarily, and called to Smithsye:

"What's up, Smithums?"

"Guy's cleaning out the fourth form," he replied.

At the same moment George de Coverly passed me, holding his nose, from whence the bright Norman blood streamed redly. To him the plebeian Smithsye laughingly:

"Cully! how's his nibs?"

I pushed the door of the school room open. There are some spectacles which a man never forgets. The burning of Troy probably seemed a large-sized conflagration to the pious Æneas, and made an impression on him which he carried away with the feeble Anchises.

In the centre of the room, lightly brandishing the piston-rod of a steam engine, stood Guy Heavystone alone. I say alone, for the pile of small boys on the floor in the corner could hardly be called company.

I will try and sketch him for the reader. Guy Heavystone was then only fifteen. His broad, deep chest, his sinewy and quivering flank, his straight pastern showed him to be a thorough-bred. Perhaps he was a trifle heavy in the fetlock, but he held his head haughtily erect. His eyes were glittering but pitiless. There was a sternness about the lower part of his face — the old Heavystone look — a sternness, heightened, perhaps, by the snaffle bit, which, in one of his strange freaks, he wore in his mouth to curb his occasional ferocity. His dress was well adapted to his square set and herculean frame. A striped knit under-shirt, close fitting striped tights and a few spangles set off his figure; a neat Glengarry cap adorned his head. On it was displayed the Heavystone crest, a cock regardant on a dunghill or, and the motto, "Devil a better!"

I thought of Horatius on the bridge, of Hector before the walls. I always make it a point to think of something classical at such times.

He saw me, and his sternness partly relaxed. Something like a smile struggled through his grim lineaments. It was like looking on the Jungfrau after having seen Mont Blanc—a trifle, only a trifle less sublime and awful. Resting his hand lightly on the shoulder of the head-master, who shuddered and collapsed under his touch, he strode toward me.

His walk was peculiar. You could not call it a stride. It was like the "crest-tossing Bellerophon"—a kind of prancing gait. Guy Heavystone pranced toward me.

CHAPTER II.

"Lord Lovel he stood at the garden gate,
A-combing his milk-white steed."

It was the winter of 186–, when I next met Guy Heavystone. He had left the University and had entered the 76th "Heavies." "I have exchanged the gown for the sword, you see," he said, grasping my hand, and fracturing the bones of my little finger, as he shook it.

I gazed at him with unmixed admiration. He was squarer, sterner and in every way smarter and more remarkable than ever. I began to feel toward this man as Phalaster felt towards Phyrgino, as somebody must have felt toward Archididascalus, as Boswell felt toward Johnson.

"Come into my den," he said, and lifting me gently by the seat of my pantaloons, he carried me up stairs and deposited me, before I could apologize, on a sofa. I looked around the room. It was a bachelor's apartment, characteristically furnished in the tastes of the proprietor. A few claymores and battle-axes were ranged against the wall, and a culverin, captured by Sir Ralph Heavystone, occupied the corner, the other end of the room being taken up by a light battery. Foils, boxing-gloves, saddles and fishing-poles lay around carelessly. A small pile of billets-doux lay upon a silver salver. This man was not an anchorite, nor yet a Sir Galahad.

I never could tell what Guy thought of women. "Poor little beasts," he would often say, when the conversation turned on any of his fresh conquests. Then, passing his hand over his marble brow, the old look of stern fixedness of purpose and unflinching severity would straighten the lines of his mouth, and he would mutter, half to himself, "S'death!"

"Come with me to Heavystone Grange. The Exmoor Hounds throw off to-morrow. I'll give you a mount," he said, as he amused himself by rolling up a silver candlestick between his fingers. "You shall have Cleopatra. But stay," he added, thoughtfully; "now I remember, I ordered Cleopatra to be shot this morning."

"And why?" I queried.

"She threw her rider yesterday and fell on him—"

"And killed him?"

"No. That's the reason why I have ordered her to be shot. I keep no animals that are not dangerous—I should add—deadly!" He hissed the last sentence between his teeth, and a gloomy frown descended over his calm brow.

I affected to turn over the tradesman's bills that lay on the table; for, like all of the Heavystone race, Guy seldom paid cash, and said:

"You remind me of the time when Leonidas—"

"O, bother Leonidas and your classical allusions. Come!" We descended to dinner.

CHAPTER III.

"He carries weight, he rides a race,
'Tis for a thousand pound."

"There is Flora Billingsgate, the greatest coquette and hardest rider in the country," said my companion, Ralph Mortmain, as we stood upon Dingleby common before the meet.

I looked up and beheld Guy Heavystone bending haughtily over the saddle, as he addressed a beautiful brunette. She was indeed a splendidly groomed and high-spirited woman. We were near enough to overhear the following conversation, which any high-toned reader will recognize as the common and natural expression of the higher classes.

"When Diana takes the field the chase is not wholly confined to objects ferœ naturæ," said Guy, darting a significant glance at his companion. Flora did not shrink either from the glance or the meaning implied in the sarcasm.

"If I were looking for an Endymion, now—" she said archly, as she playfully cantered over a few hounds and leaped a five-barred gate.

Guy whispered a few words, inaudible to the rest of the party, and curvetting slightly, cleverly cleared two of the huntsmen in a flying leap, galloped up the front steps of the mansion, and dashing at full speed through the hall, leaped through the drawing-room window and rejoined me, languidly, on the lawn.

"Be careful of Flora Billingsgate," he said to me, in low stern tones, while his pitiless eye shot a baleful fire. "Gardez vous!"

Gnothi seauton," I replied calmly, not wishing to appear to be behind him in perception or verbal felicity.

Guy started off in high spirits. He was well carried. He and the first whip, a ten-stone man, were head and head at the last fence, while the hounds were rolling over their fox, a hundred yards farther in the open.

But an unexpected circumstance occurred. Coming back, his chestnut mare refused a ten-foot wall. She reared and fell backward. Again he led her up to it lightly; again she refused, falling heavily from the coping. Guy started to his feet. The old pitiless fire shone in his eyes; the old stern look settled around his mouth. Seizing the mare by the tail and mane he threw her over the wall. She landed twenty feet on the other side, erect and trembling. Lightly leaping the same obstacle himself, he remounted her. She did not refuse the wall the next time.

CHAPTER IV.

"He holds him by his glittering eye."

Guy was in the north of Ireland, cock-shooting. So Ralph Mortmain told me, and also that the match between Mary Brandagee and Guy had been broken off by Flora Billingsgate. "I don't like those Billingsgates," said Ralph, "they're a bad stock. Her father, Smithfield de Billingsgate, had an unpleasant way of turning up the knave from the bottom of the pack. But nous verrons; let us go and see Guy."

The next morning, we started for Fin-ma-Coul's Crossing. When I reached the shooting box, where Guy was entertaining a select company of friends, Flora Billingsgate greeted me with a saucy smile.

Guy was even squarer and sterner than ever. His gusts of passion were more frequent, and it was with difficulty that he could keep an able-bodied servant in his family. His present retainers were more or less maimed from exposure to the fury of their master. There was a strange cynicism, a cutting sarcasm in his address, piercing through his polished manner. I thought of Timon, etc., etc.

One evening, we were sitting over our Chambertin, after a hard day's work, and Guy was listlessly turning over some letters, when suddenly he uttered a cry. Did you ever hear the trumpeting of a wounded elephant? It was like that.

I looked at him with consternation. He was glancing at a letter which he held at arm's length, and snorting, as it were, at it as he gazed. The lower part of his face was stern, but not as rigid as usual. He was slowly grinding between his teeth the fragments of the glass he had just been drinking from. Suddenly, he seized one of the servants, and, forcing the wretch upon his knees, exclaimed with the roar of a tiger:

"Dog! why was this kept from me?"

"Why, please, sir, Miss Flora said as how it was a reconciliation, from Miss Brandagee, and it was to be kept from you where you would not be likely to see it—and—and"

"Speak, dog! and you—"

"I put it among your bills, sir!"

With a groan, like distant thunder, Guy fell swooning to the floor.

He soon recovered, for the next moment a servant came rushing into the room with the information that a number of the ingenuous peasantry of the neighborhood were about to indulge that evening in the national pastime of burning a farmhouse and shooting a landlord. Guy smiled a fearful smile, without, however, altering his stern and pitiless expression.

"Let them come," he said camly; "I feel like entertaining company."

We barricaded the doors and windows, and then chose our arms from the armory. Guy's choice was a singular one: it was a landing net with a long handle, and a sharp cavalry sabre.

We were not destined to remain long in ignorance of its use. A howl was heard from without and a party of fifty or sixty armed men precipitated themselves against the door.

Suddenly the window opened. With the rapidity of lightning, Guy Heavystone cast the net over the head of the ringleader, ejaculated "Habet!" and with a back stroke of his cavalry sabre, severed the member from its trunk, and drawing the net back again, cast the gory head upon the floor, saying quietly:

"One."

Again the net was cast, the steel flashed, the net was withdrawn and an ominous "Two!" accompanied the head as it rolled on the floor.

"Do you remember what Pliny says of the gladiator?" said Guy, calmly wiping his sabre. "How graphic is that passage commencing: 'Inter nos, etc.'" The sport continued until the heads of twenty desperadoes had been gathered in. The rest seemed inclined to disperse. Guy incautiously shewed himself at the door; a ringing shot was heard, and he staggered back pierced through the heart. Grasping the door post in the last unconscious throes of his mighty frame, the whole side of the house yielded to that earthquake tremor, and we had barely time to escape before the whole building fell in ruins. I thought of Samson, the Giant Judge, etc., etc.; but all was over.

Guy Heavystone had died as he had lived—hard.

LITERARY NOTES.

Owen Meredith receives the following gentle thrust from the Pall Mall Gazette: "In the Cornhill Magazine for November, 1860, appeared a poem entitled 'Last Words,' by Owen Meredith. The verses ended thus:

Night sleeps. The hoarse wolf howls not near,
No dull owl beats the casement, and no rough-bearded star
Stares on my mild departure from yon dark window bar.

The Cornhill Magazine for May, 1865, (in an article on the dramatists of the Elizabethan era,) contains the following quotation from Webster:

No rough-bearded comet
Stares on thy mild departure; the dull owl
Beats not against thy casement: the hoarse wolf
Scents not thy carrion.

How curious is this coincidence! A poet dies. More than two centuries elapse, and then another poet arises who repeats the ideas and images of his half-forgotten predecessor, in nearly the same order, and in precisely the same language!"

"Dear Jonathan," says an advertisement in a recent English paper, "the Predictions in 'Old Moore's Almanack, for 1867,' foretold that a great crime would be committed in America. Your good President Lincoln, after he had forgiven all his enemies, was taken from the world by the mad act of a murderer. Other perilous and remarkable events will shortly occur; they are anticipated in the Predictions contained in the Almanack for 1866, which may be had of all booksellers and newsmen; price 1*d.*"

Whittier is named by a contemporary as the author of a poem called "The Maiden's Prayer," which was, in fact, written by N. P. Willis. It begins thus:

She rose from her delicious sleep,
And put away her soft brown hair.

It occurs to us that this maiden must have lived prior to to the advent of the "water-fall." At present, we believe, the maidens put away their soft brown—or black—hair, before going to their "delicious sleep."

Payne Collier's last addition to our Old English Literature, marked No. 14 of his list, is Humphrey Crowch's Love's Court of Conscience, (date 1637,) a sort of crude Art of Love. Crowch, of whom very little is known, is said by Mr. Collier to have been a ballad-writer of the time, and to have written many popular songs. As a guide to popular taste, in the years immediately preceding the Civil War, this work is curious.

Jas. Schonberg, the dramatist, has written a burlesque of Arrah-na-Pogue, entitled, Between You and Me and the Post. It will be produced at provincial theatres by the Webb Sisters. Mr. Schonberg has also written a new piece for Miss Maggie Mitchell, and still another new play, entitled Trismegistus, which is shortly to be produced at the New Bowery Theatre.

A work is announced by De Vries, Ibarra & Co., of Boston, that promises much, if we may trust its title: "Dante, La Divina Comedia. Original text, revised after Fraticelli and Carlo Witte. The first American edition in Italian. With English, by an eminent American Dante scholar. Illustrated by seventy-six wood engravings, after Gustave Dore.''

E. S. Dallas, of London, has a work in press, called The Gay Science—Essays towards the Science of Criticism. Mr. Dallas published, many years ago, Poetics, a work containing new and striking ideas. It is understood that the present volume is a development of the principles then first promulgated.

Augustus Kotzebue, son of the famous dramatist who wrote the original of The Stranger—the original of which is, substantially, Sheridan's—has written a comedy, entitled The Dangerous Friend. The piece has been performed at Dresden. The author adopts the pen-name of "Augustsohn."

W. D. Howells, the poet, now United States Consul at Venice, is in New York, having leave of absence from his Consulate. Mr. Howells has written a book on Venice, which will be published soon by Hurd & Houghton.

Victor Hugo's three new books are to be published in succession, in the course of a year. The first is a volume of poems—Echoes of the Woods and Streets; the second is a volume of plays; and the third is his novel, Sea Laborers.

Mrs. Trelawney, (Howard,) lately deceased, the former intimate of Louis Napoleon, is reported to have left a diary of her life and times, which may chance to get into print.

George Sand (Madame Dudevant) is described by a contemporary as "the only author, constitutionally and practically unhappy, who has written nothing misanthropic."

Sir Walter Raleigh has lately been made the subject of a new memoir, by J. A. St. John, based, it is said, on materials not hitherto used by Raleigh's biographers.

Another Trollope (Frank) has appeared as a novelist. Verily the Trollope family is an inexhaustible tribe of inexhaustible scribblers.

"HARIKIRI."

ONE of the remarkable traits of the Japanese is the contempt of life—or rather, the readiness they exhibit to destroy it in their own persons—as manifested in the frequent performance of the "harikiri," or art of self-murder. An instance of this sort is mentioned in the late Japan papers, alluded to elsewhere, which is certainly peculiar. A man performed "harikiri" to attest the truth of his statements which affected the character of his superior.

We believe it was our fortune—no record exists of any previous visit—to be one of the first party of Americans that ever set foot on Japan soil. On the occasion of that visit, it was also our fortune to witness a case of "harikiri." As the incidents connected with that event may prove interesting at this time, we will briefly narrate them.

In the month of March, 1847, while attempting to pass through the Straits of Matsma or Sangar, which separate the Islands of Jesso and Niphon, a severe storm arose; and to take refuge from it, our vessel was compelled to put into a protected bay or harbor of the latter island. Some fifteen Japanese junks lay at anchor in the bay—evidently "wind-bound"—in front of a small town of some five thousand inhabitants. The appearance of our craft created great commotion. The junks immediately slipped their cables, and put off to the leeward side of the bay with all possible speed. Knowing nothing of the inhabitants, we had an intense curiosity to learn something. As soon as possible a boat was manned from the ship, and a party of us landed in the village. The inhabitants seemed to be divided between fear and astonishment; the town appeared to be under the police control of two officers, armed each with two swords, one a long blade and a short handle, and the other a short blade and a long handle. These officers appeared to be terribly exercised. They offered no violence, but did everything else to prevent our party from entering the town. In spite of their vigilance, however, we did explore it to some extent, and even entered one of their temples—the inhabitants, meantime, gazing upon the party with a mixture of childish astonishment and awe, but not molesting us in any shape.

The next day we noticed from the ship a great commotion, in town, and the appearance of soldiers. Anxious to see what was to be seen, a boat was again manned and a party of us again went ashore—this time manifesting rather more caution than usual. However, we finally landed, and soon our entire party found themselves in the presence of three Daimios, or Chiefs, surrounded by about one hundred armed guards. Here also was one of the excited officers of the preceding day. The Japanese people approached the Chiefs on their hands and knees. The Captain of our vessel, who was with us, followed suit, having read that "when in Rome do as Romans do," and being fully convinced that under the circumstances, being in Japan, it was decidedly politic to "do as Japanese do." After an infinite number of signs and genuflections, evidently for the purpose of finding out the object of our unheralded and unexpected visit, which were answered by various signs which appeared satisfactory, we were conveyed to a hollow square, in the centre of troops, and then all arraigned before the Daimios. The excited official of the first day was present, and in a greater state of excitement than ever, kneeling, talking, and beseeching. Finally, he out with his short-bladed instrument and opened his bowels, falling dead. Subsequently his body was removed. We had witnessed the "harikiri," and tremblingly expected that death would be the portion of the whole party. But it appears one sacrifice was enough. We were not blamed for landing; the officer was blamed for allowing us to land.

After the scene mentioned, the Daimios had a talk, and then ordered refreshments for us. These having been disposed of, two of our party were seized by a guard of soldiers. As we could not understand a word of what was said, we of course expected to be led to immediate execution. It turned out instead, to our great relief, that the parties were only to be kept as hostages while an officer was sent to examine the ship. After his examination, rice and samschu were sent on board, and our party warned by signs to leave as soon as possible. We obeyed the order with alacrity, and so ended our experience of the "harikiri."—San Francisco Call.

PUTTING OUT THE LIGHTS.—At Macao, on the ground floor, a large table was spread for a late dinner. It was covered with many delicacies, and, as usual, there was an abundance of silver plate. The sun had gone down, the wax candles were lighted, the windows left open for the benefit of the evening breeze. Suddenly a great number of bamboos were seen to enter on all sides from the verandahs: at the same moment every bougie was extinguished by a puff from the bamboo hollow tubes. The apartment was involved in darkness, a band of thieves jumped in, and before the astounded guests knew where they were, or what was doing, the whole of the plate was conveyed away, and a boat having, no doubt, been provided for the transport of the spoil either to a neighboring island or to the mainland of China, no trace was ever found of the robbery or the robbers. The silver made its way very speedily to the melting-pot, and the successful invaders, who had their confederates around or about the house, would have no difficulty in finding participators and protectors among the ladrones who have given a name to the robber islands haunted from time immemorial by plunderers and pirates.

TRULY RURAL.

IN A COTTAGE NEAR A WASP'S NEST.

[NOTES BY A DISGUSTED VISITOR FROM LONDON.]

MORNING.—The early bee on my dressing table. Suicide of earwig in my bath. Have to shake all my clothes to see that nothing has crawled in during the night. Feel in the toes of my slippers with the tongs. Once knew a man who found a wasp in the toe of his slipper. Repeat process with boots.

Breakfast Time.—First appearance of wasps. Desultory feeding in consequence. Everything on the table, including napkins, becomes a defensive weapon against the wasps. Some are knocked down. Uncertainty as to their being killed. They crawl and sting. Once knew a man who was stung through his stockings by a crawling wasp. Every one sits like a tailor or Turk on his chair. Ladies nervous. Pocket handkerchiefs used for hitting at wasps. Knew a man once who got a wasp in his pocket handkerchief, and it crept up his nose. Forget what became of him.

Between Breakfast and Lunch.—Wasps on the grass. Under the trees. In the sun, in the shade. Any place on the grass free from wasps is occupied by ants, or bumble-bees. They say bumble-bees don't sting. I tried one. Didn't it? Sit beside of murmuring brook. Dragon flies, fearful-looking creatures that come at you with a whirring noise. They say they don't sting. Never tried. Don't intend to.

Lunch.—More wasps. Desultory feeding as before. Helping each other by fits and starts. Hornets join the merry throng. After a time a queen wasp and king hornet, to judge by their size. The king hornet suddenly disappears; it is supposed that he is insidiously on the carpet. Luncheon finished.

Afternoon.—In the shade, flies, small but imitating wasps. In the sun, wasps and hornets. Horse-flies from three till four. Dogs try to catch wasps, and shake their heads for some time afterwards.

Dinner.—A few wasps. King hornet still unaccounted for.

Evening.—Cockchafers on the lawn; also Gnats who bite viciously. Daddy longlegs. Moths of all sizes, in-doors. Rats outside. Toads on gravel walk. All, except toads, in bed-room. See with tongs if king hornet is in my slippers. Spider on bed curtains. Daddies whirring about. Hate country. Shall at once return to my rooms and my Club in St. James's street.—Punch.

THE BURNING MOUNTAIN IN AUSTRALIA.—After wandering among the hills for a considerable time, we were at last directed to the spot, when about a mile from it, by the strong sulphurous smell borne on the wind. Turning our horses' head in that direction, we soon came upon the mountain. It was smoking and steaming in all directions, but at the time of our visit there was no fire visible. Sometimes, particularly on a dark night, the flames can be seen blazing up with a lurid glare. The subterranean fire has apparently left its former site and is gradually working under an opposite hill. Through the great fissures in the ground can be heard the fire roaring beneath like an immense furnace, and to such tremendous depths has it penetrated in some places, that if a large stone is thrown down it cannot be heard to touch the bottom, but the sound gradually dies away in the depths below. In others, a stone thrown down immediately explodes with a noise like a muffled gun. The ground everywhere is very warm, and is covered with white ashes, (said to be good for the sore backs of horses,) and all the stones lying about are so hot that it is impossible to handle them. Everything is covered with a thick coating of sulphur, and the strong sulphurous atmosphere becomes so oppressive that it is impossible to remain long on the spot. The mountain is known to have been burning for the last fifty years, and there is more than one theory as to its origin. It is, however, evidently not volcanic; at least according to the usual meaning attached to the word volcano. Without professing to be geologists, we have no doubt it is an immense coal seam on fire. Carboniferous deposits are of very frequent occurrence in the neighborhood, and the mountain range parallel with the burning mountain appears to be in a direct line with some of the coal seams in the locality of Newcastle. Having thoroughly explored the mountain and its environs, and collected a few specimens, we made our way back to the inn, amply repaid for the trouble we had taken, and should recommend all visitors of the district of Murrurundi, who delight to pry into the curiosities of nature, to pay a visit to the burning mountain.

AN operatta by a lady, Miss Virginia Gabriel, has been produced in London at German Reed's Gallery of Illustration. It is called Widows Bewitched. The lady composer, says a competent critic, is never commonplace in her melodies, but shows a power of dramatic coloring throughout, while a quartette, in which the soprano sings a florid accompaniment to the principal subject, is an elaborate piece of writing.

LATITUDE AND LONGITUDE OF SUNDAY.—Between the 55th and 59th degrees of north latitude—that is to say, between John O'Groat's House and the boundary line which divides England from Scotland—it is considered contrary to good morals and religion to play musical instruments on Sunday, or to sing any songs but sacred ones. Within these parallels of latitude whistling on Sunday is down-right impiety. Get into a train bound for the south, and in two hours time you will have left the whistling parallel behind you. You may whistle now on Sunday; you may sing what songs you please; you may play the fiddle; nay, you may even dance, and few will challenge your pleasure. It is but a twelve hours' journey from Edinburg to London. At six o'clock in the morning you are whistling over your breakfast in Prince street, and the Scotch lassie in attendance is horrified. At six o'clock in the evening you are listening to the band in Regent's Park; and thousands of English lasses are there, dressed in all their best, promenading up and down to the time. If you were to bring the Scotch lassie and show her this scene—horns blowing, drums beating, and ten thousand couples sweethearting under the trees—she would draw in her breath and exclaim: "Eh, gude be here! Did ever ony body see the like—playing polkas on Sunday? I wonder whaur they expect to gang to!" But now in turn take one of these English lasses over with you to Paris; move her from where the longitude is 0 to the 6th parallel east, and she will be as much shocked to see the Parisians going to the theatre on Sunday evening as the Scotch lassie was to see the Londoners promenading in Regent's Park and listening to polkas. A few degrees of latitude make a difference one way; a few degrees of longitude make a difference another. Go north, and you mustn't whistle; come south, and you may play the fiddle; move sideways a little, toward the east, and you may whistle, play the fiddle, and go to the play. Which parallel rules the right morality in this matter I will not pretend to decide.

ENGLISH HOMES.—A provincial correspondent of a London paper draws a picture of English country life and city people in the following paragraph: "This place is one of those 'ancestral homes of England, which are the admiration of foreigners and our own glory and pride, being the very perfection of luxury and comfort. The French, as a rule, see very little of our interior life—at least, such literary men as enlighten the world upon 'England and the English' see and know very little of it; they mostly judge us by our London life, than which there cannot be a greater mistake, if the object is to acquire an idea of an English lady or gentleman at home. How often have I noticed the change which has come over the hard committee-working member of Parliament, when his carriage-wheels have passed his lodge gate. Every Englishman of position is a country gentleman at heart; he lives in the country, he works in town. There is something more cordial in the shake of his hand when he stands in the old hall, accoutred in his shooting jacket, and his smile is more genial at dinner, when he motions to you to sit next his firm friend, the rector. Then 'my lady' has time to talk, with sympathy and kindness, of your far-away brother in India. She bids you come with her and tell her all about his engagement, and his prospects, while she is drawing on her gardening gloves; for she is going, the first thing after breakfast, to cut the flowers herself in the green-house. The gay lady has doffed her 'silk attire,' and walks about in a linen dress and a plain straw hat. A great deal of conventionality vanishes away when you see her 'at home,' but really in her own house, among her neighbors, rich and poor."

MODERN VENICE.—"Glorious as Venice is, she wears a frown even to the stranger's eye. The people look moody. There is no sort of friendly relation between them and the Austrians. Soldiers patrol the streets and the great piazza night and day; cannon frown under the historic arcades of the ducal palace, and an imperial gunboat lies off the molo. The excellent bands of the Austrian regiments discourse sweet music on the Place of St. Mare, but no voice rises in applause. One fancies that the people know this is a part of the ladi which politic despots use, in all ages, to make their subjects forget their slavery. It is evident Austria feels by no means secure in the possession of this 'gem of the sea.'" Correspondent of the London Times.

CAT EXCHANGE.—Amongst the curious old institutions still extant, in Florence, is a house of refuge for cats. It is a cloister situated on the side of the church of San Lorenzo. When you wish to get rid of one of these interesting quadrupeds, instead of killing it, you send it to that interesting establishment. On the other hand, when you want a feline companion, you have only to go there to find a complete assortment of tabbies, tortoise-shells, blacks, whites, grays, and every other color usual to the race of cats. There will be seen old cats, middle-aged cats, and cats just budding into youth; Angoras as well as the common species; in short, every variety of the species is plentiful in that unique institution.

WILD CHERRY,

HAS BEEN USED FOR

NEARLY HALF A CENTURY,

With the most astonishing success in curing

Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of

The Throat, Lungs and Chest,

INCLUDING EVEN

CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last-named and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the "medicinal gum" of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaints is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great the popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry there are commingled with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of

has induced many physcians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

FOREIGN MUSICAL ITEMS.

THE Round Table has the following:

THE professorship of music at Edinburgh University, with a salary of £1,000, is vacant, and the fact gives the Orchestra a reason—or, rather, an excuse—for indulging in the following fling: "The Almighty has been denied his rights in the matter of music by the whole Scottish nation. With the Scots music is not worship-music; it is not an order that the Almighty is entitled to receive as his right, and in obedience to his command. Whenever this delusion exists in any nation, there is no national advance in music, and there is no composer. Scotland, so long as she nourishes this prejudice to herself, will stand without music among the nations of Europe. She is too puritanically pious to evoke the Satanic school of musical art; she will never sing of adultery and murder with the nerve and élan of a Meyerbeer, a Verdi, or a Gounod. She will never give birth to an organ fugue of Bach—for she hates the organ, and pronounces on the Psalms, in which the word appears, with all the bland disbelief of a Colenso. She will never have any great singers, for she drawls through her own ballad psalms, and reads those of God Almighty. She prefers 'Jessie, the Flower of Dumblane' to the songs of David the son of Jesse. What more need be said? If people will go in for all praying, and make a routine of their own as to singing, such must be the inevitable result. If Scotland desires to have music she must make the foundation right, or the superstructure will be all wrong. Music, to attain its real and high destiny with the nation, must form a prominent portion of her order in divine worship, and the senate of the university should endeavor to adapt the duties of their professor in music to this end."

THE other day a batch of musical and dramatic Chevaliers of the Legion of Honor was made in Paris. Those included in the distinction were MM. Montigny (the director of the Gymnase,) Lockroy, Mermet (composer of "Roland,") Barbier, and Duprey. The work which will be shortly presented by the latter is now said not to be the much-talked-of "Samson," but a "Jeanne d'Arc." The heroine of the tale is admirably suited for French opera. His poet is M. Méry, aided by a collaborateur.

THE Conservatory at Munich has been annihilated by royal ordinance, whether to be reconstructed on principles of "the future" or not, time will show. It is to be divided, says the Gazette Musicale, into three distinct schools: a singing and dramatic, an instrumental, and a theoretical school.

"OPERA DI CAMERA" has reappeared at its old quarters, the "Gallery of Illustration," London, under Mr. German Reed's management. The two pieces now being played are Widows Bewitched, by the lady known as Virginia Gabriel, and a farce of Offenbach, known as Ching-chowhi.

CAROLINE FERNI, formerly celebrated as a violinist, has been selected to sing the part of "Selika" at the production of "L'Africaine" in Bologna. A burlesque of this opera, by the way, is announced at a London theatre.

THE Abbé Liszt was announced to superintend the production of his Oratorio, "St. Elizabeth," at Pesth, and then return to Rome to take office as director of the music of the Papal chapel.

MR. JOHN HULLAH and Dr. Wylde are mentioned as candidates for the chair of music in the University of Edinburgh, vacant by the death of Professor Donaldson.

A NEW opera called John of Naples has been produced at Prague. The music is by Herr Sulzer.

THE name of Signor Coriolano Zimalo comes from Trieste as the name of a tenor of promise.

TITIENS, Sinico, Mario, Bossi, and Sautley are giving a season of opera in Manchester.

FROM the N. Y. Review we clip the following:

M. BAGIER has arranged matters with the members of his Band in Paris. A trifling additament to their salaries has worked wonders. There are now no further orchestral difficultics. Three new ballets are already named: "Le Basilic," in one act, the music by M. le Comte Graziani, in which Mdlle. Urbon will sustain the principal part; "Les Noces Valaques," composed by Signor Matiozzi; and "Les Elements," the music by M. Pugni, and Madame Grédelue-Mérante as principal danseuse.

TAYLOR, the opera-manager—at London, in the last century—was once present, at a dinner, when several of the guests were discussing "the death penalty." One of the disputants suddenly asked him, "What would you inflict, then, on a criminal of the worst kind?" "By Jove!" cried Taylor, suddenly, "make him manager of the Opera House. If he deserve a worse punishment, he must be a devil incarnate."

M. ALBERT GRISAR'S Les Porcherons—an opera in high favor many years ago at the Opéra-Comique—has been most successfully revived in Paris. The chief characters are now sustained by Mesdames Galli-Marie, Belia, and Revilly, MM. Montaubry, Sainte-Foy, Crosti and Bataille. Madame Gennetier, after a congé of three months, has returned to the Opéra-Comique and made her reappearance in Galathée.

THE ASIATIC CHOLERA.

WHAT IT IS, AND HOW TO MANAGE IT.

THE DIAGNOSIS.

THE first two stages of cholera consist of, first, diarrhœa; secondly, of a species of vomiting, wherein the patient does not generally experience nausea, but simply throws off fluid from the stomach, as in the emetic operations which accompany dyspepsia or indigestion; then commence the cramps, which, in some cases, are not very severe, in others frightful and most agonizing; this stage almost immediately succeeds the evacuations of what has been aptly termed "rice water," from its similitude to that substance; and indicates conclusively that the natural fœces have been entirely discharged. This fluid is thrown off from the multitude of minute blood-vessels situated on the surface of the intestines, and consists of the serum—a fluid principle of the blood. It is the discharge of this fluid, which, from the commencement of the diarrhœa, incorporating with the ordinary contents of the bowels, causes the fluid state of the evacuations, which pass generally without pain or much inconvenience, and, therefore, cause no alarm until the whole fluid portion of the blood is thus discharged; superinducing the third stage of debility, cramps, blue skin, loss of pulse, cold sweats, clenched fingers, cold tongue, and an indescribable coldness of the whole body. The vomiting still continues, with continued evacuations, violent cramps, difficult breathing, and loss of the power of speech, and a terrible loss of the substance around the eyes, causing them to sink even deeper than those of a corpse; and this in so short a space as to be incredible to those who may not have witnessed it.

And this is the effect of the diarrhœa, which is so insidious as to give no concern to the patient until the vomitings commence, and which produces, nevertheless, the loss of all the circulating fluid of the blood-vessels, and those terrible results called "cholera." In fact, the disease is not cholera-morbus, but rather a diarrhœa of an insidious and most extraordinary character; and, had it originated in this country, or in Europe, would, no doubt, have been so considered and classified; but the Asiatics (indifferent judges in such matters) are so wanting in reflection that they observe only the sensible changes which appear toward the close; and disregard the diarrhœa, being so free from pain, and not calculated to excite alarm, but which is nevertheless the real malady.

To illustrate more clearly my idea of this disease, I will state the effects produced by the operation of bleeding with the lancet, until faintness is produced; then indicate the similitude of this state with the cholera, and afterwards point out the difference in the symptoms, and the causes of that difference.

When the lancet is inserted in the arm of a patient to effect a copious flow of blood, he experiences no inconvenience until a considerable quantity has been taken away; and if he should be lying down, the quantity may be quite large before any constitutional effect manifests itself. In surgical practice, when it is desirable to produce faintness, the patient is bled standing, and the effect is more rapid, caused by the gravitation of the blood, which, in an erect posture, inclines downwards, leaving the brain, heart and lungs without stimulus; faintness is the immediate consequence; but in a recumbent position, these organs maintain their action for a much longer time, because the loss of a considerable quantity is required before the volume of circulating fluid is sufficiently reduced to cause a suspension of the functions of those vital organs, and to produce syncope or fainting. After some minutes, the arteries contract upon the reduced mass of blood, re-establishing the relation between their capacity and their contents; the circulation recommences, the patient revives, and, maintaining a horizontal position, is soon relieved.

But any one who has been present at this phenomenon of syncope will have noted the cramps and nausea which generally accompany it; in this case, the surface of the patient is very pale, while in cholera it is equally remarkable for the blue color of the whole surface. The reason is obvious: in the evacuations of water by means of the copious sweats and the diarrhœa, all the coloring matter of the blood remains behind, and for the want of fluid ceases to circulate; the arteries continuing to pulsate, precipitate these particles into the minutest vessels, and there deposit the oxygen they may have acquired in passing through the lungs, and absorb carbon, which imparts the blue color to the skin; and this change of color is the only difference there is between the last symptoms of cholera and those of excessive blood-letting.

THE REMEDY.

Let me here say that these curative directions may be relied on. I have seen, professionally, two or three hundred cases, and many more in hospitals. In my own practice I have not lost a single one.

Summarily, remember always, that this disease is of the intestines solely, commencing with diarrhœa until two or three evacuations per day, causing, generally, no pains, and so slight as to cause no alarms. This is strictly, and in itself, the disease; and in distinction from ordinary diarrhœa must be stopped; and this cannot be done with too great promptness.

Indeed, immediately that the epidemic influence manifests itself in a community, the inhabitants should adopt a stringent diet, avoid all purgatives and every purgative element, living principally on rice in its various modes of preparation, fresh meats (that is, not salted,) roasted or boiled, or beef or mutton. Boiled eggs, chicken broth or soup, very little salted, and warm drinks in place of cold ones. Avoid as poisonous all acid fruits and vegetables. Even potatoes have been discharged undigested after a lapse of twenty hours, and that by a robust man, previously of good health. Every kind of fermented drink, as beer, ale, porter, and cider, is also very bad. In no case, during the prevalence of the disease, should warm or fresh bread be used, and none less than a day old.

Should one feel attacks, by the diarrhœa or dysentery, the most perfect quiet in bed should be enjoined with a light and nutritious diet, with warm drinks, with injections of laudanum in one or two tablespoonfuls of warm water—a dose of laudanum being a teaspoonful to a tablespoonful, according to the force of the diarrhœa. If, with this treatment, the diarrhœa is checked, although the debility of the stomach continues, or, so to speak, the inclination to vomit, it is of no consequence; the same thing occurs in taking blood from a patient in the ordinary way. His nausea is of no importance, neither his faintness and prostration, provided the bleeding is stopped, because so soon as this is effected, all these cease spontaneously. So, in this disease, suppressing the discharge from the blood vessels of the intestinal canal by opiate and astringent injections, the patient is saved. At the same time he might take ten or twelve drops of saturated tincture of camphor, as a restorative and anti-spasmodic cordial, every hour, until it produces a copious perspiration. At the same time he should be kept well covered in bed with hot bricks or bottles of hot water at his feet.

An excellent preparation to stop the diarrhœa is the chalk mixture, and is prepared of half ounce of prepared chalk; half ounce of tincture of kino; half ounce of elixir paregoric; two drachms powder gum arabic; two drachms powder sugar; three ounces peppermint water.

In cases of violent diarrhœa, a wineglassful may be taken at once; when not so violent, a tablespoonful every two hours, or oftener, if the evacuations continue.

Mustard plasters on the bowels, when there is much pain, are of excellent effect.

As soon as the patient feels himself relieved, he believes himself cured and able to go about his usual occupations, and is generally anxious to go out; this, however, is extremely hazardous; and, that the cure may be thorough and complete, he should be kept in bed and wholly quiet for, at least, two or three days; a relapse is fatal.

I should caution against the use of laudanum by the mouth, in place of injection, first, because its action is less prompt upon the intestines, the seat of the disease; and, secondly, if taken into the stomach it obstructs and oppresses its functions, confuses the brain, and renders respiration difficult—while, by injection, none of these evils are perceptible.

The chalk mixture, in many cases, is all that is necessary, if administered early; but the opiate injections are invaluable, and the camphor ought to be taken at the same time.

It is necessary to inculcate the greatest cleanliness of person and habitation; quietude of mind: to avoid fruits and vegetables; not to use strong or fermented liquors, or to eat, except very lightly: thus an attack will be avoided, and when not so, it will be rendered less dangerous.

BATHING IN BELGIUM.—In Belgium, men and women, grotesquely clad, bathe together as freely as if water were their natural element. At Blakenberg, you will see the bridegroom come forth from his baignoir, leading his bride by the hand, and steadying her amid the surf. The father dips his daughters, and the most modest demoiselles in the world, from a neighboring machine, gladly avail themselves of his polite services. Sometimes a harmless acquaintanceship is struck up amongst the waves, to be perfected on dry land as occasion may offer. At the baths of Pfeffer, young men and maidens, old men and children, sit in the healing waters promiscuously, while tables of wood, bearing a newspaper or a cup of coffee, are gently floated to them, along the surface, at their call. At Dieppe, the weather-beaten bather, with his coarse blue shirt and sun-burned hat, waits patiently for the lady issuing from her marine chamber, fancifully clad, and often wearing even her necklace and rings. He listens, with his bucket in hand, while she tells him how the sea-water is to be thrown. With one it is the head, with another the arms, chest, or nape of the neck, that is first to be perfused; and another stands like a rock, while pail after pail is dashed upon the small of her back. Then, if she is young, the bather gives her a lesson on swimming, and bids her rely on the motion of her arms, and leave her feet entirely to his direction, while he guides them after the semblance of a frog.

AN INTERESTING LETTER.

Very few persons, even among physicians, would have been willing upon any terms to have been in the condition of the writer of the following letter on the 14th of February last. I will anticipate somewhat his report of the facts, by saying that on the 15th August, 1865, he made me a visit, "the very picture of health." Time, which tries and proves all things, has sufficiently tested this case, and shown that neither relapse or collapse having followed, the cure is perfect, and can be cited among the scores of similar cases, the result of my improved mode of treating disease without medicine.

G. M. BOURNE,
Water Cure Physician,
No. 10, Masonic Temple, Post street.
August 27, 1865.

Sacramento, April 30, 1865.

Dr. G. M. Bourne—Dear Sir: It is with pleasure and satisfaction that I now let you know of my good health. Looking back on what I have passed through, it seems as if I was lifted from the grave, and I think it my duty to acknowledge to you and the world the benefit I derived from water treatment as administered by you in your celebrated baths. It was in August, 1864, when disease developed itself with a severe cough. I then took medicines getting worse, with chills, fevers, loss of strength, and was pronounced consumptive. This set me to thinking, and finally I determined to leave my business and go to the Sandwich Islands, having been informed that I could not be cured here. I went to San Francisco, and while waiting for a ship, called upon Dr. Bourne, who stated that a trip to the Sandwich Islands would probably result disastrously, was wholly unnecessary, as I could then be speedily cured at his establishment. I placed myself under his treatment, and in one week was so much improved that I thought I could risk returning home and to my duty as Engineer on the Central Pacific Railroad. The doctor objected; but I thought I knew better, and returned to my duty. In about two weeks my cough returned, and I kept getting worse, and, contrary to Dr. Bourne's injunction never to take medicine again, committed that folly, and soon was so completely run down that I could scarcely walk; so, as a last resort, I concluded once more to try the Water Cure. I went to San Francisco—few of my friends expected me to return; in fact, I thought my return doubtful. On arriving at Dr. Bourne's establishment (February 14, 1865,) I was not able to get into the bath without assistance, but in a few days I began to gain. I remained with him only six weeks, when I left, "a wiser and a better man," without the aid of medicine. I have now been at work several weeks, and find that I am gaining every day, and at present bid fair to be stouter than ever before. Persons visiting the Doctor's establishment will find it just what it should be, in both Ladies' and Gentlemen's Departments, and I cannot say too much in praise of the Doctor's kind attention to his patients. This letter I write for the benefit of the afflicted, to be used as the Doctor decides, and should it be the means of directing any one to his care and treatment who (as they assuredly will) find relief, I will be paid for my trouble. Your obedient servant,

JAMES CAMPBELL,
Engineer Central Pacific Railroad.

San Francisco, August 25, 1865.

Advised by the undersigned, Mr. James Campbell, of the Central Pacific Railroad (who was then in a most deplorable state of ill health,) placed himself under the care of Dr. Bourne, the Water Cure Physician. Some six months or more afterward he visited this city, when I accidentally met him at Dr. Bourne's establishment, and, I am happy to say, restored to the enjoyment of good health and in fine spirits.

JOHN SULLIVAN.

☞ Dr. Bourne treats all diseases of the throat, chest, and lungs—which includes diphtheria, bronchitis, incipient consumption, pleurisy, croup, etc.—with the greatest success. Great relief is afforded in advanced stages of consumption. Rheumatism, paralysis, neuralgia, fever and ague, dropsy, etc., etc., are also cured quickly, pleasantly, and economically. No medicine whatever.

DENTIST WORK.—Messrs. Knowles & Clark have an improved method of combining their gold and Alcanite material in the manufacture of dentistry, which renders the work superior in finish and durability. The samples of their handiwork on exhibition at the late Fair were much admired, and we observe that they were awarded a special premium silver medal.—Mining and Scientific Press.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

A TRUE STORY.

DEDICATED TO THE SICK.

THERE dwelt in Sacramento a pale, bilious mechanic,
His muscles were strengthless, his blood it was chill,
And the wife of his bosom believed, in her panic,
The husband she worshipped was hopelessly ill.
Seeking daily for help, in her wifely devotion,
All vainly she tried pill, powder and potion—
Till at last, when a prey to grief's wildest emotion,
Of HOSTETTER'S BITTERS she heard from a friend.

She purchased the cordial, half hoping, half fearing,
A prayer on her lip and a tear in her eye;
And taking his hand, with words kindly and cheering,
Besought him the tonic for her sake to try.
As he drank, a new life through his system seemed stealing,
Each following draft did its mission of healing,
Until, strong in health and most grateful in feeling,
He told the "true story" here twined into song.

It is also proper to state that the Bitters are sold exclusively in glass, and never, under any circumstances, by the gallon or barrel. Imposters and imitators are abroad, and the only safeguard the public have against them is to see that the Bitters they buy have the engraved label and note of hand of Messrs. Hostetter & Smith, and their proprietary stamp over the cork of the bottle.

A DAINTY BRANCH OF ART.—A high reputation awaits Mrs. Read for the exquisite workmanship and general adaptability to their purpose of the Ladies' Skirt Supporters and Chest Expanders, of which she made such fine display at the late Fair. Her "Lady's Bust" is another aid to feminine beauty, which confers perfection on the wearer. Mrs. Read's establishment, 109 Montgomery street, is richly worth a visit.—San Francisco Sunday Mercury.

MANY OF THE DISEASES which hitherto baffled and defied the highest medical skill, are now speedily cured by Dr. H. A. BENTON, whose processes of applying electricity receive the approbation of all prominent physicians. The nerves are directly reached, and patients suffering from chronic complaints find almost immediate relief, and rapidly recover their former healthy condition. Dr. Benton is a physician of excellent reputation, and as a Medical Electrician occupies the front rank in his profession.—Golden Era.

TRIMMINGS.—Mrs. NORCROSS, No. 5 Masonic Temple, Montgomery street, is prepared to fill orders for civic and military at the shortest notice; also, invites the ladies to call and examine trimmings for Opera Cloaks received per steamer from New York. Mrs. Norcross has a Show Case on exhibition at the Fair, containing goods which for elegance and taste are not surpassed by any other establishment on the Pacific coast.—San Francisco Leader, Sept. 16th.

TOYS.—Toys can be purchased of Feldbush & Co., 307 California street, at 25 per cent. below the usual rates. Call and examine stock and prices.

DR. C. W. MOORE'S MEDICAL AND SURGICAL INSTITUTE.—In speaking of this Institution, the Sunday Mercury says: "Aside from the most skilful treatment and nursing, the large, airy and elegantly-furnished rooms, will enable the patients to enjoy all the comforts and luxuries of a home. All in all, we regard Dr. Moore and his Institute a most valuable acquisition to the Pacific Coast—the need of which we have long since felt." See advertisement.

MONEY TO LOAN.—$5,000 to loan, in small sums, on City Property, for a term of years; repayments received in monthly instalments. Deposits received at 1 per cent per month from month to month. Apply to the California Building and Loan Society, 406 Montgomery street, opposite Wells, Fargo & Co's.

TO THE LADIES OF CALIFORNIA.

IT IS A FACT, which all should know, that
Washing may be Done for Half the Cost,
and in half the time, required by pursuing the method now in use. An enormous waste of time and materials attends the old and ordinary process. And this is not because a better method is not known, but because housewives persist in treading in the beaten track followed by their mothers and grandmothers before them, opposing every change, and refusing even TO MAKE A FAIR TRIAL of those new inventions which scientific research has produced.

If the housekeepers of San Francisco and of the State will try the

California Washing Extract,

simply by way of experiment, they will be amazed to find how much unnecessary labor may be saved by its use. It may be obtained at all the principal Groceries of the city, or in quantities of the Agents, HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN.

The use of the EXTRACT renders "rubbing," "pounding," "washboards," and all the severe drudgery of the usual method quite unnecessary. It thoroughly cleanses, without injuring the clothes. In short, it works such wonders as no one will credit without witnessing them. All that the inventor asks of any doubting housewife is

A SINGLE TRIAL.

The following certificate from the State Assayer, furnished after an analysis of the EXTRACT, speaks for itself:

A. ENQUOIS—Dear Sir: I have examined the sample of liquid handed me, and find it free from acid or any substance that would be injurious to clothing.
Very respectfully, B. B. THAYER.

OF THE

SEWING MACHINES!

Campaign of 1865!

FIRST PREMIUM

AWARDED THE FLORENCE!

AT THE

State Fair of California,

BY A COMMITTEE COMPOSED OF THE

BEST MECHANICAL TALENT OF THE STATE.

THE REPORT:

"FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE.—After a careful investigation of this NEW AND BEAUTIFUL MACHINE, viewing it as we do in a mechanical point of view, we consider that it is in many respects worthy of much praise, particularly that portion of its mechanical arrangement by which the REVERSIBLE motion is obtained, which is simplicity itself, and in our opinion worthy of special consideration; also, the

COMPLETE AND POSITIVE CONTROL OVER THE TENSION,

as exhibited in this Machine, along with the mechanical arrangement for taking up the slack of the thread, as was shown in sewing without any alteration, and without any stoppage of Machine,

FROM THE FINEST LACE TO FOUR THICKNESSES OF LEATHER.

"Your Committee, therefore, after a close and careful investigation, consider it ONE OF THE BEST AND MOST IMPORTANT IMPROVED MACHINES NOW IN USE.

"We, therefore, in view of the above facts, award it FIRST AND HIGHEST PREMIUM.

MERCANTILE LIBRARY ASSOCIATION.

Building Fund.

AT A MEETING OF THE BOAD OF TRUSTEES of the Mercantile Library Association, held October 10th, 1865, it was unanimously
Resolved, That the Trustees form themselves into a Committee of the Whole, to obtain Life Memberships and Donations, with a view of purchasing a lot and erecting a building thereon for the use of the Association.
The payment of one hundred dollars in gold coin secures a Life Membership, and it is hoped that the sum of twenty thousand dollars may be subscribed in this way alone. No subscriptions are binding unless the above sum shall be raised by Life Memberships and Donations before February 1, 1866. THE POET'S DELAY.

BY H. D. THOREAU.

IN vain I see the morning rise,
In vain observe the western blaze,
Who idly look to other skies,
Expecting life by other ways.

Amidst such boundless wealth without,
I only still am poor within,
The birds have sung their summer out,
But still my spring does not begin.

Shall I then wait the autumn wind,
Compelled to seek a milder day,
And leave no curious nest behind,
No woods still echoing to my lay.

THE MOUSE-TRAP.

"WE that have free souls, it touches us not."

HAMLET—Act III., Scene 2.

WE are glad to observe that the Alta shows signs of improvement. A philanthropist of the name of David Chrystal is contributing to the Alta a series of communications entitled, "How to Conduct a Newspaper." These papers are characterized by much sound sense, couched in better English than we are in the habit of reading in the Alta. The spelling is distorted, we are inclined to believe, in the office, or else Mr. David Chrystal is making fun of the Alta. Since these hints as to the manner in which a newspaper should be conducted have appeared, we have noticed an extraordinary improvement in at least one department of the Alta. The paragraphs in the local column are written in decent English. David Chrystal is engaged in a great and praiseworthy undertaking; we wish him God speed in it. In David Chrystal, the Alta is entertaining an angel unawares. The remarks of this writer on the subject of poetry are extremely just. We take the liberty of correcting his spelling. He says:

"We often hear people saying 'I should like to learn to be a poet.' Such an expression is utterly ridiculous; the gift of making poetry is a natural inheritance to some persons, and unless a person has that natural gift he or she never can be a poet; a person may learn to form words into verses, but verses are not always poems. A verse never can be called a poem unless it is composed of sublime, sentimental language, and before a person can give utterance to such language, he or she must be possessed of an immortal spirit and a soul filled with sentiment and love."

We are quite sure that David Chrystal is not one of the editorial corps of the Alta; his style is far too correct to admit of such a supposition. This writer understands the English language, and simply misspells words for the purpose of smuggling a contraband article—good sense—into the Alta. David Chrystal's description of the nature of a poet is far too good to be disfigured by bad spelling. What a sad reflection that this really original and talented writer in order to secure the publication of his articles in the Alta, is forced to pretend to be an uneducated boor! The Alta thinks him a fool, and therefore publishes his lucubrations to make people laugh at him. Poor Alta! Is the following the utterance of a fool?

"Immortality is that part of a being which is capable of surviving this life; all human beings are not able to do that. The human race were by nature immortal, but a great part of them has cast away immortality for the sake of momentary things. No man or woman is immortal unless they have a spirit within them capable of transporting itself to the spirit world; all poets are possessed of such a spirit. A person never can compose poetry unless he has thrilling emotions within his soul, and such emotions never can exist within a person's mind unless his soul can wander and see visions."

We admire this Chrystal philosophy, and are as unwilling as David Chrystal to admit that every biped without feathers has an immortal soul. That every human being has a germ of immortality in him we may admit, but to concede that the degraded Digger Indian, or the Tartar possesses such a soul as that which animated Shakspeare, is a stretch of charity of which we confess we are incapable. We hope the Alta has not discovered that David Chrystal is no fool, and on that account discontinued publishing his very sensible and original communications.

SATANELLA, the sprightly New York correspondent of the Call, in her last letter to that paper, says that the Hon. Mr. Mercer, of Washington Territory, has chartered the steamer Continental, for the purpose of conveying a thousand young ladies to the Pacific Coast, via Magellan Straits. The Call styles this proceeding "a scandalous operation." It says: "One thousand women thrown ashore on this coast, without friends, acquaintances, money, or recommendations, might, for all practical purposes, as well be thrown into the Bay." This is pretty rough language for a nice, quiet, inoffensive little paper like the Call to use. What on earth is the editor of the Call frightened at? Even supposing the thousand young ladies were landed in San Francisco, he need not marry one of them unless he felt so disposed. To talk of throwing one thousand young ladies into the Bay is shocking. We think the Call is needlessly alarmed. Mr. Mercer probably knows what he is about, and will take his cargo where there is a market for it. As he is from Washington Territory, he probably knows whether or not one thousand young ladies are likely to meet with one thousand husbands on their arrival. It is exceedingly rash in the Call to say that Mr. Mercer "must either be a rascal or a philanthropic fool to engage in the business he is now in." His motives can scarcely be mercenary, as he takes his passengers on credit, simply making them give bonds for the payment of $25 each, as soon as they earn it. These women will probably be at least as well off in Washington Territory as they were in the Eastern States, and, even if some of them stay in this city, the Call will gain by it, as they will probably advertise for situations in the columns of that paper. You never thought of that, little Call, eh? Mercer isn't such a bad fellow after all, is he? Don't talk of pitching one thousand women into the Bay, when they represent one thousand advertising squares.

THE publishers of THE CALIFORNIAN are not as kind and considerate to young poets as they might be. They allowed "Mark Twain," last week, to make fun of Paul Duoir's beautiful poem about his sweetheart. When young poets send them poems of thirty or forty verses, and ask them to publish them—send them to them without charging a cent for them—they snub the young poets. Would we be guilty of such cruelty? No! The MOUSE-TRAP is ever open to young newspaper poets—not that newspaper poets are to be ranked as vermin, no! "John Smith," "a discharged soldier," sent them a beautiful poem this week, with an accompanying note. Did they comply with his request, and publish the verses which led to his becoming "a discharged soldier," after an examination into the condition of his brain? Not they. Were not the MOUSE-TRAP a little crowded, we would gladly publish the whole of John Smith's poem. As it is, we can only afford space for the first, and last verse but one. John Smith borrowed this poem, we are well aware; but he has so improved it, that he may fairly claim it as his own. This young poet may, in course of time, become a sufficient master of the modern art of poetry, to learn to make a poem out of lines from a hundred different poets, so that no one will be able to find out where he stole them from. If he has industry and perseverance, he may become, in the course of fifteen or sixteen years, quite an adept in manufacturing patent poetry, but we fear he will never make his living at it:

"The moon had just gone down, sir,
But the stars lit up the sky;
All was still in tent and town, sir,
Not a rebel could we spy.
It was our turn at picket,
So we marched into the thicket,
To the music of the cricket,
Chirping nigh, chirping nigh."

"A youth, a very boy, sir,
Some pretty school-girl's toy, sir,
Had ventured there to die.
We hated one another;
But I heard him murmur mother,
So I stooped and called him brother.
No reply."

THERE are sixty-nine citizens of San Francisco resident in the vicinity of the intersection of Market and Second streets, who rejoice in the possession of a cultivated musical taste. These sixty-nine citizens, on Monday last, sent in a petition to the Board of Supervisors, praying for the abatement of a nuisance at Gilbert's Museum. They say this nuisance consists in "a hideous and disturbing noise constantly kept up;" that this noise is "dignified by the proprietors of the establishment alluded to as music, but it is in fact the discordant, tiresome and wretched effort of a hurdy-gurdy and bass drum, which, to ears forced to listen to the hideous sounds, is well calculated to occasion great annoyance, disgust, and irritation, and to a degree that destroys all peace and quiet." Now, here is a difference of opinion. The proprietors of Gilbert's Museum say that the sounds produced constitute music, while sixty-nine persons say "it is in fact the discordant, tiresome and wretched effort of a hurdy-gurdy and bass drum." Perhaps these sixty-nine residents have no ear for music, and, were the proprietors of Gilbert's Museum to engage a full orchestra under the leadership of Tony Reiff to perform operatic selections, would vote the arrangement a nuisance. We do not believe that the Supervisors can do more than order the proprietors of Gilbert's Museum to have the hurdy-gurdy tuned and engage a competent performer on the bass drum. This is a free country, and if the sixty-nine residents do not like hurdy-gurdies and bass drums, they can move. If the Board of Supervisers humored them so far as to suppress the hurdy-gurdy and bass drum as a nuisance, would they be satisfied? Not they. They'd want the bear ded lady suppressed as a nuisance next. We don't believe in people being so nasty particular; they ought not to be humored in their notions. We all have our trials, and blessed are they whose trials take no severer form than the "wretched effort of a hurdy-gurdy and bass drum."

THE Grass Valley National devotes a column daily to the subject of suicide. The editor does not exactly approve of suicide, he says, but we must say that the object of the three editorials on the subject which appeared on three consecutive days seemed to be to defend suicide as right and proper under certain circumstances. Since we read those editorials we have taken up the National with fear and trembling, expecting each day that the announcement of the editor's having cut his throat would meet our eye. Up to the last advices received from Grass Valley, he still lived; if he does not make away with himself we must say that we think he has sadly wasted the time which he occupied in writing such an elaborate defence of self-murder. The waiter at the Louisiana Rotisserie, who committed suicide on Wednesday, by taking laudanum, evidently was of the opinion that when a man became tired of life he had a right to die. A jury will scarcely bring in a verdict of temporary insanity against a man who could write such a note as the following:

To the Coroner of San Francisco: I, Henri Roquette de Kerguidn, have killed myself for the only reason that I was tired of life. Don't blame nobody for it.

HENRI ROQUETTE DE KERGUIDN.

October 30th, 1865.

Henri de Kerguidn was tired of life, and therefore got rid of it. That was all.

THE feelings of the public have been most shamefully trifled with. We confess to having a respect for the Bulletin, and are therefore unwilling to believe that an account of the death of one of the most respected and popular residents of San Francisco was published in that paper, on Thursday evening, with an eye to the profits which would accrue from the sale of an extra edition. We would rather believe that the statement that "Bummer"—he whom the citizens of San Francisco delighted to honor, he to whom the City Fathers had tendered the freedom of the city—was dead, was made in good faith. The reporter may have, from his sighs, drawn the conclusion that he was about to draw his last breath. Bummer is not dead. He may yet recover to roam in unmuzzled freedom round the city, and muzzle rats. We are glad that the false report of the death of Bummer afforded the Bulletin an opportunity of showing what it could do in the obituary notice line. The notice of the death of Bummer, far surpassed in elegance of style and felicitousness of expression, that called forth by the death of England's greatest statesman. The pet vagabond of San Francisco received more honorable notice at the hands of the Bulletin, than did the Premier of Great Britain. But Bummer lives to prove the falsity of newspaper reports; we fear that when he at length leaves this sphere for the Dog Star where his much loved Lazarus awaits him, the obituary which his death will draw forth from the newspapers will, in point of merit and intensity of feeling, fall far short of those which his recent false start for the abode of departed canines caused to be published.

WHERE do all the "sharp sayings" which appear in the newspapers come from? We constantly observe a string of truisms under the above title going the rounds of the press. This is the style of thing: "An eagle does not feed upon flies." That's very true; on the contrary, an eagle flies upon his feed. Here is another: "He who will eat a nut must crack it." The man who wrote that was not sharp. Fools crack nuts, and smart men eat the kernels. We don't believe it is very difficult to write "sharp sayings," judging from the specimens we see.

TREM.

GUERRILLAS IN OUR TOWN.

ONE day last spring, E. and I were in the garden, scouting over the strawberry bed, lifting leaves, peering into verdant corners for a pink cheek among the myriad upturned green ones. We found three, but the bloom was hectic—the under side was hard and brown. We said: "How cruel Nature is; she never answers our longings. Next week, there will be bushels, and we will not care for them." Standing still under a luxuriant cherry-tree, we listened to the soothing hum of the bees in the raspberry bushes, stripped off handfuls of veined gooseberries, asking one another dreamily: "Do you love gooseberry pie?"

Tremendous cliffs of white cloud were piled up on "blue meadows of repose;" a distant bird's shrill note piereed the depths of air like a haut-boy; the mellow voice of a contraband, rippled by the breeze, bore to our ears "Rally 'Round the Flag, Boys." A tattered Old Glory drooped from its staff just beyond the fence, while in the heart of the town there was a murmur not a whit more stirring than the bee-buz. But, suddenly, the melodious hum, the bird-note, the song, were drowned in a rash of horses' feet on the macadamized street, a wild voice shrieking something; it might have been "Woe! Woe!" for what we could tell. Yells and shouts followed the cry; the clattering hoofs multiplied.

"Richmond is taken!" said E., with a sparkle of triumph in her eye.

"No; guerrillas!" I cried; and away we went, forgetting the hostility of dewy grass to the hems of immaculate morning robes.

Mamma was on the front porch, with the pale little children huddled around her, begging to know what was the matter; all spell-bound, except a troop of young Africans, who scampered like rabbits in the direction of the melee. We followed as a more dignified metaphor up the long walk, and were in time to see a solitary horseman riding furiously, shouting as he rode, followed by four armed men. Before we reached the gate, thirty others came up the hill with presented arms gleaming in the sun. Glancing warily around, they swept past, and down Main street. Truly, they were gallant gentlemen if the fine horse makes the nobleman, though variety rather than elegance characterized their dress; brown jeans, black cloth, white and red shirts, blue overcoats, rusty canteens, bundles of plunder, caps, soft-crowns, cylinders of civilization, danced prismatically before our eyes; while the vivifying streak of gleaming barrels struck on the sense with an icy jar. We went down to the turn which commands a view of our principal thoroughfare from end to end, sat down on two posts, and waited events. Our neighbor over the way came running out of the shop, where he was making a coffin: his daughters, dressed in yellow, took a stand under a tree, while at a respectful distance was ranged a row of ashy contrabands: we, across the way, were also encompassed by a dusky staff. Old Hundred himself leaned on his cane, and was delivered of oracular sentences. This reconnoissance was hardly made when I saw a man detach himself from the crowd and gallop down a side-street. Immediately, three of the guerrillas wheeled and pursued, coming toward us, hoping to head the fugitive at a crossing. Who he was, we could not tell; that he was a Unionist was sufficient to enlist every sympathy. Our hearts stood still as the pursuers dashed by, their dust sprinkling our dresses. The first, a giant on a gray horse, without drawing rein, raised his gun and fired. A little girl was standing at her father's gate, looking on. The bullet, recklessly sent, crashed in the boughs above, so close to her head that she fell stunned. Then a breathless moment! She is picked up; another shot follows, and another. Has our champion fallen? No; a mudpuddle intervenes; the gallant Southron's horse stumbles; head over heels he finds the last ditch! His comrades fish him out with curses, and the home-guard captain escapes.

"Oh, E.!" I exclaimed with trembling lips, clutching the nearest child, "let's go in; they will kill us next."

"Let them do it," said she, tearing up and down the pavement like a caged lioness.

By this time, our neighbor, the carpenter, was ablaze. He went in and put on his coat, buckling his pistol belt as he walked out. The son, a slender stripling, stood behind his sisters, a gun half-hidden in the folds of their dresses. We bemoaned us that ours was a manless household, and addressed such rousing appeals to the carpenter, that he forgot all prudence, and, bringing his sixteen-shooter to his shoulder, proposed to take one of them down without further ceremony.

"Shall I do it?" he said, eagerly. "I can hit one easy."

"Oh, no, no!" I cried, running half across the street. "They'll burn your house down; they'll shoot us all. Can't you get the citizens together? Something must be done; something shall be done!"

And everybody, blanc et noir, wrung their hands in desperate agony. The carpenter reluctantly put away his gun, and walked off down town, while we resumed our stumps and beat our breasts in helpless fury, as we watched the swaying mass in the distance, men dismounting, saddles shifting, horses neighing. It was a public day: the racks were lined with the best blood of the county; the discomforted owners hurried hither and thither, knotting together in groups before stores and behind houses; the rebels all the time riding up and down, exploring alleys and stables with the air of accomplished connoisseurs.

Directly, we saw the Doctor coming from afar, walking leisurely, his saddle bags on his arm.

"Was there ever such a transparent device?" exclaimed E., and we laughed cruelly. Ah! it is a good thing to be a woman, and shameless coward, in these guerrilla days. We hailed him, but he was not disposed to linger, and soon vanished in the shrubbery.

"As for me," said E., "I would rather die at once, if I were a man, than to be forever dodging the guerillas."

"Yes," said I; "it is easy enough to die; but the thing of having your nose tweaked and your hair pulled, your hat and purse and watch gobbled up before your eyes, the Confederate oath crammed down your throat, is not so glorious. I, too, would take to the bush."

"But they should be always ready; they should never take a step without their sixteen-shooters."

"Yes," growled Old Hundred, fixing with his eye a nice-looking gentleman who passed us; "just give 'em one round, and they'd scatter like sheep. He'll fight; he's going whar he pleased; let anybody meddle with him, and they'll get it."

The nice-looking gentleman beamed a look of mild wonder at us, over his shoulder, and moved gingerly on, treading as though he expected to press an infernal machine.

"See here," said Old Hundred, in a stage whisper, to the next passer-by; "if you want to do anything, now is the time to do it."

Thus warning and encouraging every living creature that came within range, he grew momentarily braver: and we sat on our stumps and felt that, if Governor Bramlette had called for six months' women, his ten thousand would have been at the front by that time. Some one told us the militia was gathering together. We comforted ourselves with the thought, that so secret and rapid was the rallying that it was invisible to the naked eye, for we saw nothing more warlike than the flapping of a linen duster as Captain —— hurried from group to group, young Lawyer —— rolling up his sleeves in a pugilistic way, and making a frantic dive into a fence corner.

All this while, the foe continued careering around; some politely changing horses and drinking healths, while others passed rapidly up and down, driving crowds of citizens like dumb cattle at sabre's point, to a nucleus in the middle of the street. The stores emitted a stream of hatless clerks, the workshops a group of sable artizans—all tending swiftly as fallen stars to the centre of robbery. Small detachments could be seen passing through back streets, flashing through trees, as they sought out various residences, from which they brought forth the disconsolate owners, marching them at double-quick to the rendezvous.

What all this meant we too well knew; and, when a crowd of about an hundred had been assembled and hemmed in by the variegated cordon, it required no pantomimic art to translate the eloquent gestures. Hands extended, hands thrust into pockets, hands receiving, hands hesitating, pistols presented! But, while the master-pieces of the old Greek stage were being thus revived before our wrathful eyes, a side scene diverted our attention. Out of the stores came men laden with bolts of flaming solferino flannels and delaines, scarlet blankets, strings of boots and shoes, fluttering ends of ribbons, streaming banners of snowy linen, plumes tossing from their hats, lace veils doing duty on their shameless fronts, hoop-skirts dangling in awkward exposure! With these gay treasures they adorned their waiting steeds, heaping up spoils till there was hardly room for a rider in the saddle.

"There's a good time coming for 'children, wives, and sweethearts dear,'" almost hissed E., through her lips white with indignation.

"You mistake," I said. "Southern merchants no longer go East for spring goods; Kentucky is nearer."

At this crisis, the nurse appeared with stately steppings, carrying the baby, whom she had defiantly draped in a compound of white dress, red wrapper, and blue bonnet. We pounced upon it with protecting arms, and inquired if she wanted "the 'icked 'illas to shoot the pretty 'ittle thing?"

"I ain't afraid of no guerrillas. Dinner is ready."

With many lingering backward glances, we went in, and found the Doctor's visage lowering at the foot of the table. He was greatly troubled for his horses; and we, after lashing him with satire till he writhed, though we knew him to be no coward, promised to rescue them. This heroic resolve was made at the sacrifice of appetite; and, hastily swallowing a cup of tea for the steadying of our nerves, we put on our hats at the jauntiest angle, and, with a solemn word of farewell and admonition to all behind, sallied forth, feeling, as we said, like "Revolutionary pensioners." The Doctor's house and stable are near the centre of the town, and it was with some disappointment that we found ourselves unchallenged within the gate. Mrs. Doctor stood like a sybil, her head draped in a brown veil, her eye fixed in prophetic fury on the stable door. We "took her aside," to use the masculine technicality, and, in profound whispers and subtle gestures, gave her to understand that, if the horses were yet extant, they were to be conveyed under our wings to the woods. She hesitated; she could not let them go beyond the reach of her tongue. We waxed eloquent; we demonstrated mathematically that the capacity of two scolding apparatuses exceeded that of one. So the servant man was called, and directed to bridle the steeds and stand in readiness. Seizing an auspicious moment, when every rebel back was turned, we gave the signal, and forth he came, leading the apples of the Doctor's eye. We fluttered along the sidewalk, coaxing saucy speeches, but, in reality, trembling for the result. Never did General Sherman rejoice more over a successful flank movement than did we as our prize turned a favoring bend and was lost to view and danger. After half-an-hour's talk under the trees, we went out for a last observation. But, lo! the streets were empty; the foe had fled before the invisible home-guard!

It had grown excessively warm, and we were willing to repose our wearied virtue, though disturbed by a restless fear that the game would yet be played out, and we not by to see it. E., being an invalid, returned to her coach and Dickens, and the rest of us took a draught of Nepenthe from our work-baskets.

Congratulating ourselves on having once again escaped pillage; referring with pride and joy to certain inviolate crannies and holes where slept our sixteen-shooter, our silver, our purses, our rings and brooches, our precious coupons—E. slipped off her invisible, pulled down her hair, and unmeshed, amidst wild applause, a roll of greenbacks; mamma took from under the sleeping baby a box of valuables; while I asked if anybody supposed guerrillas read Edwards On the Will; for right behind it, on the book-shelf, was my bijouterie. In the very act of unbosoming every secret, in rushed, with a yell, the "big boy."

"More guerrillas! More guerrillas!"

All raced to the gate. Sure enough, about forty nondescripts were defiling past; but how unlike the first! The brand of thief and murderer was stamped on those other faces; but these were true and open as the sun that had scorched them. Just from the plough and hoe—too hurried to wash the honorable soil from their leathery palms—they had caught their guns in defence of their country. Noble fellows! How we waved and smiled, and realized that nothing stirs the pulses like pursuing hoof-beats.

The next day was serene and cloudless. It was impossible to apprehend danger in the presence of the lovely sky, the tender greens, the sound of growing things. Half from habit, half in bravado, we had our horses saddled, and betook us to our forest haunts—to those lonely roads that, wandering over the hills, descend into the damp, still flats, where the beeches rear their smooth, blue columns, and on either hand you see only tier after tier, stretching miles away, while beds of reeds bristle along the temple floor. The serious grandeur which pervades gives a sense of actual security and peace; you feel that you are under a sacred altar and nave. The chirp of insects, the modest courage of the violet's up-turned face, seem a better protection than an army with batteries. But when we altered our course and climbed the hills, the influence changed; the aisles became closed up with a dismal undergrowth; the shadows of approaching sunset dropped down behind us, and thoughts of scenes we had left, intruded. Lingering was no longer a pleasure; we fled from bandit eyes that gleamed behind each leaflet. We came at last to a ridge that overlooked a cultivated country. It was like reaching in our sleep the beautiful Beyond of our hopes. Before us was the "purple and amethyst of the glorious west;" meadows quivered like live velvet; water silvered; white-washed cottages italicized the groves; along the public road horsemen pranced, cows went home. A stray breeze came loitering up the lane, laden with sweets, wafting our habits backward, faintly tinting E.'s thin cheek. Casting our cowardice into the gloom behind, we rode gaily on, and reached the town without a single presentiment. But, entering that same long Main street, we saw, toward the further end, in front of the stores, a great crowd of men and horses. "Eyes to eyes mute terror looked."

"Oh, E.!" I exclaimed, "we have been rash! My poor horse! My beautiful horse!"

"It can't be helped," she said, with well-afforded coolness, for her venerable pony would not have tempted John Morgan himself. Vainly I loosened the rein and beat that splendid neck; it would not march; he could not be anything but a noble creature. So I set my lips, and tried to look as though I had a pistol in my habit-pocket. Straight against the living wall we rode: gradually it took a blue tinge, cavalry saddles loomed up, sabres clanked; somebody's cap flew off; a smile stole out from a very familiar blonde moustache. It was Lieut. ——, with Company A, from our own mater-regiment, the —— Kentucky! If ever I was tempted to hurrah, it was then; but I did not: and we went home decently and in order, and put the servants to preparing supper for the soldiers.

We were waked that night, near midnight, by a tremendous convulsion of the front door. It was not a knock, but a maudlin tumble. The moon was full, and, through the side-windows, we could see the porch was crowded with men.

"Guerrillas at last!" I said, trembling in a fit of terror. But, shaking me off, the head of the household, assuming a dignified attitude inside the bedroom door, called out in her sternest tone, "Who is there?"

No answer, other than a heavy rush against the double doors. By this time, my fit was over, and, while she continued her posturing and solemn demand, I was bringing forth the sixteen-shooter, the sword-cane, an ex-officer's sword, and an unexploded Shiloh bomb-shell—said weapons constituting our sole means of defence. E. was moving around up stairs, and had at last thrust her head out of the window. She now called to us to come up to that loop-hole. I glided over the oil-cloth, and flashed ghost-like up the stairs. Wrapping a shawl about my shoulders, I leaned out and surveyed the scene. How tranquil was the moonlight! how slumberless the shadows! but among the vine leaves shone the ghostly gleam of steel; figures were stretched along the porch floor; spurred heels beat impatient measure on the stone steps, and there was another rush against the door.

"Soldiers!" I said, Napoleonically, "who are you? and what do you want?"

One of them stepped out of the shadow into the radiance, uncovered, und began, in a tone of injured innocence, to vindicate his character.

"We have been on a scout for thirty days. We have not seen camp. We have not had a mouthful since yesterday morning. We have been fighting guerrillas. We have killed lots of 'em. We have been riding all day. We are tired to death. We want something to eat. We have seen hard times. We belong to the —— Kentucky, Company H."

"Well, why did you not answer at first, and not beat the door in?"

"We have been on a scout. We have not seen camp—" he began again.

"There is nothing cooked. You will have to wait some time."

"Yes, we'll wait," was the complacent rejoinder, and down they dropped, and were snoring in five minutes.

So E. and I dressed, and went to the cabins to rouse the servants, more vexed than alarmed to have a dozen wild soldiers in our house at midnight; for, show a Union soldier that you trust him, and you might strew the cloth with rubies, and he would not touch them. Yet, when they were satisfied and had gone, bolts fastened, and pillows regained, we were grateful that one more opportunity had been given to aid and comfort the soldiers of the Union.—Federal American Monthly.

SHAKSPEARE'S MARRIAGE.

IN estimating Shakspeare's character, the fact that he left among his neighbors the reputation of having been somewhat irregular in his youth cannot be lightly set aside. Nor is it at all strange that such a reputation should have been attained in the early years of a man of his lively fancy, healthy organization, and breadth of moral sympathy. It is from tradition that we learn that during his father's misfortune he was occasionally engaged in stealing deer; but we know on good evidence that about that time he also got himself married in no very creditable fashion. While he was sowing his wild oats in the fields round Stratford, he naturally visited the cottage of Richard Hathaway, a substantial yeoman of Shottery, who seems to have been on terms of friendship with John Shakspeare. This Richard Hathaway had, among other children, a daughter named Anne, who might have dandled William Shakspeare in his infancy upon her knee; for she was eight years old when he was born, in 1564. Whether or no Anne Hathaway had a fair face and a winning way which spontaneously captivated William Shakspeare, or whether he yielded to arts to which his inexperience made him an easy victim, we cannot surely tell. But we do know that she, though not vestally inclined, as we shall see, remained unmarried until 1582, and that then the woman of twenty-six took to husband the boy of eighteen. They were married upon once asking of the banns; and the bond given to the Bishop of Worcester for his security in licensing this departure from custom was given in that year, on the 28th day of November. About those days there was great need that Anne Hathaway should provide herself with a husband of some sort, and that speedily; for in less than five months after she obtained one she was delivered of a daughter. The parish register shows that Susanna, the daughter of William and Anne Skakspeare, was baptized May 26th, 1583.

There have been attempts to turn aside the obvious bearing of these facts upon the character of Anne Hathaway. But it is a stubborn and unwise idolatry which resists such evidence as this—an idolatry which would exempt Shakspeare, and not only him, but all with whom he became connected, from human passion and human frailty. That temperament is cruel, and that morality pharisaic, which treats all cases of this kind with inexorable and indiscriminating severity, and that judgment outrageously unjust which visits all the sin upon the weaker and already suffering party. Yet, if in the present instance it must be that one or other of this couple seduced the other into error, perhaps where a woman of twenty-six is involved with a boy of eighteen, for the honor of her sex the less that is said about the matter the better. Besides, Anne Hathaway rests under the implied reproach of both the men whose good opinion was to her of gravest moment. Her father, like Mary Arden's, had died about a year before her marriage; but while Mary Arden had special legacies, and was assigned to the honorable position of executrix by her father's will, Anne Hathaway was passed over even without mention by her father, who yet carefully and minutely remembered all but one of his other children. And to look forward again—which we well may do, for Shakspeare's wife will soon pass entirely from our sight—when her husband was giving instructions for his will, he left her only his second-best bed, the one that probably she slept upon. It is true, as Mr. Knight has pointed out, that she was entitled to dower, and that so her livelihood was well provided for; it is true also, that a bed with its furniture was in those days no uncommon bequest. But William Shakspeare's will was one of great particularity, leaving little legacies to nephews and nieces, and also swords and rings as mementoes to friends and acquaintances; and yet his wife's name is omitted from the document in its original form, and only appears by an after-thought in an interlineation, as if his attention had been called to the omission, and for decency's sake he would not have the mother of his children unnoticed altogether. The lack of any other bequest than the furniture of her chamber is of small moment in comparison with the slight shown by that interlineation. A second-best bed might be passed over; but what can be done with second-best thoughts? And second-best, if good at all, seem to have been all the thoughts which Shakspeare gave her; for there is not a line of his writing known which can be regarded as addressed to her as maid or matron. Did ever poet thus slight the woman he loved, and that, too, during years of separation?

The cottage in which Anne Hathaway lived is still pointed out in Shottery. It is a timber and plaster house, like John Shakspeare's, standing on a bank, with a roughly paved terrace in front. The parlor is wainscoated high in oak; and in the principal chamber is an enormous and heavily carved bedstead. Though a rustic and even rude habitation, when measured by our standard, it was evidently a comfortable home for a substantial yeoman in the time of Queen Elizabeth, and is picturesque enough for the cradle of a poet's love. But it never can be looked upon without sadness by those who rightly estimate the sorrow and the shame which were there born to William Shakspeare—a sorrow and shame which not all the varied successes of his after-life could heal and obliterate, and his sufferings from which find frequent expression both in his plays and sonnets. True, he was of all poets the most dramatic, and therefore the most self-forgetful; but his trouble he did not forget. His works are full of passages, to write which, if he had loved his wife and honored her, would have been gall and wormwood to his soul; nay, which, if he had loved and honored her, he could not have written. The nature of the subject forbids the marshalling of this terrible array; but did the "flax-wench," whom he uses for the most degrading of all comparisons do more "before her troth-plight" than the woman who bore his name and whom his children called mother? It is not a question whether his judgment was justifiable, but of what he thought and felt.

And even if Anne Hathaway's fair fame, if indeed it was ever fair, remained untarnished, the marriage at eighteen of such a man as her boy husband proved is one of the saddest social events that can be contemplated. Not because it was singular in all its circumstances or its consequences; for, alas! in most of them it is too common. A youth whose person, whose manner, and whose mental gifts have made him the admired favorite of some rural neighborhood, captivated ere he is well a man by some rustic beauty, or often by his own imagination, married and a father before he should be well beyond a father's care, or bound as much in honor, according to the matrimonial code, as if he were married, developing into a man of mark and culture, attaining social position and distinction which would make him the welcome suitor of the fairest and most accomplished woman of the circle into which he has risen by right of worth and intellect, yet tied to one who is inferior to him in all respects, except perhaps in simple truthfulness, and who does not—poor creature, who cannot if she would—keep pace with him; and all this is the consequence of a boyish passion, which opposition might have confirmed, but which tact and a little time—so little!—might easily have dissipated: this case, so pitiable!—so pitiable for both parties, even most pitiable for her—we see too often. But add to all this that the man was William Shakspeare, and that he met his fate at only eighteen years of age, and that the woman who came to him with a stain upon her name was eight years his senior, and could we but think of their life and leave out the world's interest in him, should we not wish that one of them, even if it were he, had died before that ill-starred marriage? But chiefly for him we grieve; for a woman of her age, who could so connect herself with a boy of his, was either too dull by nature or too callous by experience to share his feelings at their false, unnatural position. Who can believe that the well-known counsel upon this subject which he put into the Duke Orsino's mouth in Twelfth Night was not a stifled cry of anguish from his tormented, over-burdened soul, though he had left his torment and his burden so far behind him? It is impossible that he could have written it without thinking of his own experience; the more, that the seeming lad to whom it is addressed is about his years, and the man who utters it about Anne Hathaway's, at the time when they were married.—White's Memoirs of Shakspeare.

ROYALTY IN TROUBLE.—The domestic life of Queen Victoria has been much disturbed of late in consequence of the proposed marriage of her third daughter, the Princess Helena, an accomplished young lady, who resembles her mother in appearance and character more than any other of her children. It is generally believed in London that the Princess Helena was much pleased with the attentions of a young English nobleman, and this fact was sufficient to make her speedy alliance with a member of some of the royal families of Europe a necessity, in order to prevent the deepening of her affection for a person whom she would not be permitted to marry, the members of the royal family in England not being at liberty to marry outside of other royal families. Now there seem to be two candidates in the field—the crown prince of Denmark, who is supported by his sister, the Princese of Wales, and is deemed unobjectionable by the queen, and the crown prince of Holland, (the Prince of Orange,) who is quite a fashionable and handsome young fellow, more acceptable to the young lady than the Danish prince, but less agreeable to the queen, on account of his great fondness for life in Paris, and his general rapidity. But the prince's mother, the Queen of Holland, being one of the most learned as well as one of the most manœuvering sovereign ladies of Europe, has just paid a visit to London in order to effect the desired alliance, which must be very popular in Holland. She telegraphed for her son to join her there, and all was believed to be settled. But Queen Victoria's scruples in regard to the young man's frivolous disposition have once more revived and it will require all the diplomatic genius of the Dutch queen, great as it is, to overcome these objections. At the same time the King of Holland, who, being the mental inferior of his wife, tries to revenge himself by thwarting her schemes in every possible way, wants his son to become the husband of the daughter of the blind King of Hanover. It is probable, however, that the Prince of Orange will eventually carry off his Helena, and in England the alliance would no doubt be looked upon more favorably than the addition of another German prince to the royal family.

MUSICAL.

THE future movements of Mr. Wehli, still another pianist deservedly popular, are not quite determined. Mr. Wehli is under a contract to Max Strakosch—his salary payable in gold—but as that young impressario is engineering a provincial troupe of Italian operatic singers, the great "left hand pianist" will probably be turned over to the care of some experienced agent. In any event, Wehli is sure to prove a successful card. Since Gottschalk, there is no pianist who knows better than he how to surprise and fascinate the average American audience.

IT is rumored that Jaell, the pianist, who has grown so immensely corpulent that he can hardly sit at the piano, also contemplates visiting the United States during the coming winter. There is another player who would be welcome to all our lovers of good playing, and that is Gustave Salter, a pianist who was never as fully appreciated here as he should have been; and without going away so far away from home, we think that the Boston pianist, Otto Dresel, should be heard this season in New York, as Wolfsohn, of Philadelphia, was last season.

OF Thalberg—we may say, while thus gossipping about pianists—nothing seems to be known of late. He has quite retired from public life; but the Continental gossip writers find a great deal to say about Liszt. According to one account, he only expects to take a subordinate rank in the church; while another report says that he will soon be made archbishop, and that this is only a step toward the tiara. Pope Franz I. would be a curious title for the great pianist.

ALFRED H. PEASE, the pianist, will give several concerts in New York during the coming winter, at which some of his orchestral compositions will be produced. As yet Mr. Pease is known here only as a skillful pianist and as a writer of some very felicitous songs; but he will this season appeal to our public in the more ambitious character of an orchestral composer.

J. PATTISON, another resident pianist of real merit, will also give concerts in New York during the coming winter. As a quaint musical curiosity, there are many who would be glad to hear again the antique spinnet on which he played antique music at his last series of concerts. [Round Table.

VICTORINE.

THE Count de Cardoville had been married ten years. He was handsome, occupied not only a high rank in society, but was looked on with respect by the statesmen of the day. He had attained a great position, and for the last five years had been minister at the Court of Vienna. But all these elements of happiness were nothing to the Count in comparison to the treasure he possessed in his wife. For her alone was he ambitious; for her alone he valued the honors he had attained, and the fame which the world accorded him.

Mme. de Cardoville, for a wonder—for the infatuation of man does not go by merit—deserved her husband's idolatry. Beautiful, high-principled, talented, without a shade of vanity, utterly and entirely devoted to her husband. Helene de Cardoville's life had never known a shadow. At twenty-seven she was quoted as the most lovely woman at the Austrian Court, though each year brought forth young and lovely girls, aspirants to the highest honors of each season.

When the world spoke of Mme. de Cardoville, it pitied her for the one drawback to her happiness—the want of children. But their pity was vain. for neither M. or Mme. de Cardoville had ever regretted being childless. Their happiness was to be together—alone, to share together each thought, each care, each amusement—even their own child that would have called them from each other might have caused a jealous pang.

One day, it was summer, they had left Vienna for a chateau the Count de Cardoville had taken lor the last few summers, and looked upon as his own, a lady was announced wishing to see the Countess "

"Mon Dieu," exclaimed Mme. de Cardoville, as she beheld her visitor—"Victorine."

"Yes, dearest Victorine; you have not forgotten me then."

"Never, how could I forget you—almost my sister—but——"

"You panse, you hesitate, ah! I understand you, I am sadly changed."

"Yes, dear Victorine, you have snffered, you are in monrning. Oh! you have believed in me and trusted me; you are come to me for consolation."

"Helene I have not a friend in the world. You knew of my imprudent marriage; it is over. I am a widow, bnt ruiued in fortune, health and spirits, and I thought of you. I have come to you from Sweden, where, iu our poverty, my husband had hidden our misery and our disgrace."

"Yon shall never remember any more the years that are gone. Oh! Victorine, we shall make you so happy. We will bring back your beauty, your high spirits, and even the years that have weighed so heavily on yon shall be obliterated. Come—come let me bring you to my hnsband;" here the Countess suddenly stopped, and an expression of divine happiness diffused itself over her features. "Oh, Victorine," she continued, "what have I done to Heaven that it should have made me so bleseed, whilst you have been wasting your youth and beauty in tears and wretchednoss? Come, come—it will be returning some of the good heaped on me to make you forget your past life."

Monsieur de Cardoville received his wife's friend with the most cordial friendshp; her friends were ever most welcome to him, and when he heard Victorine's past misery, and her utterly deserted position, he proposed to his wife that their home should be hers.

Helene looked up at him with tenderness and gratitude; yet even at that moment a strange feeling came over her. Perhaps it was that she dreaded any change—change must bring unhappiness—for her present life was one to which no felicity could be added. But, hastily she threw off the thought as unworthy of her. What after all was a mere fancy compared to the feelings of her poor friend, Victorine.

Mme. Von Sternberg was established therefore in the chateau. Time had faded, but had not obliterated her beauty, her grace, her wit; a strange fascination about her manner, it had left untouched; so that Victoriue added rather to the charm of their home than took away from it. Victorine too was a widow. Mme. Cardoville, though admired, and far more beautifnl, was known to be so deeply attached to her hnsband that no impression could be made upon her heart. Victorine, though neither a flirt nor a coquette, had the power and the tact to draw around her the most distinguished of the eminent men who filled the salons of the French ambassador.

"I am delighted that Victorine is with us," said Helene one day to her husband, "she has the power of amusing yon, and I think our home has been gayer and pleasanter since she has been in it."

"Most decidedly, and how handsome she has grown; that dark, sarcastic, bitter look has utterly fled from her face."

"She was very beautifnl," said Helene; "in our convent we used to call her Lucretia."

"Borgia?" said the Count, "that was scarcely a compliment."

'No; after Lucretia, the Roman matron, she was even at sixteen so dark and dignified."

"She is a most fascinating woman, capable of a desperate deed, if not an heroic one. There is more of the modern than of the ancient Italian about her."

Meantime Mme. Sternberg was pondering in her mind what was to become of her; for, to accept a permanent home with Mme. de Cardoville of course, could not be thought of. She had said she was ruined; that was a figurative way of speaking, which, being put iu plain language, merely meant that Mme. Sternberg could not live in splendor or luxury, and could not maintain the position in society she thought the only one worth having. Society, admiration, luxury; these were the elements of Mme. Sternberg's happiness—a happiness independent of the heart, one that money can procure. Of course, Victorine knew she might chance to effect a good marriage. She was handsome; she knew that, and few men could resist her when she chose to exert her powers of fascination; but, since she had been with Helene, she had rather avoided the open expression of admiration from those around her, than sought it.

Victorine was no timid, innocent young girl, to wonder why she was so changed; she read her heart aright, and read it at once. She knew that she avoided all the men around her from their inferiority to one for whom each day she felt an increasing passion, and that man was no other than Horace de Cardoville. Although she did not struggle against this passion, she had still discretion, if not principle, enough to abstain from the manifestation of any preference, and to disguise alike from Horace and his wife the feelings that would have lost her their friendship and driven her from their home. She did not even try to attract M. de Cardoville; to him her manner was cold, strictly polite—that was all.

"I'm afraid your friend Victorine doesn't like me, Helene," said M. de Cardoville, "she is so very formal."

"I have often wondered whether you liked her, for yon do not seem to progress at all in your friendship."

"Oh, I like her very well; bnt Helene we are not so often alone as we were. You know how few hours the world and my duties leave me. Is Mme. Sternberg likely to remain here eternally?"

"No, my dear Count," said Mme. de Sternberg, advancing. "Excuse me: I only overheard the last sentence, but it was so very comprehensive that I could not help answering you. I am not going to trespass on your, I mean Helene's, kindness longer than another week. Then you will return to Vienna, and I shall have found some obscure retreat where I shall be no longer a trouble to my friends."

Helene, bursting into tears, threw her arms around Victorine; as for the Count, covered with confusion, he stood gazing on his guest, who stood cold and erect, her quivering lip only showing her emotion; her large dark eyes striving to retain her tears.

He felt profoundly hnmiliated; hnmanly, he thought his words had been cruel, but apology he felt would make them worse. For the first time, Mme. Steruberg assumed an interest in his eyes. For the first time, he pitied her. For the first time, he felt an eager desire to offer her a brother's friendship and protection. Now. under the insnlt she had received, all he could do was to leave her to the consolation Helene's tact and affection could offer her.

"I am not offended," said Mme. Sternberg; "I am only reproved and reminded of my stern fate, which till now I had forgotten. Come, Helenc, do not weep; remember yon must look beautiful to-night for his sake. Come, I will not intrude my miseries upon you. I will forget all this, and when I am far away, in my solitnde, I shall remember only your kindness."

Mme. Sternberg withdrew to her room. That evening, Helene and Horace were to appear at a court ball, given at this undue season for the reception of a foreign prince travelling incognito.

It was only in their official capacity that the count and countess thought the invitation imperative, and only on that account that they had left their chateau for a ride of ten miles to Vienna, and ten miles back, in the middle of the night, for Helene insisted on not remaining in the close city one day longer than she was obliged to.

"The ride home will be the pleasantest part of it, Horace. Just fancy the delicious feeling of the pure morning air, coming from that heated atmosphere."

Mme. de Cardoville was, as usual, the most beautiful woman at the ball; her regal, yet feminine, beauty was enhanced by the splendor of her dress and the wonderful Cardoville diamonds, which were celebrated all over Europe. Her husband, though he loved her deeply, could not but be flattered by the admiration she excited; and, as he threw his arm aronnd her and drew her towards him as they returned home, he told her he wondered how he had deserved that such a being should love him and be his; "for, iudeed, dearest Helene, you are an angel—there now, how many wives hear that from the lips of their husband ten years after marriage?"

"I hope not to be an angel for at least forty or fifty years, for your love, Horace, makes life a Heaven here."

The carriage stopped as she uttered these words; she stepped into the hall where only one servant had remained up to receive them. The count entered his library for a few minntes to deposit papers and despatches he had brought from Vienna, but as he did so he pansed for an instant watching the graceful figure of his wife passing, like an airy vision in the gray dawn, up the stairs, and murmuring her name with deep love and tenderness.

Like a vision she had indeed faded from his sight—and forever. When he entered her dressing-room a strange pungent odor brought a choking sensation to his throat and a giddiness in his brain. Still he advanced, for he saw Helene seated in a large arm-chair near the open window.

"She has fallen asleep," said he, "I must awaken her for the atmosphere of this room is not natural; it is, yes, it is ether or chloroform—how has this been produced--accident, or--" by this time the connt had reached his wife.

"Helene," said he, placing his hand on her shoulder, "Helene."

But Helene stirred not; the connt bent over her, still repeating her name, yet still she did not move. The dawn was still too gray to light the room distinctly. Hastily he brought a light from the bed-room, and gazed with anxiety on his wife.

She was still, and her large eyes were wide open. The satin robes were still around her, but they were all dabbled and disfigured by blood that flowed over them. Horace threw his arms around his wife, and a sharp cry re-echoed throngh the house, bringing all its inmates in a few moments to the terrible scene.

The countess was quite dead. The canse of her death was evident; some malefactor, tempted by the jewels the countess had worn, had concealed himself in her room awaiting her return, then by means of an instantancons application of chloroform rendered her insensible. Probably she had stirred and that had cost her life. The jewels were gone, and the thief had escaped even in those fifteen miuutes that Helene had been alone, for his plans had been admirably laid.

It was Mme. Sternberg who took Helene from the arms of the count. Tenderly she disrobed her; no profane hand did she allow to touch her till she lay in the midst of flowers in her coffin.

Then firmly and geutly she went into the connt's room and led him to the room where she had robbed death of its horror, and when Helene lay so calm, peaceful and beautiful, that the count remembering how he had called Helene an angel, and now she was one in heaven, fell on his knees beside her, and for the first time burst into tears.

The day of the funeral, Mme. Sternberg, without one word of farewell to the connt, left the chateau. Horace felt very desolate, but he recalled his uncourteous words and felt that Victorine was right.

All the efforts of the police were vain. No traces were found either of the murderer or the jewels. The count, unable to endure the scene of his misfortune, totally unfit for his official dnties, resigned his embassy and returned to Paris.

Three years went by before the count had reached the period of grief which brings resignation. Then a strange feeling took possession of him: he felt a yearning desire to see Victorine again. She seemed like the only link between him and his dead wife.

He knew her connections—it was easy to find her ont.

She had grown younger, more beautiful, in the profonnd retirement in which she lived. She received the count with the deepest emotion. Her manner had acquired a snbdued gentleness, that gave her the charm she had lacked.

The count fonnd his only consolation in her society. Here he conld talk of Helene: for Victorine had known her in the days of her girlhood, even before he had loved her. A year after he had met Mme. Sternberg, she became Countess de Cardoville.

Peace and happiness again brightened the connt's life. The countess loved him deeply, passionately—not a shadow ever arose between them.

They had been married four years, when, one day, the countess being absent, the connt requiring a miniature he had given her for a large portrait of himself, proceeded to her dressing-room to ask it of her maid.

The maid was not there, but the key was in the cabinet where the jewels were kept. Horace opened it, and searching for the miniature, his hand touched a spring. Silently the drawer slid back, and revealed—oh Heaven! his senses seemed to leave him as he gazed—the Cardoville diamonds, the diamonds his Helene had worn on the night of the murder. Their startling brightness was as a torch to light the past.

"Oh God! she—she who had taken Helene's place, she had been her destroyer."

He turned. Victorine stood gazing over his shoulder. She had comprehended all as she beheld the diamonds, and as he turned she fell on her knees.

"Forgive me—it was love for yon that prompted me."

The count pushed her from him with a shriek of horror. Ten days later he was borne to his grave, dying in the midst of the wildest raving of brain fever.

The countess's secret is safe—no punishment awaits her crime, that is, from society or the laws. But her crime was fruitless—it killed not only the woman she hated, but the man she loved, and she lives alone with memory of the past ever clear and vivid.

THE BANKER'S CLERK.

BEING ANOTHER LEAF FROM MY BOOK OF REAL LIFE.

HAVING nothing particular to occupy my time, one evening, while in London, now some years ago, I strolled into the chambers of my old friend, S. R., reckoned one of the best Crown lawyers in that city. I found he was at home; and, on entering his room, he appeared to be busily occupied with a pile of papers before him. On seeing me, he laid down his pen; he had been writing with a shade to his lamp, that he might see better and protect his eyes from the glare of the light. "As," he said, "I have just finished my notes in a curious case—I call it a singular case of infatuation—which was brought to me a few days ago to conduct in Court next week, if you have a few minutes to spare, and will sit down, I'll tell it you—it's not a long case, but it has interested me very much."

Expressing my desire to hear, and the pleasure it would give me, I seated myself, and he began:

A young man of respectable family, a clerk in a city banking house, in the out-door or collecting department, is charged with embezzlement of money to some considerable amount. From the evidence that was given before the Lord Mayor, and on which he was committed for trial, there is nothing to be offered in defence. I feel, therefore, I shall do him more service by advising him to plead guilty, and I can then offer a few words of palliation to the Court, without making a long speech for defence, amounting to nothing. This course will save the time of the Court, and, what I consider of more consequence, it will save the exposure of some little circumstances regarding a young lady, that would only afford food for scandal to the public, gratify an idle curiosity, and give much pain and distress of mind to a very estimable person. The young man may thus get a lighter sentence, instead of the full penalty being awarded.

This young man's work, as an out-door clerk, was at the upper part of the New Road, and occasionally into the Regent's Park, adjoining. One morning, it being fine weather, at the close of summer, he had to go to a house in one of the terraces in the Regent's Park. On his way he overtook a young lady, who was walking with a very handsome little boy about five years old, very neatly clad. The young lady herself was a handsome, middle-sized person, dressed with much neatness and simplicity—nothing unduly expensive, but all of the very best. The child turning to him, as he passed close to them, her eyes followed the child's movement. The young man made a bow, raising his hat. I may as well tell you he is a very good-looking young man, rather tall, and well dressed. His duty led him to a house at a short distance; he hastened on, and, after he had finished his errand, he returned by the way he came, in the hope of seeing the young lady and child again. He was not disappointed—they met. He then took courage to utter the compliments of the day, and inquire if she were a resident of the neighborhood, also remarking on the beauty of the weather and other common-places. She replied she did not live in the park, but in a street adjoining, and was out for a morning walk with her little boy. This was the first interview; he continued to walk and converse with her for a few minutes, as young men will do with young ladies, and, being a well-educated young man and of pleasing manners, the time passed agreeably. Referring at last to his watch, he wished her a good morning and went away, noticing, however, the time and place, and resolving in his own mind that, as she seemed to be in the habit of taking this morning walk with her little boy, he would try and meet her again.

A week or more passed, when business again led him to the Regent's Park, and to a part near to the spot where he had before met the young lady and her little boy. He quickly finished his work there, and strolled down the avenue in the hope of again meeting with her. In this he was not disappointed: he perceived her at a short distance, coming towards him, with the little boy. They met, and he accosted her, and walked a little way, conversing with her on the continuance of the fine weather and common topics of conversation. She was then returning home, and he accompanied her and saw where she resided. This was afterwards followed by his calling at the house in the evening to see her; and so it continued for a little while, he representing himself to her as a young man of a wealthy family, and having a commission in the Guards, for, although no impropriety had ever taken place, yet he was constantly bringing her rich presents of plate and jewelry, and, as the winter season was approaching, he provided some rich and valuable furs for herself and her little boy, whose name he found was Edmund; but he never learned more, and her own name he never knew at all. He gave himself rather a grand fictitious name—The Honorable William P——. This sort of friendly intercourse lasted a short time, and I can seriously say, to the young lady's honor, no impropriety of any sort took place, not even a kiss at parting in the evening, which was his usual time of visiting. As a humble junior clerk in a banking house, this state of things could not last long. One day his accounts were found to be deficient, and, no sufficient explanation being given, the firm were, by way of example, obliged to give him into custody. His friends, on his being committed for trial, came to me, and I have made myself acquainted with the facts and the evidence given in the depositions before the Lord Mayor, and I see no chance of escape for him by fighting the case in Court; but, by pleading guilty, he will very likely get a lighter sentence.

But stay—I must finish with the young lady: On the arrest being made, Mr. Cope, the Chief Marshal, was spoken to, and he obtained from my client the particulars of the young lady's residence, and of some of the presents he had made her. On this information, Mr. Cope went in the evening to the young lady's house, which was in a very respectable street near the park. He found her at home, and the servant on his entrance showed him into the parlor where the lady was. He introduced himself to her, and related the purport of his visit. She was much shocked at what he told her. I afterwards saw him, and he mentioned to me that he found her to be a lady of elegant manners and address, quite a fascination, with a handsome little boy at her side. She expressed much surprise when he told her the tale of who the young man was, and the large amount of his defalcation. She expressed sorrow to hear he had so misconducted himself, for, she said, he had represented himself to her as being an officer in the Guards, and possessing an independent property, and, therefore, as to the presents he had made, she did not think so much of them, for she knew a little of the habits of young officers. Although she remonstrated with him upon his sending her such things, as she did not need them, he had refused to take them away. She had kept them all safe in a closet in another room, to which she conducted the marshal, and, opening the closet, showed him the furs, plate, silks, and jewelry he had presented to her. The marshal said he must take them all away, to which she of course readily consented; and he said he was afraid he should be obliged to have her come forward as a witness in the case. The marshal was a kind man, with a pleasant voice and mode of speaking, but this remark threw her into great confusion. She remonstrated with some firmness, and at last tried persuasion. She assured him no impropriety had passed between them, and finally said:

"I could not allow anything to transpire beyond mere common civility, for I am married. My husband is an officer in a regiment now in India, and the child you saw is his son. I am by birth a lady of title. I possess independent property of my own, from my late mother. My father is the Earl ——. I was privately married, against the wish of my father, to the young man I loved. My father, when he came to know it, used his influence to get my husband sent to India, and he is there now; but, in the last letter I received from him, he says he expects to be able to exchange to another regiment, when he will soon return home to me. Now, I have told you who I am. You may well suppose I could not encourage a young man to do as this one has done, in spite of all my remonstrances. I hope you will not call me forward as a witness; but, as I have safely kept all the property I now give up to you, I must ask you one favor: that, as you know who I am, and, as I have incurred the displeasure of my father, who is rather an austere man, as you perhaps know, I wish the bankers to use their influence with him to try and effect my reconciliation and restoration to his favor. I have a brother and sister. My brother is not very kind to me; he takes rather after his father. But my sister is kind, and she tries all she can to pacify and reconcile my father, but at present he is inexorable."

I said to my friend I hoped all would pass off well, and the young lady be again received into her father's house. He said he hoped it would be so, and so far as a word from him could do it, he would try.

I did not see my friend again for a month or so, when I referred him to the case, and asked if the bankers had got the young lady reinstated in her father's favor. He said: "No; the house had by the things she had given up, got back nearly all the loss they had sustained by the young man's defalcation, and they thought no more about her."

Poor S. R.! I do not know whether he is still living; he was rather brusque in his manner at times, which by time-serving people would be perhaps considered rudeness, but he was honest withal and kind-hearted. I recollect hearing him one day in a case in the Guildhall Court, when a sharp remark was made upon him by a brother professional, Sergeant P., a barrister of some note; he replied to him: "Sir, I conduct my business on these principles—to rescue the oppressed from the grasp of the oppressor, and to punish the evil-doer; and if I attend the case of a man who has told me has committed the offence charged against him, I hold it my duty to him and the public not to prevaricate or pervert the truth on his behalf, but to carefully watch and see that no more evidence or charge is brought against him than what the law requires, and, if the case is not properly and sufficiently proved, to require his discharge." His opponent made some reply, commending the observation; he could not gainsay the good and proper meaning of these remarks. S. R. was always kind among the poor, and often pleaded a poor man's cause without fee, or the hope of it. F. H.

INTERIOR ITEMS.

THE Chinese of Sacramento commenced their demonstrations against the devils by whom, since the Yosemite disaster, they have believed themselves invested, on the 27th ult. The Union says: "While they were engaged during the day in discharging fire-crackers and burning Joss sticks along I street, the sound of their gong and the melody of their music were heard throughout the city, especially during the morning and evening exercises. At their headquarters on the north side of I street, between Second and Third streets, is the centre of attraction. They have there for this especial occasion one figure of a very large fat man, one of a slender man, one of a horse about the size of a Newfoundland dog, and various nondescript creations of their own imagination and handiwork. In addition to these creations, which have been prepared for the occasion, the wax figures and fixtures generally of the Joss-house located north of the slough have been brought across to I street, and are all impressed into service for the present defensive movement. The plan of this campaign against Satan and his legions seems to be to drive, by means of prayer and fire-crackers, incantation and the music of the gong, burning paper and singing and squeaking, all the evil spirits and prevailing diseases within sight or sound into the large tissue-paper man, who, in turn, is to be burnt in a blaze of glory at midnight on Sunday night."

Mr. GURRIER, as an owner in one of the rich opal mines near Mokelumne Hill, showed the Stockton Independent, on Saturday last, a fine assortment of these valuable stones, highly polished. The mines in which these stones are found are situated on Stockton Hill, west side of Chile Gulch. In Mr. Gurrier's mine a shaft has been sunk to the depth of 345 feet, but only at a depth of 80 feet, in a thin stratum of red gravel, have opals been discovered. Four claims have been located—two of 24 shares each; one of 22; and one (Mr. Gurrier's) of 33 shares. The product is nearly one bushel per day, some of the stones being very valuable. Already, in Paris, London, and other European cities, these stones find a ready sale; some of them, not larger than ordinary shirt buttons, realizing as high as $20 each.

THE Oroville Union says the miner who shot the Digger through mistake, a short time ago, has settled the matter with the tribe, by paying to the squaw of the deceased twenty dollars, four sacks of flour, and a new calico dress.

THE Visalia Delta says there has been about 23,600 acres of land entered as homesteads in that region under the provisions of the Homestead Law, passed May 20th, 1863. By this law, the United States gives to every citizen who will occupy it, one hundred and sixty acres of land. The conditions are cultivation and continued occupancy for five years.

THE Delta says that Visalia is now very prosperous; there is not a vacant house in the town.

THE Sentinel attributes the prosperity of Santa Cruz to the many manufacturing establishments in that place, which pay out every month over $25,000 in gold for labor, all of which is there spent for improvements and the necessaries of life.

IN regard to the Nevada silver mines, the Alta says the leading stocks have been struck with assessments, and others will inevitably follow. The disposition is, therefore, to sell. The leading speculative stock is the only one which pays a dividend—the Imperial—and the sales are mostly at sellers' option, some as low as $188.

THE Blue Gravel Mining Company, near Smartsville, says the Appeal, cleaned up, recently, the boxes at the head of their flume, after thirty days run, taking out $26,600, being the largest amount by some $2,000 ever taken out on so short a run. This is the seventh clean up they have made since January 1, 1865. The gross amount taken out since that time is $240,000.

THE Independent says that quite an extensive fire has been raging in the foothills to the west of Red Bluff for over a week. It must have burned over an area of several miles, and at last report was brighter than ever.

PATRICK KELLY, a driver of an express wagon at Sacramento, was drowned on Monday in Beach's Lake, nine miles below the city. Kelly was out with a hunting party, and was drowned while endeavoring to recover a duck from the lake.

THE Copperopolis Courier says that, recently, at Six Mile Bar, in Calaveras county, Edward O'Neil shot and killed his partner, James Janson. O'Neil says he acted in self-defence, but his story seems to be doubtful.

JAMES W. PARKER, formerly of Company C, First Cavalry, California Volunteers, was wounded by Apaches near Tucson, and shot himself with his pistol, to avoid being captured alive.

WILLIAM J. BRYANT, of the minstrel family of that name and formerly a resident of Sacramento, (where he worked at printing,) died in New York on the 23d of September, of congestion of the brain, after a very short illness.

THE Christian Spectator is the title of a new religious paper (Methodist South) published in this city, edited by Rev. O. P. Fitzgerald.

THE TOILET OF DEATH.

THE brief and imperfect record kept by Monchotte, hair-cutter of the Conciergerie, during the Reign of Terror, having recently come to light, public attention has been called to the Martel papers, and the result has been the publication of the present volume. It appears that among the perruquiers of Paris, so many of whom were guillotined, one was held from his threatened fate, in order to ply his trade on his unfortunate associates. The history of this man is involved in mystery and hidden by shadow. Neither his age or origin are given, and in their absence we are led to suppose him to have been young, as youth and nerve were required for his solemn task. His record appears to have arisen from the same motive which leads the crews of sinking ships to bottle slips of paper—a desire to leave some memorial of his labors and feelings, before he should be called to a place in one of those *fournées which he so frequently prepared for the guillotine. It is one of the strange features in the French Revolution, that the mind is found clinging to the most minute affairs of life even when the vast wave of madness was flooding Paris with blood. For instance, the details of the extraordinary tribunal are given, and notwithstanding the pressure upon its services, not a victim passes to doom without specification of age, sex, nativity, and profession. It may, however, be remarked, that this is to a certain degree accounted for by that peculiarity of the human mind, which lays hold of trifles during the most momentous convulsions, and yields equal attention to the smallest and the greatest of events.

The prisons of Paris were at that time closely packed with objects of suspicion, and as one after the other was filled, the palaces as well as the abodes of mercy were put in requisition. In this way the Madallonette and the hospice of the Bicetre, and subsequently the Luxembourg palace, were used for this purpose; the latter being filled to overflowing, while the former, though benevolent institutions, were occupied so far as there was any room to spare from the wards of the sick or the insane.

All the interest excited by these numerous prisons centered in the tribunal, whose long and almost unbroken sessions were held in the Palais de Justice. Here Fouquier Tinville, in the office of Public Accuser, or in other words, prosecuting attorney for the Committee of Public Safety, drove on the proceedings with an energy which only the fever of such an hour can explain; while Herman, Dumas, and others sustained the rolé of presidents of the court, and a hideous assemblage of sans culottes,† acting in the capacity of jurors, repeated the stereotyped verdict. Such a series of incessant mockeries of truth, equity, and justice, the world never witnessed before.

The prisoners, in obedience to the lists drawn off by the Committee of Public Safety, were gathered from the different jails and brought either at midnight or at the approach of evening to the spacious but dimly lighted basement of the Palais de Justice. This, which was known as the Conciergerie, or guard-house, contained several dungeons, in addition to the central vault, and in one of the former the queen was confined for several weeks before her execution. From this place of sad reunion, where a large crowd might have been continually found huddled together in the half stifling atmosphere, the prisoners were led up a winding stair to the salle, or court room, where their fate was rapidly decided. After sentence, which was death within twenty-four hours, they were again led down to the Conciergerie and were thence carted to the scaffold in the afternoon. From Monchotte's record, it appears that he had been arrested, tried, and condemned, and yet after all escaped death by one of those incidents on which a destiny is sometimes suspended. The last thing before leaving the Conciergerie for the cart, was "the toilet of death," as it was fancifully termed. The hair was cut short in order that the executioner might have full view of the back of the neck, and thus bring it immediately beneath the axe; a custom which is maintained in France to this day. The attendant who had charge of this duty having been suddenly taken ill, Monchotte who was known to be a barber, was summoned from the group of the condemned to fill his place. With a nonchalance peculiar to that fearful time, he stepped forth from the fournée, and plied the shears upon his unfortunate associates; and of that group, numbering nothing less than fifty, all but he went to the scaffold.

Thenceforth until the Reign of Terror closed, his services were in constant requisition, while he knew not the day that he might be summoned to join some one of those fournées which he was preparing for death. This risk became gradually a matter of indifference, and Monchotte began at length to look on himself as a fixture of the dismal institution of which he formed a part. The employment of the pen served to occupy the idle hours of his existence, which of course were many, since his duties required but a brief part of the day. The carts or tumbrils were generally ordered up by four o'clock in the afternoon, at which time the condemned were placed in rows, and here by the dim light of a grated window, Monchotte began his task. Few words were spoken during its performance, except perhaps the broken accents which only told of despair. The doomed were lost in that reverie of abstraction which indicates the shattered intellect, or else were buried too deep in woe to admit of speech, for words had lost their meaning. No sooner was the toilet finished than the huge iron door turned upon its hinges, and through that beetling portal they marched out to take their farewell of Paris and mankind.

Monchotte's work was then done for the day, and it was his custom to immediately jot down rough notes of the persons he had prepared for death. Among these were the authoresses Olympe des Gouges, Madelene Dubet, and Marie Contelet; also the editor and deputy Gorsas; and the Duc D'Orleans, commonly called Egalité, who voted for the king's death and was himself guillotined on the same spot a few months subsequently,

From the more interesting of these we quote as follows:

"July 17, 1793. Marie Charlotte Corday came under my hands, hair soft and curling prettily over her shoulders; features round and chubby, unlike our sharp-faced grizettes; one curl preserved at her request, to send to her father, in case the one she has sent to him should miscarry. Conduct firm: noble and heroic, glorious Charlotte!"

On the sixteenth of October he chronicles the first application of his shears to Royalty. The king had been guillotined before he came into the office, and there is no record of the person who cropped the Bourbon, but Monchotte appears proud of the fact that Marie Antoinette came under his tonsorial care. He dealt with her in the tenderest manner, and mentions her kindly smile as he apologized for the rude liberty he was taking with her sacred head. She was woe-begone and exhausted by her trial, having had but little rest, and was subdued to complete resignation, going to the cart as Mouchotte says, like one who longed to die.

A deeper and more fearful tragedy is alluded to in the record of October 31st, the same year.

"This day I cropped the ex-deputies from La Gironde—what faces, what foreheads, what eyes—and yet I did my part in extinguishing these demi-gods! Vergniaud looked on me with a sad and woe-begone expression. Brissot scorned me; Gensonne bit his lip, and said nothing; Louchet wept a few bitter tears: Some spoke of the axe as only doing the same work as the shears in a more effectual manner, just as the Fates cut the thread of life. They stood in rows like statues, and I passed from one to the other in lonely silence; each one stood in mute patience till all was done. Then came their embrace—and their farewell, and then their chant of wild music as the tumbril moved on."

The death of the Girondins seems to have made a deep impression on Monchotte, and their hair excites his curiosity to a degree in great contrast with that of the common food of the guillotine. He notes at much length their characters as indicated by the difference in their locks, and enters into a disquisition as to the indication of talent which could be read by his practiced eye.

"Had Lonchet possessed a darker, stiffer covering to his head, had Brissot less of the auburn, had Barbaroux longer, bolder ringlets, all might have been different. But alas, how could such men contend with the fierce bristling locks of the terrible Danton, the full electric hair of Camille Desmoulins or the sleek head of Robespierre combed back with its unapproachable cue—to say nothing of those matted sans culottes, shaggy as buffaloes and fierce as wolves."

Monchotte had, as he supposed, learned to designate character by the covering of the head. This art, if indeed it be worthy of that name, must be reckoned one of those cultivated in classic ages, and some think that it is referred to by Horace in his famous description of the old Roman heroes.

> "Hunc et incomptis Curium capillis
> Utilem bello tulit et Camillum
> Sœva paupertas, et avitus apto
> Cum lare fundus."

The allusions which Monchotte makes to this art give his journal a peculiar interest. He seems to have thought himself able to describe individuals and almost destinies from the basket of sweepings which was gathered after each fournée, and occasionally he preserved some of the more remarkable specimens of character and misfortune.

Among these were female tresses of great softness, lustre, and length, whose history began in the halls and palaces of the noblesse and ended on the scaffold. Had Monchotte been of a literary turn he could have penned narratives more terrible than the inventions of romance. The work of death kept pressing upon the step of time, and as the spring of 1794 advanced, we find an abridgment in his journal until it only indicates by brief entries that the number and size of the fournées was vastly increased.

"Seventy-five clipped on one afternoon—one hundred and three on another, four score and six on another occasion," how could he find time for details; yet even now we note an attempt to express his feelings as some eventful character overwhelmed him by taking his turn at the toilet of death. He notes such men as Bishop Gobel and Chaumette, both in the same fournée, Hebert the ferocious, and Mormoro the husband of the Goddess of Reason, and the eccentric but pure minded Anacharsis Cloots, with a large number of unfortunates beheaded on the 25th of March, 1794. On the 6th of April are recorded the names of Chabot, Fabre, D'Eglantine and above all, Camille Desmoulins, whose agonized countenance moved Monchotte to greater pity than the girlish tear of many a group. To these was added the massive and lofty form of the great Danton, before whom Monchotte stood, as he says, appalled. The silent gaze of the great Revolutionist seemed to speak like the old Roman, "wretch dost thou slay Caius Marius?"

In June the Regnault family pass under his shears, all lost by that one daughter Anna, who called on Robespierre in her madness and thus swept her house out of existence. At the same time we have record of the lovely and exquisite Mademoiselle St. Amaranth, the most beauteous and pitiful of all the children of death, and then came the heavy fournées of July and the dread Thermidor, never to be forgotten; of the last of which days, he writes thus:

"On the tenth, I saw a spectacle which transcended all my dreams of the impossible, and distanced all my past experience of changing fortune; my pen trembles as I record the fact. This day I cropped Robespierre himself, with Couthon, St. Just, Henriot, and others, who but a few days ago were masters of Paris. What a sight was this? Robespierre lay bloody and speechless in the Conciergerie, and groaned as I touched his wounded jaw. The rest silent like tigers crouching in despair. Before sun-set they met their doom in the Place de la Revolution. Their locks indicated power, and by this rule they should have triumphed, but the Fates were too strong for them. Such is history, in which I bear my part."

But Monchotte saw a succession of remarkable culprits, claiming his services, in whom he beheld a contrast hardly less impressive than the foregoing. Thus of that commune, or city government which had borne so large a part in the revolution, and which was devoted to Robespierre, seventy members are shorn by him in one afternoon. But a greater sensation even than this was subsequently made, as appears from his record, by the fact that after the Reign of Terror was over, the leaders of the tribunal and most of the jury came under his hands. Thus he writes on the seventh of May, 1795, the following statement, concerning one of the most striking instances of retribution on record:

"This day I cropped Fouquier Tinville and Varzelles and Dix Aout and others of his jury; a stranger and more astonishing scene I never expect to witness. For two years Fouquier has been sending his victims to my shears, and now he comes in his turn, and I who was once condemned by him must prepare his neck for the axe. What a scene would it have been, could all the fournées which he has sent to death gaze upon this retribution? An army of ghosts followed him, or at least so the wretched man seemed to feel, as he was led to the cart, and started with his tribunal for the Place de la Revolution."

Among the women who received their death toilet at Monchotte's hands, there was one who impressed him by some traits which he omits to describe, but rather alludes to as exceeding his power. He speaks of a calm and majestic dignity like that of the Queen, and combined with a pensive beauty which had escaped the ravages of time and misfortune. An interest greater than anything of a personal nature arose however from the fact that certain papers belonging to her had been placed in his possession in trust for her family, to whom Monchotte had pledged himself to deliver them with a sacred care.

In addition to the manuscripts she desired him to preserve the long and lustrous tresses which he was severing from her head, in order that they might be restored as memorials to her friends. But what was more important still she entrusted to his care a lovely boy from whom she was now to be torn by the executioner, and of whom he accepted charge until his kindred could reclaim him. From this charge Monchotte was relieved by events which are recorded in this volume, and the papers, the tresses, and the lad were returned, but the circumstance made a deep impression on him, and he refers to it several times in his diary.

The singular history of the mother and child mentioned by Monchotte has been often solicited, but from motives of delicacy the family has withheld them. The recent death of Count Freron de Martel, however, has removed all objection, and the survivors have permitted the publication of the manuscript.

The reader will observe, that a part of the chronicle is given in the words of Zoe, Countess de Martel, while the remainder is thrown into the form of a narrative. It was thought that this method would be best adapted to bring out the incidents of her eventful life. The editor makes no apology for the intervals which occur in the early part of the record; nor for the occasional foot notes by means of which he has sought to throw light on an interesting period.‡—Martel Papers.

*"Fournée was a term borrowed from the bakers; it signifies a batch of bread. When single executions became rare and cartloads were sent to death at a time, this word was found convenient and expressive.

†Sans culotte, literally, without breeches, a popular term for the lower classes of Paris.

‡Zoe, like all names derived from the Greek, requires E final to be sounded.

OFFENBACH has signed with the manager of the Porte-Saint-Martin, an agreement to set music to the Bourgeois Gentilhomme of Molière. As La France Musicale justly remarks, "To turn high class works like this into comic operas reminds one of those people who take a Milo's Venus to ornament their staircase, with a gas-jet on her head."

WAITING BY THE GATE.

BESIDE a massive gateway built up in years gone by,
Upon whose top the clouds in eternal shadow lie,
While streams the evening sunshine on quiet wood and lea,
I stand and calmly wait till the hinges turn for me.

The tree-tops faintly rustle beneath the breeze's flight,
A soft and soothing sound, yet it whispers of the night;
I hear the woodthrush piping one mellow descant more,
And scent the flowers that blow when the heat of day is o'er.

Behold the portals open, and o'er the threshold, now,
There stops a weary one with a pale and furrowed brow;
His count of years is full, his allotted task is wrought;
He passes to his rest from a place that needs him not.

In sadness then I ponder how quickly fleets the hour
Of human strength and action, man's courage and his power.
I muse while still the woodthrush sings down the golden day,
And as I look and listen the sadness wears away.

Again the hinges turn, and a youth, departing, throws
A look of longing backward, and sorrowfully goes;
A blooming maid, unbinding the roses from her hair,
Moves mournfully away from amidst the young and fair.

Oh glory of our race that so suddenly decays!
Oh crimson flush of morning that darkens as we gaze!
Oh breath of summer blossoms that on the restless air
Scatters a moment's sweetness, and flies we know not where.

I grieve for life's bright promise, just shown and then withdrawn;
But still the sun shines round me; the evening bird sings on,
And I again am soothed, and, beside the ancient gate,
In this soft evening sunlight, I calmly stand and wait.

Once more the gates are opened; an infant group go out,
The sweet smile quenched forever, and stilled the sprightly shout.
Oh frail, frail tree of Life, that upon the greensward strows
Its fair young buds unopened, with every wind that blows!

So come from every region, so enter, side by side,
The strong and faint of spirit, the meek and men of pride.
Step's of earth's great and mighty, between those pillars gray,
And prints of little feet mark the dust along the way.

And some approach the threshold whose looks are blank with fear,
And some whose temples brighten with joy in drawing near,
As if they saw dear faces, and caught the gracious eye
Of Him, the Sinless Teacher, who came for us to die.

I mark the joy, the terror; yet these, within my heart,
Can neither wake the dread nor the longing to depart;
And, in the sunshine streaming on quiet wood and lea,
I stand and calmly wait till the hinges turn for me.

THE ARTS IN CHINA.—They have manufacturers of false noses in China, but none of false teeth. There are practitioners who profess to cure the toothache instantaneously, and people worthy of credit have assured me they succeed in doing so. The works of European dentists are among the most admired examples of the skill of foreigners. A mandarin who was anxious to learn something about the making of teeth, once produced to me a box full of artificial noses of various sizes and colors, with which he supplied the defects of his own; he said he used one sort of nose before, and another after his meals, and insisted that Chinese ingenuity was greater than our own. What, in process of time, will be the action of western civilization on the farthest eastern regions—whether, and in what shape we shall make returns for the instruction our forefathers received from thence—is a curious and interesting inquiry—more interesting from the vast extent of the regions before us. The fire-engine is almost the only foreign mechanical power which has been popularized in China There is scarcely a watch or clockmaker in the whole empire, though opulent men generally carry two watches. The rude Chinese agricultural and manufacturing instruments have been nowhere supplanted by European improvements. No steamship has been built by the Chinese; the only one I ever saw would not move after it was launched; it was said a Chinaman, who had only served on an English steamer as stoker, was required by the authorities to construct the vessel. There is neither gold nor silver coinage; the only currency being a base metal, chien, whose value is the fifth of a farthing. The looms with which their beautiful silk stuffs are woven are of the most primitive character. Yet they have arts to us wholly unknown. They give to copper the hardness and the sharpness of steel; we cannot imitate some of their brightest colors. They have lately sent us the only natural green which is permanent, which has been known to them, as printing, wood engraving, the use of the compass, artillery practice, and other great inventions, from immemorial time. Paper was made from rags long anterior to the Christian era, and promissory notes were used at a still earlier period. The Chinese may be proud of a language and a literature which has existed for thirty centuries, while in Europe there is no literary language now written or spoken which would have been intelligible seven hundred years ago. If, then, this singular people—more than a third of the whole human race—look down with some contempt on the "outside races," let them not be too harshly judged, or too precipitately condemned.

JULES BENEDICT has just published three new compositions—an andante in B, a rondo in E flat with orchestral accompaniments, and a sonata in E minor for basso and violin.

LIVELY GREEK HORSES.

[EDMUND ABOUT, in his Greece and the Grecks, gives the following incident of travel:]

THE second day of my journey in the Morea, we were making our way quietly along towards the Isthmus of Corinth, and the village of Kalamaki. We had just crossed the Scironian rocks, and I was thinking to myself that if my horse was as tired as I was, he would lie down early. In crossing a little stream, Curzon got down to drink, and went on on foot; his horse, left to himself, went on in front. I was at the head of the caravan, and, without taking any notice, saw him pass, but an old Agoyat thought of catching him. The horse trotted, the Agoyat also trotted; the horse began to gallop; I began to laugh at seeing how much better organized for running four-legged animals are, than simple bipeds. But my horse, seeing his companion running, was indulging in his own reflections. He said to himself: "This is a very vain animal; because he has not got a rider on his back, he thinks he is going to leave us behind; we will soon see!"

The next thing was to start off at full gallop. I held tight the bridle. I held tight with my knees, I held on to everything I could; I gathered together my recollections of Leblanc's riding-school. Good or bad grace, there was no help for it, but to go on and race.

However, the baggage-horse, touchy like all people of low occupations, became indignant in his vulgar soul against the saddled animals who affected to gallop before him. "Because I have a few mattresses on my back, and a few boxes and a few plates, you think I am only a donkey! just wait; I will show you if I was made to carry burdens." At the first bound, our plates were on the ground—ten fine new plates! nothing left of them but chips; at the second, our mattresses were hung out on a lentish bush; at the third, the animal was already gone. His colleague, who was carrying Lefteri, reminded of his duty by the presence of his master, and seized with horror at the sight of the ruins which ambition strews on its way, stopped short, and refused to put one foot before another. As for Garnier's horse, he had long been running after mine.

As ill-luck would have it, we were on a plain, and an uncultivated one—not a rock to stop the horses, not a ploughed field to tire them. I am bound in fairness to say, that Curzon's horse, which led us all, was following the straight road, and directing us to Kalamaki. But we had much rather arrive there less rapidly.

At the end of an enormous minute, my horse arrived, always second on the sea sand. I wanted very much to push him into the water to cool; but do what I would to pull to the left, his competitor was going to the right, and he followed to the right. A little further I saw within reach a rock of rather imposing aspect. I thought of breaking my horse's head against it, but restrained myself on thinking of my own. A second minute passed; it seemed I had been galloping for for an hour. Behind me I heard a horse galloping, and the noise of something dragging: I thought with horror that it was perhaps Garnier's horse, and attempted to drag my left foot out of the stirrup; the stirrup had caught between my shoe and gaiter.

We had left the beach, and were running over flat country, on a little peninsula. I thought over to myself what a deal of ground the horses get over in the Champ de Mars on race days; certain verses also of the story of Mazeppa came back to my mind, and its terrible chorus hummed in my ears. The peninsula was coming to an end, I found myself again in front of the sea, and this time the shore appeared to be precipitous. Curzon's horse stopped:—I was saved; but hearing my galloping, he started off afresh. I was quite blown; I had one hand cut as if I had been gathering grass for a week; my ears were ringing, my sight confused; I made a successful effort to disengage my foot, and I jumped down, head foremost.

I remained for a few moments stunned; it seemed as if there was a great crowd round me, that music was playing, and that they were offering me ices; I heard five or six songs which I promised myself I would remember. When I opened my eyes and came to myself, I was alone, lying on my back, fifty paces from my hat; I perceived a great black bird in a tree—it was my cloak, which I thought I had fastened securely to the pommel of the saddle. I took a direction as well as I could by the help of the sun, and I walked, staggering a little, to where our people ought to be found. I had not gone twenty paces, when I saw Lefteri run up and ask what had become of his horses. I told him that they were not broken-winded, and that they had gone on in front to Kalamaki; the poor fellow ran off in pursuit. After him came Garnier, safe and sound. His horse, having to choose between successful vanity and a ditch ten feet wide, had taken the wisest course. Alfred de Curzon asked of all the bushes for his lost papers and drawings, and the Agoyats accused one another of having caused all the misfortunes.

On reaching Kalamaki, we found Lefteri and all his horses. The amiable beasts had arrived, galloping all the way to the first houses of the village, where they had been stopped. Very fortunately; for, at the pace at which they were going, they might have gone all round the Morea, and returned to their stables.

"MARK TWAIN" ON THE BALLAD INFLICTION.

IT is bound to come! There is no help for it. I smell it afar off—I see the signs in the air! Every day and every hour of every day I grow more and more nervous, for with every minute of waning time the dreadful infliction comes nearer and nearer in its inexorable march! In another week, maybe, all San Francisco will be singing "Wearing of the Green!" I know it. I have suffered before, and I know the symptoms. This holds off long, but it is partly that the calamity may gather irresistible worrying-power, and partly because it is harder to learn than Chinese. But that is all the worse; for when the people do learn it they will learn it bad—and terrible will be the distress it will bring upon the community. A year ago "Johnny came marching home!" That song was sung by everybody, in every key, in every locality, at all hours of the day and night, and always out of tune. It sent many unoffending persons to the Stockton asylum. There was no stopping the epidemic, and so it had to be permitted to run its course and wear itself out. Short was our respite, and then a still more malignant distemper broke out in the midst of this harried and suffering community. It was "You'll not forget me, mother, mother, mother, mother!" with an ever-accumulating aggravation of expression upon each successive "mother." The fire-boys sat up all night to sing it; and bands of sentimental stevedores and militia soldiers patroled the streets and howled its lugubrious strains. A passion for serenading attacked the youth of the city, and they sang it under verandahs in the back streets until the dogs and cats destroyed their voices in unavailing efforts to lay the devilish spirit that was driving happiness from their hearts. Finally there came a season of repose, and the community slowly recovered from the effects of the musical calamity. The respite was not long. In an unexpected moment they were attacked, front and rear, by a new enemy—"When we were marching through Georgia!" Tongue cannot tell what we suffered while this frightful disaster was upon us. Young misses sang it to the guitar and the piano; young men sang it to the banjo and the fiddle; the un-blood-stained soldier yelled it with enthusiasm as he marched through the imaginary swamps and cotton plantations of the drill-room; the firemen sang it as they trundled their engines home from conflagrations; and the hated serenader tortured it with his damned accordeon. Some of us survived, and some have gone the old road to a haven of rest at Stockton, where the wicked cease from troubling and the popular songs are allowed. For the space of four weeks the survivors have been happy.

But as I have said before, it is bound to come! Arrah-na-Pogue is breeding a song that will bedeck some mountain with new-made graves! In another week we shall be "Wearing of the Green," and in a fortnight some will be wearing of the black in consequence. Three repetitions of this song will produce lunacy, and five will kill—it is that much more virulent than its predecessors. People are finding it hard to learn, but when they get it learned they will find it potent for harm. It is Wheatleigh's song. He sings it in Arrah-na-Pogue, with a sprig of shamrock in his hat. Wheatleigh sings it with such aggravated solemnity as to make an audience long for the grave. It is doled out slowly, and every note settles deliberately to its place on one's heart like a solid iceberg—and by the time it is finished the temperature of the theatre has fallen to twenty degrees. Think what a dead-cold winter we shall have here when this Artic funeral melody becomes popular! Think of it being performed at midnight, in lonely places, upon the spirit-depressing accordeon! Think of being driven to blow your brains out under such circumstances, and then dying to the grave-yard cadences of "Wearing of the Green!" But it is bound to come, and we may as well bow our heads and submit with such degree of Christian resignation as we are able to command.—Territorial Enterprise.

A JEFFERSONIAN JOKE.—Mr. Jefferson's great height and slender figure exposed him to much ridicule from his opponents: his soubriquet with them was "Long Tom;" and when his famous project of the substitution of gun-boats in place of a navy was adopted by Congress, and the attempt made to put it into practice, the cannon, disproportionately large, with which each of the ill-constructed craft was burdened, obtained, in contempt, the name of a "Long Tom." Nothing could present a more striking or more singular contrast than the figures of Mr. Jefferson and General Knox; the one very short—the other lank and lean, and unusually tall. They happened to meet one morning on the steps at General Washington's lodgings. The two gentlemen approached from opposite directions, and arriving at the same moment, a contest in etiquette took place between them. The general at the head of an army, and full of its chivalric politeness, could not think of passing in before the co-equal head of the Department of State; while the civil officer of the Government was equally averse to taking precedence of the military; and they stood for some moments, each drawing back and waving the other forward. In the midst of this somewhat entertaining scene, the notorious Judge Peters, the greatest wit of his day, came up directly in front. Perceiving how matters stood, and casting a sly glance from one side to the other, he pushed boldly between them, exclaiming as he passed: "Pardon me, gentlemen, if in my haste I dash through THICK and THIN."

NOTICE.

The publication of "The Californian" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

THE ADDISONIAN LECTURES.

THE first Lecture before the Addisonian Society was delivered Thursday evening at the Howard-street Methodist Church, by the Rev. Horatio Stebbins. The house was tolerably filled, and some were present who are not often found in attendance upon Divine worship. The lecturer, in brief outline, brought to view the cardinal points of his religious faith, which were four in number: The belief in God, the creator and preserver of the universe; this God not a trinne God, but God over all and above all. The immortality of man. A Hereafter for Retribution; and, finally, a Hereafter for Restoration. Mr. Stebbins contented himself with stating these points without arguing at any great length in regard to any one of them. Incidentally he spoke of the moral nature of man; the absoluteness of right and wrong; asserting that that which it would be wrong for man to imitate, it would be wicked for God to perform. The lecture was well delivered, and in admirable spirit and temper. The reverend gentleman regretted that the Catholic and Jewish churches appeared to have no representation in the "course." He did not know whether they had been invited, or if invited had refused to accept the invitation. At the close of the lecture, Dr. Peck remarked that the "Addisonians" had not thought of extending an invitation to either of the denominations, of whom Mr. Stebbins had justly said, that the great good done in past ages by the Israelitish seet ought never to be forgotten, and that, denying as he did, the dogmas of the Roman Catholic Church, yet it was to be frankly admitted "that she was the mother of us all."

The only fault we have to find with the lecturer was, that he was too general. In so far as he did state the points of his belief, he was explicit enough; but, doubtless, there were many anxious to hear his views touching the inspiration of the Bible, Provideutial interference, etc., to which no allusion was made.

The next lecture will be delivered by the Rev. George Mooar (Congregationalist) on Thursday evening of next week.

NEW BOOKS.

WE are indebted to A. Roman & Co., No. 417 and 419 Montgomery street, for the following new books:

Memoirs of the Life of William Shakspeare, with an essay toward the expression of his genius, and an account of the rise and progress of the English drama. By Richard Grant White.

The present volume, although bound with an uniform set as Vol. I., really completes Mr. Grant White's editiou of Shakspeare's works. In this day of new readings and original impersonations, this latest addition to Shakspearean literature has a peculiar interest It differs from others in its conservative nature, its regard for the ancient text before innovators and emendators had worked their will with it, and is an attempt to restore the text as nearly as possible to the condition in which Shakspeare left it. There being no authentic text from the author's own hand, Mr. White has adopted the folio of 1623 as most authoritative. He seems to have exercised necessary discrimination, however, even in his conservatism; he has not restored evident imperfections or corruptions, stage interlineations or deviations, and has used his own taste in adopting or rejecting the suggestions of different commentators. It might be questioned if Mr. White has not, while stripping the text and margin of much verbiage, and saving and arranging what was really valuable comment, gone too far in some of his literalisms. There is a suspicion of pedantry in the taste which preserves such verbal peculiarities of the language as is exhibited in the following from Hamlet:

> ——"yet once methought
> It lifted up it head, and did address
> It self to motion."

Or in Lear:

> "The hedge sparrow fed the cuckoo so long
> That it had it head bit off by it young."

We cannot help suspecting that this is introduced with a certain ostentation of letting us know that the editor knew that in Shakspeare's time "it" was used in the possessive, without the distinguishing terminal letter. But when we remember that in Winter Tale and Henry VIII. the word appears in its more modern form, we cannot see the object of retaining this clumsy barbarism, except to prove that Hamlet and Lear were written before the others. For preserving the full or contracted forms of the past participle in ed, of the second person singular of verbs in est, and the blending of contiguous words, there is some reason and less disregard of euphony.

But Mr. White's task has been evidently a labor of love and sympathy. In this respect he will please every admirer of the great dramatist, for he has edited Shakspeare more like a lover than a critic. If he has given us few corrections and emendations, it is because he is too enthusiastic to give even this tacit admission of present imperfection.

The "Essay toward the Expression of Shakspeare's Genius," "The Memoirs of Wm. Shakspeare," (an extract from which is given in another column,) and "An Account of the Rise and Progress of the English Drama to the Time of Shakspeare," which exhibits considerable historic research, comprise the contents of the present volume. It is beautifully printed on tinted paper with liberal margiu to its pages, and is prelaced by a gracelul dedication to William H. Seward.

ANA.

THE tender calm and kindliuess of the moonlit evenings duriug the past week, have offered such a contrast to the usual austerities of our summer nights, that the popular voice never wearies of hymning their praises. Yet it is a proof of the rarity of really pleasant weather in this climate, rather than of any logical acumen or scieutific knowledge on the part of San Franciscans, that they invariably look with suspicion upon this atmospheric blandness, aud, with a vague idea of the laws of compensation, call it "earthquake weather." The terrible suggestiveness of this epithet does not, however, interfere with the enjoymeut of these lovely days and eelestial nights. The roads leading toward Seal Rock, the Ocean House, and San Bruno have been nightly crowded with vehicles; the thoroughfares, especially the Portrero Bridge, have been filled with promenaders. I should have, perhaps, giveu the preference to the bridge as the most democratic and economical medium of enjoyment but for a recent experience. One uight while strolling over it, felicitating myself upon the appearauce of the city as it lay bathed in mysterious moonlight—its harsh, unfinished, and uncouth outlines subdued and mellowed; upon the glancing waters of the bay, flashiug with bright lights here and there against the piles or about the hull of some shadowy outlying bark; upon the passing promenaders linked together in mystic couples, suddenly and without a note of preparatiou, but with evident deliberation and malice aforethought, oue of a file of young ladies and gentlemen directly before me saw fit to lift her voice in song. We have the authority of Shakspeare certainly, that > ——"soft stillness and the night > Become the touches of sweet harmony," but it is somewhat questiouable if "You will not forget me, mother," even when aided by a strong masculine chorus, is appropriate or soothing to the spirits at such a moment. At all events, possibly owing to some harmonious deficieucy in my breast, some strategic and treasouable quality which forbade my being moved "by concord of sweet sounds," the effect of this obligato was terribly disenchanting. The hard outliue of the hills seemed to come back; a key-note of the breezy shrillness of our summer afternoons was struck in that strong-minded female's voice, and I touched the earth agaiu. Surely, if the privileges of a public performer were taken by her, the usual privileges ol an audience in expressing approval or disapproval belonged to me.

A few nights after this experience I was induced to try the Cliff House road, in a buggy, with a companion. The evening was singularly beautiful and propitious. As we bowled along over the crumbling gravel, the toll-keeper, who started out of the magical moonlight and mysterious stillness, might have giveu us tickets to some celestial city, beyond the dread valley of the shadow of death, whose gleaming tombs we rattled so irreverently by, aud whose cross, alar on a lonely hill, glittered and glanced beside us. The moon, riding high, touched the rough rocks as tenderly as though they were the crags of Latmos, forgetful that our western shepherds sleep with oue eye open, and always make the first advances. The light on the Farralleones flashed out and was lost ere we could fix it. Sometimes, on entering a little valley, we would come upon a thin strata or current of warm air, as though a summer noon had got belated in the hills and lost its way iu travelling westward. But the influence of the locality soon became fatally apparent. Our horse, whom my companion addressed as "Billy," but who, from a certain peculiarity of gait, I mentally christened "The Macadamizer," was what is called "a fast horse." To him the moonlight and beatitudes of scenery only suggested actiou. In an unlucky moment a rash individual attempted to pass us. "The Macadamizer" gave oue wild dash, afforded us a twinkling glimpse of all his four hoofs at once and darted forward at headlong speed. We shot far ahead of the infelix stranger; but this triumph seemed only to incite "Macadamizer" to more frantic efforts. Far ahead hesuiffed a rival. The loose gravel and fliuty rock flew to pieces beneath his hammering hoofs. The buggy no longer rolled along, but lifted itself in convulsive leaps as though it were possessed of a desire to mount the back of our ambitious steed. As I turned to my companion and mildly remonstrated against the inappropriate and unharmouious character of these proceedings, I was horror-struck at his apparent transformation. By nature and education calm-eyed, even-voiced, quiet and refined—delicately organized and free from demonstrative action—this man was totally demoralized by the wild "Macadamizer!" His hat was pushed back from his thoughtful brow: his teeth were set, his hands grasped the reins firmly—there was no mistaking it—a secret and guilty sympathy existed betweeu him and the relentless "Macadamizer." Under the deceitful and ostentatious show of reining in this ambitious animal, he was actually urging him to greater effort. In vain I pointed to the stars in their regular and carefully graduated orbits. Outwardly assenting to the truth of my suggestions, calmly assuring me of his perfect sympathy, he succeeded so completely in controlling "Macadamizer," that, in a few seconds, we not only overtook and passed that particular stranger, but indeed all others on the road. It is but just to him to state that, this position having been attained, he fully and sincerely joined me in deploring the process, with an eloquence perhaps a little heightened by the success of the result. But alas! for our æsthetic enjoyment. The genus loci had asserted itself. We were no longer pilgrims to the celestial city; no longer disciples of Thoreau in rapt sympathy with nature, but the proprietors of a fast horse, with Foster and whisky in the perspective.

PROCRASTINATION is not the only form in which Time may be abstracted. There exist individuals who, under less vague and general titles, indulge in peculation of this synonym for money. The Time-thief differs from the usual highwayman; the latter limits his despoilations usually to straugers—the former compels his most intimate friend to stand and deliver. No place can be guarded against his entrance; the counting-room, the private office, the editorial sanctum, is opened by the skeleton key of courtesy, which fits all locks and opens all doors. Once in, the Time-thief proceeds to prosecute his unhallowed calling. You are writing au important business letter; you are engaged on an editorial, or you are drawing a brief. The Time-thief begins by an artful display of frankness. He sees you are busy, he will not detain you a moment—he himself is busy, etc., etc. Beguiled by his remark, you drop your pen, and utter some confused and meaningless apology, with a vacant smile. The Time-thief begins haply with an allusion to your letter, your editorial, or your brief. For a few moments he is bearable, sometimes interesting. But, speedily dropping your business, he snddenly changes to his own. Commou courtesy, of course, forbids a too rapid change on your part. So you listen: at first resignedly, then with an unmistakable distraction of the eye, which will, after a formal circuit of the room, wander back to your manuscript. You make a feeble show of taking up your pen and punctuating your composition, or of crossing a t, or retonching the tail of a y. At intervals, you utter an indefinite response, which you mildly hope may be takeu for affirmation or negation, as the case may be. These signs affect the Time-thief no more than the struggles of the victim affect the garroter. But he is not altogether unmindful of them; no one knows better than he how much the victim can bear. When a sternness settles aronnd your mouth, and a preliminary cough rises to your lips, he leaves his seat as if to retire apologetically with his booty. Rash is the victim who at this moment is betrayed into softness—the movement was but a ruse; he has enlisted your attentiou, which was all he wanted, aud he succeeds in appropriating five minutes more to his ill gotten gains.

IT may be questioned whether Church Fairs or Festivals, as a means of collecting charity or contributions, are not in their decade. The old-fashioned Pious Bazaars and Serious Thread and Needle Shops have given way to Festivals and Charades, and it has been found necessary to approximate more closely to worldly entertainments for worldly patronage. Yet there was and still is a certain pleasure in viewing the pretty saints, who, in most cases, keep shop under pleasing and approprite alioses. Who has not felt a thrill at being importuned by HOPE to buy a ticket iu a raffle; or blushed when FAITH called upon him to exercise her peculiar talent, and blindly and fondly put his hand into a green bag, under the pleasing delusion of drawing out something worth having. Who does not recall the pleasing expectation with which he received the news that a letter was lying for him in the post-office, which missive, with his name prominently misspelled, he found to be filled with bland generalities. Whither have ye fled, "O blue-eyed banditti," who were wont to dart out of evergreen ambush upon the spruce young traveller and despoil him of his coin? Where are the refreshments which seemed like "locusts and wild honey" to the Sunday-school boy, and the marble "sody" fountain, which, to him, appeared even as the gushing rock, struck by the Mosaic hand?

To a reflective mind, I dare say that the street cars afford excellent opportunities of studying humanity iu sincerer forms, and at more advantageous focal distances than people suppose. The short interval of time in which strangers are thrown together leaves them no opportunity for deception. Snobs of either sex are apt to display their foibles even in the passage of a block. I am reminded of an incident which occurred in my experience, and which, at the time, I put into the pleasing and ever popular form, of a fable. I venture, in absence of more serious matter, to repeat it here.

THE FABLE OF BEAUTY, THE BEAST, AND THE PERFECT GENT—FOR GOOD LITTLE GIRLS AND BOYS.

Beauty was one day shopping on Montgomery street, and, getting quite weary, she thought she would ride. So she stopped a car. But when poor Beauty came to the door, and looked in, she saw it was full. Then a Beast, who was sitting by the door grumbled, "All full inside," and looked at Beauty as though he would eat her up. But a Perfect Gent got up from his seat and said: "Take my seat, dear Beauty, and I will stand up." Then Beauty smiled at the Perfect Gent; and the other Gents who were not Perfect said to each other: "Let us bust the crust of this Perfect Gent and black his eye." But while they were whispering among themselves, an Ugly Old Woman stopped the car and squeaked out: "Is there any room?" Then the Perfect Gent said, "All full inside;" but, to everybody's astonishment, the Beast got out and said to the Ugly Old Woman: "Take my seat." But the Perfect Gent jumped and took the Beast's seat, and pulled the bell so that the driver drove on, leaving the Beast and the Ugly Old Woman in the middle of the street. This made the passengers and the Perfect Gent laugh very much, for it was a Joke.

Moral.—This fable teaches us that we should endeavor to be a Beauty and a Perfect Gent, rather than a Beast or an Ugly Old Woman. Also, that whatever wrong a Beast may attempt, he will sooner or later be punished at the hands of a Perfect Gent. O, what a nice thing it is to be a Perfect Gent!

[The following travestie published three years ago in the columns of the Golden Era by the author of "The Californian's Condensed Novels," is here reproduced with a few essential alterations, as necessary to the completion of the series soon to be collected in a more permanent form, and as the only "condensed novel" not written for The Californian:]

FANTINE.

FROM THE FRENCH OF VICTOR HUGO.

[BY "BRET," THE CALIFORNIAN'S CONDENSED NOVELIST.]

PROLOGUE.

As long as there shall exist three paradoxes: a moral Frenchman, a religious Atheist and a believing skeptic—so long, in fact, as booksellers shall wait—say twenty-five years—for a new Gospel; so long as paper shall remain cheap and ink three sous a bottle, I have no hesitation in saying that such books as these are not utterly profitless.

Victor Hugo.

I.

To be good is to be queer. What is a good man? Bishop Myriel.

My friend, you will possibly object to this. You will say you know what a good man is. Perhaps you will say your clergyman is a good man, for instance.

Bah! you are mistaken; you are an Englishman, and an Englishman is a beast.

Englishmen think they are moral when they are only serious. These Englishmen also wear ill-shaped hats and dress horribly!

Bah! they are canaille.

Still, Bishop Myriel was a good man—quite as good as you. Better than you, in fact.

One day M. Myriel was in Paris. This angel used to walk about the streets like any other man. He was not proud, though fine-looking. Well, three gamins de Paris called him bad names. Says one:

"Ah, mon Dieu! there goes a priest; look out for your eggs and chickens!"

What did this good man do? He called to them kindly: "My children," said he, "this is clearly not your fault. I recognize in this insult and irreverence only the fault of your immediate progenitors. Let us pray for your immediate progenitors."

They knelt down and prayed for their immediate progenitors.

The effect was touching.

The Bishop looked calmly around:

"On reflection," said he, gravely, "I was mistaken; this is clearly the fault of society. Let us pray for society."

They knelt down and prayed for society.

The effect was sublimer yet. What do you think of that? You, I mean.

Everybody remembers the story of the Bishop and Mother Nez Retrousse. Old Mother Nez Retrousse sold asparagus. She was poor; there's a great deal of meaning in that word, my friend. Some people say "poor but honest." I say, Bah!

Bishop Myriel bought six bunches of asparagus. This good man had one charming failing; he was fond of asparagus. He gave her a franc and received three sous change.

The sous were bad—counterfeit. What did this good Bishop do? He said: "I should not have taken change from a poor woman."

Then, afterward, to his housekeeper: "Never take change from a poor woman."

Then he added to himself: "For the sous will probably be bad."

II.

When a man commits a crime society claps him in prison. A prison is one of the worst hotels imaginable. The people there are low and vulgar. The butter is bad, the coffee is green. Ah, it is horrible!

In prison, as in a bad hotel, a man soon loses, not only his morals, but what is much worse to a Frenchman, his sense of refinement and delicacy.

Jean Valjean came from prison with confused notions of society. He forgot the modern peculiarities of hospitality. So he walked off with the Bishop's candlesticks.

Let us consider: candlesticks were stolen; that was evident. Society put Jean Valjean in prison; that was evident, too. In prison, Society took away his refinement; that is evident, likewise.

Who is Society?

You and I are Society.

My friend, you and I stole those candlesticks!

III.

The Bishop thought so, too. He meditated profoundly for six days. On the morning of the seventh he went to the Prefecture of Police.

He said: "Monsieur, have me arrested. I have stolen candlesticks."

The official was governed by the law of Society, and refused.

What did this Bishop do?

He had a charming ball and chain made, affixed to his leg, and wore it the rest of his life.

This is a fact!

IV.

Love is a mystery.

A little friend of mine down in the country, at Auvergne, said to me one day: "Victor, Love is the World—it contains everything."

She was only sixteen, this sharp-witted little girl, and a beautiful blonde. She thought everything of me.

Fantine was one of those women who do wrong in the most virtuous and touching manner. This is a peculiarity of French Grisettes.

You are an Englishman, and you don't understand. Learn, my friend, learn. Come to Paris and improve your morals.

Fantine was the soul of modesty. She always wore high-neck dresses. High-neck dresses are a sign of modesty.

Fantine loved Thomolyes. Why? My God! What are you to do? It was the fault of her parents, and she hadn't any. How shall you teach her? You must teach the parent if you wish to educate the child. How would you become virtuous? Teach your grandmother!

V.

When Tholomyes ran away from Fantine—which was done in a charming, gentlemanly manner—Fantine became convinced that a rigid sense of propriety might look upon her conduct as immoral. She was a creature of sensitiveness—and her eyes were opened.

She was virtuous still, and resolved to break off the liason at once.

So she put up her wardrobe and baby in a bundle. Child as she was, she loved them both. Then left Paris.

VI.

Fantine's native place had changed.

M. Madelinc—an angel, and inventor of jetwork, had been teaching the villagers how to make spurious jet!

This a progressive age. Those Americans—children of the West—they make nutmegs out of wood.

I, myself, have seen hams made of pine, in the wigwams of those children of the forest.

But civilization has acquired deception too. Society is made up of deception. Even the best French society.

Still there was one sincere episode.

Eh?

The French Revolution!

VII.

M. Madeline was, if anything, better than Myriel.

M. Myriel was a saint. M. Madeline a good man.

M. Myriel was dead. M. Madeline was living.

That made all the difference.

M. Madeline made virtue profitable. I have seen it written: "Be virtuous and you will be happy."

Where did I see this written? In the modern Bible? No. In the Koran? No. In Rosseau? No. Diderot? No. Where then?

In a copy book.

VIII.

M. Madeline was M. le Mayor.

This is how it came about.

For a long time he refused the honor. One day, an old woman, standing on the steps, said:

"Bah, a good mayor is a good thing."

You are a good thing.

Be a good mayor.

This woman was a rhetorician. She understood inductive ratiocination.

IX.

When this good M. Madeline, whom the reader will perceive must have been a former convict, and very bad man—gave himself up to justice as the real Jean Valjean; about this same time, Fantine was turned away from the manufactory, and met with a number of losses from society. Society attacked her, and this is what she lost:

First her lover.
Then her child.
Then her place.
Then her hair.
Then her teeth.
Then her liberty.
Then her life.

What do you think of society after that? I tell you the present social system is a humbug.

X.

This is necessarily the end of Fantine.

There are other things that will be stated in other volumes to follow. Don't be alarmed: there are plenty of miserable people left.

Au revoir—my friend.

THEATRICAL TALK.

On Monday, Mr. Daniel E. Bandmann appeared in the character of "Don Cæsar de Bazan," playing it in an exquisitely novel style. If Mr. Bandmann's chief ambition be to play every character in a style as unlike as possible to that in which other actors play it, and thus display the originality of his genius, it must be confessed that he has, on several occasions, succeeded admirably in accomplishing this end, and in no instance has he been more successful than in the character of "Don Cæsar de Bazan." I am sorry to observe that the critics who did not manifest the slightest displeasure at Mr. Bandmann's exalting the Jewish usurer, "Shylock," into a princely merchant, were shocked at his making "Don Cæsar de Bazan" a giggling buffoon. For my part, I think Mr. Bandman's "Don Cæsar de Bazan" was a very amusing piece of acting, and whether his conception of the character be true or false, does not signify a fig's end. When Mr. Bandmann appeared as "Othello," on Wednesday night, then I did feel anxious that Shakspeare's great character should be played as he intended it to be played; alas! Mr. Bandmann had an "original conception" of this character also; he carefully avoided making the points which actors who have not remarkable genius make, and I must say that I did not observe him make any strong new points, to compensate for the omission of the old ones. Mr. Bandmann was ably supported. Mr. Charles Thorne's impersonation of "Iago" showed careful study and a thorough appreciation of the text; it was a quiet and highly finished piece of acting, and did Mr. Charles Thorne infinite credit, it being his first appearance in that character. Last night Othello was again produced, when Mr. Daniel E. Bandmann performed "Iago." I did not witness his enaction of this character, and cannot, therefore, say in what particulars, if in any, it was superior to that of our rising young Californian actor. Mr. Louis Aldrich played "Cassio" in a highly creditable manner, and managed his voice, which is apt, on some occasions, to become rather harsh, with greater skill than he has evinced in parts he has undertaken for some time past; the quiet pathos with which he delivered the words on "Othello's" owning to paving consented to his death, was extremely good. There was noise enough in the play, but it was all made by one actor; the others carefully avoided noisy declamation. Miss Sallie Hinckley acquitted herself very creditably in the character of "Desdemona;" and Mrs. Stewart, as "Emelia," was all that could be desired. Mr. George C. Boniface, on Tuesday evening, repeated his performance of Jocrisse, and afterwards appeared in the character of "Robert Macaire." On Thursday evening the sensational drama of Jocrisse was performed, Mr. Boniface playing the chief character; the performance concluded with Robert Macaire. Last night Mr. Boniface played "Othello." To-night a benefit will be given to the San Francisco Cadets. The performance will consist of Robert Macaire, Don Cæsar de Bazan and a bayonet drill by the company.

"Dear General, I never gave you cause!"

Mr. and Mrs. Jackson, late of the Australian stage, have arrived in this city, and will shortly appear under engagement to Mr. Maguire. With these accessions to the theatrical force already with us, there will be no lack of amusement during the winter months.

At the Metropolitan Theatre, Arrah-na-Pogue still draws a fair audience nightly. The coming week will, however, probably be its last. H. D. Thompson, who, by his clever impersonation of "Michael Feeny," has established himself firmly in popular favor, was the recipient of a splendid benefit on Wednesday night. Mr. Charles Wheatleigh has, during the time Arrah-na-Pogue has been running, been busily engaged in rehearsing other new plays. The next sensation will be the production of Savannah, which will be put on the stage with the same disregard of expense which has characterized the production of Arrah-na-Pogue. Mr. Wheatleigh has been afforded a fair start, by the immense run which his first production has had, and will be enabled to present novelties, in the same perfect style. A matinee is held to-day for ladies and children, when Boucicault's great drama will be performed.

No startling novelty has been produced at the Academy of Music during the week; the Live Indian, however, has caused many a hearty laugh. The benefit of Mrs. Myers was well attended, and quite a comfortable little sum was netted for the widow and her child. On Monday evening, Miss Emily Thorne, an English actress who has the reputation of excelling in comedy and burlesque, and is also a charming singer, makes her first appearance at the Academy of Music. Mr. Wall, a light comedian who accompanied Mr. George C. Boniface to this State, will also shortly make his appearance. This afternoon the performance will consist of Nan, the Good for Nothing and The Live Indian. In the evening, 1,000 Milliners Wanted, and Sarah's Young Man.

Touchstone.

Telegraphic.—Lord Palmerston, Prime Minister of England, died on the 17th ult. .. The Mississippi State Convention did not pass the amendment abolishing slavery. Wade Hampton has been elected Governor of South Carolina. He recommends the payment of the State's pro rata of the rebel war debt. It is rumored that in consequence of these facts President Johnson will relinquish his lenient policy to a considerable extent. .. The Juarez troops have been defeated at Matamoras. .. The reported uprising of the negroes in Jamaica is confirmed. Many revolting murders of white persons had been committed. .. In Paris, cholera is causing about two hundred deaths per day.

THE HAIR.

[We take the following extracts from a new work entitled The Hair, Scalp and Face:]

SOMETHING LIKE A WATERFALL.

DURING the first half of the eighteenth century, English ladies in private life wore their hair in a manner at once simple and elegant—in some respects, if not in all, resembling the style of the present day. But about the year 1745, we find the toupée irons coming into use. The front of the hair was curled with these instruments and turned back under the cap—which, it seems, was also a new thing. According to the industrious Stewart, this "was the first stage of wire caps, which reached about the middle of the head behind, with small wings on each side, and the hair, in a few buckles, hanging carelessly in the neck." Then came the French curls, from Paris. "They look like eggs strung in order, on a wire, and tied round the head," says Stewart, contemptuously. With the curls came also the French crape toupée; at the same time a mode called the English style, of straight and smooth hair, was also employed. "From a notion of cleanliness," the English, when they at first embraced these styles, had them imitated in false hair; and from similar notions they objected to powder. But fashion eventually triumphed, as usual, and they accepted the genuine modes, with all their filth and discomfort. The "scollop-shell" or Italian curls made their appearance just as some were beginning to tire of the French. They are described as consisting of "curls in three rows, done back from the face in their several shapes." Then there were the German curls, a "mixture of scollop-shell and French in the front, curled all over behind, or tete de mouton." Subsequently we find long curls in favor; these were French in style, but began far higher, "with the points rising as they went back." Also, "the toupée, with two curls done over wool."

Between 1760 and 1770, "cushions" came into use. The first were quite a modest affair, resembling, as we read, "an exceeding small woman's pin-cushion,"—whether the adjective refers to the woman or her pin-cushion I am not positive: probably the latter; but once this fashion was fairly started, it remained a long time popular, and of course the cushion appeared of all practicable sizes, according with the successive freaks of taste. Stewart wrote twelve or fifteen years afterwards, and testified that the hair "has been worn higher since, wider, narrower, lower, heavier, lighter, more transparent, more craped, smoother, etc. With one curl, two curls, three curls, four curls, five curls, and no curls at all, but all from the same foundation,"—meaning the cushions.

DOES THE HAIR GROW AFTER DEATH?

It has long been believed, on the authority of certain historical statements, that the hair continues to grow after death. Thus, it is said that when the sarcophagus which contained the head of Charles I. was lately opened, the hair was found to have attained a marvellous length. Wulferus speaks of a woman buried at Nuremberg, whose grave was entered after a lapse of forty-three years, when the hair of the deceased was observed streaming through the clefts of the coffin—which, I presume we are to infer, had become so crammed with post mortem tresses that the subsequent accumulation was forced to accommodate itself outside. A sufficient answer to these wild statements is afforded in the physiological fact that all vital action in the body necessarily ceases with life, and therefore the post mortem growth of the hair, at least through the regular mode of production must be considered as an impossibility. Some philosophers regard the hair as a parasite, possessing a kind of vitality of its own, and think it may flourish after the death of the body, like "small fibrous shoots out of an old tree," as Diembroeck observes, "which continue to grow after the tree is dead, having a proper vegetation of their own, differing from that of the root or trunk from whence they rise." Wilson fancies that he has "seen an apparent growth of the downy hairs on the dead body, where decomposition has made considerable progress; "but I am unwilling," he says, "to believe in such a phenomenon without further and more careful investigation." I do not think him over-cautious in this particular. Turner observes that, persuaded by the historical statements above mentioned, "some authors deny that the hair is a proper part of the body." This is certainly a summary means of dispatching the question; it however has the serious demerit of being unphilosophical. A better way of treating the phenomena is to regard them as being the offspring of delusion.

BEARDED WOMEN.

Olliver, a contemporaneous French physician, speaks in a recent paper of a young lady with an exquisitely fair skin, and beautiful deep black hair, who, in the course of recovery from a fever, found the whole surface of her body in the peculiar state sometimes exhibited upon exposure in cold weather, being covered with what are commonly termed "goose pimples." These remained, and in the course of a few days each became dark at the summit, and presently a little black hair appeared. In a month these hairs had grown so fast, she was entirely covered, her face, her palms, and the soles of her feet excepted, with a coat of hairs an inch in length. We are told by Eble, that during the reign of Maria Theresa there was a female hussar in the army, possessing a strong moustache, who served several years, rising to the rank of captain. In the last century there lived a woman called the Bearded Virgin of Dresden, whose portrait has been preserved. According to Michelis, her beard, which was three inches long, grew from each side of her chin, and was of snowy whiteness. At first she cut it every month, then every fortnight, and eventually twice a week. Contrasting strongly with her white beard was a moustache of short black hair. It is said she had a voracious appetite, a loud voice, and was a person of undoubted courage and boldness. A young woman of twenty-two, a native of Switzerland, applied at the Charing Cross Hospital, London, for a certificate of her sex, in order to satisfy the scruples of a clergyman before whom she had come to be married, who could not believe that whiskers and a beard four inches long were consonant with her representations. It seems that she was born with hair upon the face, and that at eight years it had attained a length of two inches. She stated that she had a brother quite as remarkable for the absence of beard. She had no moustache. A sister two years younger possessed the same peculiarities. Subsequently to her marriage she was exhibited in London, under the appellation of the "Hairy Prodigy." These particulars were furnished to the London Times by Dr. Chowne. Dr. Grau, of Louisville, has made known the case of a woman, aged seventy-eight, healthy, and the mother of a large family, whose face, at the sides, on the chin, and lips, was covered thickly with coarse hair, which she was obliged to shave off as often as once in a week. She was very masculine in appearance; in fact, the long hair of her head was apparently her sole feminine characteristic.

A CELEBRATED writer has said: "The love of Nature, if we would prove how long and beautiful it makes existence, must not be left as a mere amusement that can be taken to at any time. Like the love of virtue, it must be commenced in youth. A man may learn a language or a science when he is grown up, but he cannot then learn to love Nature. This love he must bring with him from his boyhood, when it germinates in all, though, with most, dried up in its earliest leaf. How many, who have mildewed and rusted amid the mock pleasures of towns, would fain return, when too late, to their first young love! Doubtless, every man carries with him some remnant of his early love for nature; but it is not that deep, animating love, which, by its freshness and fullness, keeps the heart green. Virtually, to affect us, it must grow with our growth and strengthen with our strength. Hence the paramount value in the education of youth of Natural History, or, at least, of a fostering of the native taste in the human heart for the poetical contemplation of natural objects and phenomena. Let everything be taught children, which forms and exercises the habit of attention, and the power of judging things by the eye. Consequently, Botany—that inexhaustible, tranquil, ever interesting science, attaching the mind to nature with bonds of flowers. Especially should these things be taught to children of the poor, whose means of indulgence in costly pleasures are so scanty. There is not a child who does not delight in wild flowers, and whose intelligence cannot be led, if kindly dealt with, to find in botany a pleasure, which, of all others, requires least outlay of time and money, and is most easily and permanently within reach. The heart never grows old, if it bring with it from its childhood a lively interest in the re-appearance of Spring flowers, the habits of birds and insects, the changing tints of the Autumn leaves. The naturalist's poem is the pleasures of memory and the pleasures of hope, both in one. He has always a to-morrow to his pleasures, whereas, with most, there is only a yesterday and to-day. Let the young not neglect or despise these sweet pleasures, and they will find that, when old, they will not depart from them." This love of nature requires no peculiar circumstances. Its sphere is where the sun is shining, because it addresses itself to what the listless call weeds and stones, finding poetry and delight where the dull cry, All is barren.

THE London newspapers have lately been wasting a great deal of their space and of the reader's time on the case of Howard Glover, an English composer of some ability, who has for several years been acting as musical critic of the London Morning Post. Glover wrote well, but he offended his employers by giving a series of "monster concerts." He was dismissed; the newspapers published columns about what was purely a personal matter; and the end of it all is that Glover has been taken back again as critic on the condition that he gives no more concerts and writes no more songs for singers.

MADAME VAN ZANDT, the vocalist, will leave in a few weeks for Europe, to study at Milan under the best Italian masters. She has a voice which will well repay judicious training, and such a winter of studies as she contemplates will prove in the end far more beneficial to her than remaining here to make occasional appearances on the stage as Lucia or Gilda.

SINGULAR RESEMBLANCE.—It is no new thing to say that twins have been known to be actuated by the same impulses, tastes, and desires, but it is a rare thing to hear this averred on oath. A case of the kind, however, occurred in a French Court of Justice recently. Four children, Arthur Persico, aged eleven, Prosper Marteau, aged thirteen, and two twin brothers, aged eleven years and six months, were placed before the magistrate for stealing sundry articles from the stalls on which they were exhibited. Their parents, as is customary in France, were summoned before the tribunal, as civilly responsible. The whole of them confessed to their offences, and their parents, all of them honest workpeople, begged the magistrate to give them up to them, and not to send them to a house of correction. The mother of the twins made the following curious statement concerning them: "My two children are twins, and, strange to say, whatever one does the other does also; they have the same tastes, the same habits, the same thoughts, good or bad; they are not vicious, but when one runs away from home, the other follows him. Since last January, we have kept them shut up indoors like slaves, to keep them from running about the streets, and getting into mischief. My husband had decided on sending them to sea, for we had found out that they had robbed us of some small coins which happened to be left about, but we had no idea that they had committed thefts out of doors. We sent them to the national schools, but we know now they have not been there for several months; a boy named Persico corrupted one of them, and the other followed, as a matter of course." "You say," said the magistrate, "that your children are twins, and have the same character and the same tastes?" "Yes, sir; and there is a singular resemblance in their actions, thoughts, and desires. Thus when one drinks, the other, who may be in another room, drinks also. Under the same conditions, if one puts a finger in his mouth, the other does likewise. If at any time one should happen to run away from his home, there is no difficulty in finding him, for their father has only to take hold of the other, and he will lead him direct to the place where the runaway may then chance to be."

THE SARACENS IN SPAIN.—Scarcely had the Arabs become firmly settled in Spain, before they commenced a brilliant career. Adopting what had now become the established policy of the Commanders of the Faithful, the Khalifs of Cordova distinguished themselves as patrons of learning, and set an example of refinement strongly contrasting with the condition of the native European princes. Cordova, under their administration, boasted of more than two hundred thousand houses, and more than a million of inhabitants. After sunset a man might walk through it, in a straight line, for ten miles by the light of the public lamps; seven hundred years after this time there was not so much as one public lamp in London. Its streets were solidly paved; in Paris, centuries subsequently, whoever stepped over his threshold, on a rainy day, stepped up to his ankles in mud. The Spanish Mohammedans had brought with them all the luxuries of Asia. Their residences stood forth against the clear blue sky, or were embosomed in woods. They had polished marble balconies overhanging orange gardens; courts with cascades of water; retiring-rooms vaulted with stained glass, speckled with gold; the floors and walls were of exquisite mosaics. Here a fountain of quicksilver shot up in a glistening spray, the glittering particles falling with a tranquil sound like fairy bells; there, apartments into which cool air was drawn, in summer, from flower gardens. Clusters of frail marble columns surprised the beholder with the vast weights they bore. In the boudoirs of the Sultanas they were sometimes of verd antique, and incrusted with lapis-lazuli. Through pipes of metal, water, both warm and cold, to suit the season of the year, ran into baths of marble; in niches, where the current of air could be artificially directed, hung dripping alcarazzas. There were whispering-galleries for the amusement of the women; labyrinths and marble play-courts for the children; for the master himself grand libraries. At this brilliant focus barbarian Europe lighted its lamp of civilization.—Draper's Civil Policy of America.

HERCULANEUM.—There is talk of a further exploration of Herculaneum, encouraged, probably, by the success with which the researches of Pompeii have been prosecuted. A French paper gives a curious account of discoveries lately made at the latter place, and says that the gold and silver coin found there more than pay the expense of the works: "Near the temple of Juno, of which we lately spoke, a house has just been uncovered which, doubtless, belonged to some millionaire of those days, for the furniture is of ivory, bronze, and marble. The beds of the triclinium especially are of great richness; the floor is an immense mosaic, in parts very well preserved, and in the middle it represents a table laid for a great dinner. In the centre of the table, on a large tray, is seen a superb peacock with its tail spread, and with it another bird, also covered with beautiful plumage. Around them are lobsters, one of which holds a blue egg in its immense claws; the second holds an oyster, which appears to be fricasseed, for it is open and covered with chopped herbs: the third holds a stuffed rat; and the fourth a little jar full of fried grasshoppers. Then there is a row of dishes of fish, mingled with dishes of partridges, hares, and squirrels, which all hold their heads in their paws. After that comes a circular row of sausages in every form, another of eggs, oysters and olives, again surrounded by a circle of peaches, cherries and little melons, enclosed in turn by vegetables and various fruits. The walls of the triclinium are covered with paintings in fresco of birds, fruit, flowers, game and fish of all kinds, the whole intermingled with designs which give to the apartment an indescribable singularity and charm. On a table, in very rare wood, carved and incrusted with gold, marble, agate and apis-lazuli, stood amphoræ, which still contained wine, and some cups in onyx."

THE DAISY.

(BELLIS PERENNIS.)

THE English name of Daisy is derived from a Saxon word, meaning "days's eye," in which Ben Johnson writes it, and Chaucer calls it the "eie of the daie," and lost no opportunity of singing its praises, while Spenser speaks of it as

"The little dnlzie that at evening closes."

In the days of chivalry, this universal favorite was reckoned the emblem of fidelity in love, and was frequently worn at tonrnaments both by the ladies and knights. Alcestis was supposed to have been metamorphosed into this flower, and was therefore called "the daisy queen." In France it receives the name of La Marguerite, being dedicated to St. Margaret, a person of exquisite beauty. The field daisy, insignificant as it apparently is, exhibits, on examination, a world of wonders. Scores of minute blossoms compose its disk and border, each distinct, each useful, each delicately beautiful. The florets of the centre are yellow or orange-colored, while those of the ray are snow-white, tinged underneath with crimsou.

The followin· remarks of Gedner is particularly applicable to this interesting little flower: "We ought not to overlook the minutest objects, but to examine them with a glass, for we shall then perceive how much art the Creator has bestowed upon them." Langhorne is the first poet who notices the truly perenuial character of the daisy, in a stanza which might serve for a motto to Dr. Mason Good's beautiful and well known lines:

"That daisy, in its simple bloom,
Shall last along the changing year;
Blush on the snow of Winter's gloom,
And bid the smiling Spring appear."

From this period—or rather, we might say, from one still earlier, with these exceptions—until Burns again opened the gates of Natnre and let out a beauteous light upon the world. Daisies do not appear in poetry save as affording a standing Gradus ad Parnassum epithet for "meadows."

Burns has the merit of re-introducing this lovely flower; and, as if to compensate for its long absence, honors its return with a strain superior in natural beauty to any it had yet received. When we find poets such as Chaucer and Burns paying to the

"Wee, modest, crimson-tipped flower,"

some of the highest tributes of their muse, we are compelled to believe that, humble as it is, it possesses attractions which it is not given to inferior spirits fully to appreciate. No wonder that Burns loved this flower, for, in "the lowly daisy" which "sweetly blows," he found an emblem of himself—"a rustic Bard." And as he elsewhere says, in lines which might also be fitly applied to him who was the least artificial of modern poets:

"The daisy's for simplicity and unaffected air:"

L. E. L., in one of her fanciful descriptions of flowers, says:

——"those small flowers
Daisies, whose rose-touch'd leaves retrace
The gold and blush of morning hours."

Clare has a devotional appeal to the daisy:

"Daisies, ye flowers of lowly birth,
Embroiderers of the carpet earth,
That stud the velvet sod;
Open to Spring's refreshing air,
In sweetest smiling bloom declare
Your Maker and my God."

The closing of the daisy when it

——"sleeps upon the dewey lawn,
Not lifting yet the head which evening bowed,"

is a subject of deep contemplatinn by the first of modern philosophical poets:

"Observe how dewy twilight has withdrawn
The crowd of daisies frnm the shaven lawn,
And has restored to view its tender green,
That while the snu rode high, was lost beneath their dazzling sheen.
An emblem this of what the sober hour
Can dn fnr minds disposed to feel its power!
Thus oft when we in vain have wish'd away
The petty pleasures of the garish day,
Meek Eve shuts up the whole usurping host,
(Unbashful dwarfs each glittering at his post;)
And leaves the disencumber'd spirit free
To re-assume a staid simplicity."

And again in a like thoughtful vein:

"Small service is true service while it lasts;
Of friends, however humble, scorn not one:
The daisy by the shadow that it casts,
Protects the lingering dew-drop from the sun."

The beauty, the infinite variety of the vegetable world has ever been a theme for the poet's song. To man, even in his present advanced state of intelligence, a plant is surrounded with many mysteries, and the contemplative mind sees a shadow of divinity in the strange vitality of each green leaf. How much more mysterious must these wondrous organisms have appeared when the lights of science burned dimly on the earth, or were obscured by the thick veil of superstitious ignonance. The psychological influence of plants and flowers are continually figured forth in writings sacred and profane; the earliest poetry, as the latest song, bear evidence of the effects produced by them upon the human mind. The olive-branch of the Noahican dove, has ever been the emblem of peace, and since Job wrote, "He cometh forth like a flower and is cut down," the transitory beauties of vegetable life have been regarded as emblems of the instability of human existence. To pass over those oriental philosophies which invested all nature with a pantheistic spirit, and the lotus worship of the Egyptian priests, we find in the poetic mythology of the Greeks, abundant evidence of the holy dreams kindled by the contemplation of the vegetable world.

The sacred wreath of myrtle spoke to the human spirit of mortality, and the immortality of the soul was typified by the corn sown in the earth, by its revival in the greeu blade, and by its full ripeness in the golden harvest. By the Greek, every tree was invested with a divinity—a spirit held possession of every grove, thus giving poetical expressiou to their dim consciousness of that vitality which a modern philosophy—with somewhat too much haste—refers to certain physical forces or powers. Again in the wilder mythologies of the Scandinavian races, the creation of more northern and less luxuriant climes, we have a similar expression of the human dream, in the sylph which nestled amid the petals of the rose, or our own fairy sporting in the shadows of the lovely fern. Men, then, have ever felt the sweet influence of

Whatever earth, all-bearing mother yields,
In India, east, or west, or middle shore,
In Pontus, or the Punic coast, or where Alcinos reigned.

And even now, when a material philosophy invades the realms of poetry, there linger around the vegetable creation, unknown agencies—mysteries of life—which appear to radiate like the painted glories of the holy saints, lights redolent of the sanctity and love which still linger over the earth as a type of the joys of the lost Eden.

Stars are the daisies that begem
The blue fields nf the sky,
Beheld by all aud everywhere,
Bright prototypes on high:
Bloom nn, theu, unpretending flowers!
And to the waverer be,
An emblem of St. Paul's content,
Of Stephen's constancy.

ORIGIN OF THE FENIANS.

FROM the various accounts now being republished by our Eastern contemporaries of the origin of the Fenians, we select the following:

O'Halloran, an Irish historian, in the second volume of his History of Ireland, writes: "With Phœnius our Ethnic historians began their history, and so shall I. He is surnamed in our annals Farsaidh, or the sage, and is highly celebrated for his wisdom and for being the first inventor of letters. Our annalists count twenty-three generations from Phenius to his lineal successors, the sons of Milesius."

All the other Irish historians, who go back to its earliest antiquity, concur in the above account, so that it cannot be doubted the name of Fenian is derived from Fenius or Phœuius Farsa, the real or fabled first great chieftain of the Irish race.

The following acconnt of the ancient Fenians of Ireland is from Morley's Writers Before Chaucer: "Irish tradition says that the Fenians were an ancient militia, or standing army, employed only on home service for protecting the coasts from invasion. Each of the four provinces, says the tradition, had its band; that of Leinster, to which Fionn and his family belonged, being called the Clanna Baosigne. This militia is said to have been paid by the King, billeted on the people in the winter, but to have lived in summer by the chase. And these are imagined to have been the qualifications of a Fenian: 'Every soldier was required to swear that, without regard to her fortune, he would choose a wife for her virtne, her courtesy, and her good manners; that he would never offer violence to a woman; that as far as he could he would relieve the poor, and that he would not refuse to fight nine men of any other nation. No person could be received into the service unless his father and mother, and all his relatives gave security that none of them should revenge his death upon the person who might slay him, but that they would leave the matter to his fellow-soldiers. The youth himself must be well acquainted with the twelve books of poetry, and be able to compose verses. He must be a perfect master of defence; to prove this he was placed in a field of sedge reaching up to his knees, having in his hands a target and a hazel stick as long as a man's arm. Nine experienced soldiers, from a distance of nine ridges of land, were to hurl their spears at him at once; if he was unhurt he was admitted, but if wounded he was sent off with a reproach. He must also run well and defend himself when in fight; to try his activity, he was made to run through a wood, having a start of a tree's breadth, the whole of the Fenians pursuing him: if he was overtaken or wounded in the wood he was refused, as too sluggish and unskillful to fight with honor among such valiant troops. Also, he must have a strong arm and be able to hold his weapon steadily. Also, when he ran through a wood in chase his hair should not come untied: if it did he was rejected. He must be so swift and light of foot as not to break a rotten stick by standing upon it; able also to leap over a tree as high as his forehead, and to stoop under a tree that was lower than his knees. Without stopping or lessening his speed, he must be able to draw a thorn out of his foot. Finally, he must take an oath of fidelity.' The Rev. Geoffry Keating, who wrote a History of Erin in the year 1830, gravely says: 'So long as these terms of admission were exactly insisted upon, the military of Ireland were an invincible defence to their country, and a terror to rebels at home and enemies abroad.' Goll M'Morna had slain Fionn's father, Cumhaill, in battle, and was Fionn's mortal enemy in early life. Afterwards he made a peace with him, and fought under him as a chieftain of the Connaught Fenians. But the supremacy of the Clanna Baoisgne led to feuds, and at last Fionn and his clann, defying the throne itself, were attacked by the forces of Erin, except those of the King of Munster, who took part with him, and suffered carnage in that battle of Gabbra, wherein Oisin's son, Oscar, and King Cainbre fell by each other's hands. Fionu, who was absent, arrived only in time to close his grandson's eyes; and after this defeat, peace had no sweets for him and war no triumphs. Fionn died at last, it is said, by the lance of an assassin."

THE MAN WITH THE IRON MASK.

MANY have inqnired who this celebrated historic personage, to whom so many allusions have been made, really was. Voltaire, in his Age of Louis XIV., gives the following account of the mysterious prisoner of state:

"In 1661, there happened an event, of which there is no similar example in the history of the world, and with which the historians of that time seem to have been totally unacquainted. There was sent to the castle in the island of St. Marguerite, in the sea of Provence, an unknown prisoner, rather above the middle size, young and of a graceful figure. On the road he wore a mask with steel springs, which enabled him to eat without taking it off. He remained here closely confined till 1690, when St. Mars, the new governor of the Bastile, had him conveyed to that prisnn. During the journey he remained always covered with the mask, and the governor never sat down in his presence. He was lodged at the Bastile with all the attention possible at that dungeon. Nothing was refused him that he desired. His chief taste was for lace and linen remarkably fine. During his two journeys, the soldiers who escorted him had orders to shoot him if he made any attempt to discover himself.

"The unknown person died in 1703, and was buried in the night. What increases our surprise is, that when he was sent to the island of St. Marguerite, no person of consequence in Europe was missing. Yet the prisoner was certainly one of the great ones of this world. Every circumstance connected with him proves this. The governor put the dishes on the table himself, then retired and locked the door. One day the prisoner wrote something with his knife on a silver plate, and then threw it out of the window. A fisherman picked it up and brought it to the governor, who, with evident astonishment, asked the man if he had read what was written on the plate, or if anybody else had seen it. He was not allowed to go till he had proven these facts conclusively. The governor then dismissed him, saying, "It is lucky for you that you cannot read." One of the prisoner's shirts, written upon in a very fine hand, was one day discovered in the water by a young barber. Two days after the boy was found dead in his bed."

Another authority adds: "On the death of the Iron Mask, his apparel, linen, clothes, mattresses—in short, everything that had been used by him, were burnt, the walls were scraped and the floors taken up; all evidently from the apprehension that he might have found means of writing something that might have discovered who he was. The glass was taken out of the windows of his room and pounded to dust, the window frames and doors were burnt, and the ceiling and the plaster of the inside of the chimney were taken down. It was even affirmed that the body was buried without a head; and it was currently reported that a gentleman having bribed the sexton, had the body taken up, and found a stone instead of the head. The most prevalent opinion as regards this singular individual is, that he was the twin brother of Louis XIV., born some hours after him; and the king, their father, fearing that the pretensions of a twin brother might one day rekindle war in France, cautiously concealed his birth, and sent him away to be brought up in private.

Ladies and Gents' Furnishing Goods; and a large assortment of all goods usually kept by a first class Dry Goods Store.

AN INTERESTING LETTER.

Very few persons, even among physicians, would have been willing upon any terms to have been in the condition of the writer of the following letter on the 14th of February last. I will anticipate somewhat his report of the facts, by saying that on the 15th August, 1865, he made me a visit, "the very picture of health." Time, which tries and proves all things, has sufficiently tested this case, and shown that neither relapse or collapse having followed, the cure is perfect, and can be cited among the scores of similar cases, the result of my improved mode of treating disease without medicine.

G. M. BOURNE,
Water Cure Physician,
No. 10, Masonic Temple, Post street.

August 27, 1865.

Sacramento, April 30, 1865.

Dr. G. M. Bourne—Dear Sir: It is with pleasure and satisfaction that I now let you know of my good health. Looking back on what I have passed through, it seems as if I was lifted from the grave, and I think it my duty to acknowledge to you and the world the benefit I derived from water treatment as administered by you in your celebrated baths. It was in August, 1864, when disease developed itself with a severe cough. I then took medicines, getting worse, with chills, fevers, loss of strength, and was pronounced consumptive. This set me to thinking, and finally I determined to leave my business and go to the Sandwich Islands, having been informed that I could not be cured here. I went to San Francisco, and while waiting for a ship, called upon Dr. Bourne, who stated that a trip to the Sandwich Islands would probably result disastrously, was wholly unnecessary, as I could then be speedily cured at his establishment. I placed myself under his treatment, and in one week was so much improved that I thought I could risk returning home and to my duty as Engineer on the Central Pacific Railroad. The doctor objected; but I thought I knew better, and returned to my duty. In about two weeks my cough returned, and I kept getting worse, and, contrary to Dr. Bourne's injunction never to take medicine again, committed that folly, and soon was so completely run down that I could scarcely walk; so, as a last resort, I concluded once more to try the Water Cure. I went to San Francisco—few of my friends expected me to return; in fact, I thought my return doubtful. On arriving at Dr. Bourne's establishment (February 14, 1865,) I was not able to get into the bath without assistance, but in a few days I began to gain. I remained with him only six weeks, when I left, "a wiser and a better man," without the aid of medicine. I have now been at work several weeks, and find that I am gaining every day, and at present bid fair to be stouter than ever before. Persons visiting the Doctor's establishment will find it just what it should be, in both Ladies' and Gentlemen's Departments, and I cannot say too much in praise of the Doctor's kind attention to his patients.

This letter I write for the benefit of the afflicted, to be used as the Doctor decides, and should it be the means of directing any one to his care and treatment who (as they assuredly will) find relief, I will be paid for my trouble. Your obedient servant,

JAMES CAMPBELL,
Engineer Central Pacific Railroad.

San Francisco, August 25, 1865.

Advised by the undersigned, Mr. James Campbell, of the Central Pacific Railroad (who was then in a most deplorable state of ill health,) placed himself under the care of Dr. Bourne, the Water Cure Physician. Some six months or more afterward he visited this city, when I accidentally met him at Dr. Bourne's establishment, and, I am happy to say, restored to the enjoyment of good health and in fine spirits. JOHN SULLIVAN.

☞ Dr. Bourne treats all diseases of the throat, chest, and lungs—which includes diptheria, bronchitis, incipient consumption, pleurisy, croup, etc.—with the greatest success. Great relief is afforded in advanced stages of consumption. Rheumatism, paralysis, neuralgia, fever and ague, dropsy, etc., etc., are also cured quickly, pleasantly, and economically. No medicine whatever.

DENTIST WORK.—Messrs. Knowles & Clark have an improved method of combining their gold and vulcanite material in the manufacture of dentistry, which renders the work superior in finish and durability. The samples of their handiwork on exhibition at the late Fair were much admired, and we observe that they were awarded a special premium silver medal.—Mining and Scientific Press.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

A TRUE STORY.

DEDICATED TO THE SICK.

THERE dwelt in Sacramento a pale, bilious mechanic,
His muscles were strengthless, his blood it was chill;
And the wife of his bosom believed, in her panic,
The husband she worshipped was hopelessly ill.
Seeking daily for help, in her wifely devotion,
All vainly she tried pill, powder and potion—
Till at last, when a prey to grief's wildest emotion,
Of HOSTETTER'S BITTERS she heard from a friend.

She purchased the cordial, half hoping, half fearing,
A prayer on her lip and a tear in her eye;
And taking his hand, with words kindly and cheering,
Besought him the tonic for her sake to try.
As he drank, a new life through his system seemed stealing,
Each following draft did its mission of healing,
Until, strong in health and most grateful in feeling,
He told the "true story" here twined into song.

It is also proper to state that the Bitters are sold exclusively in glass, and never, under any circumstances, by the gallon or barrel. Imposters and imitators are abroad, and the only safeguard the public have against them is to see that the Bitters they buy have the engraved label and note of hand of Messrs. Hostetter & Smith, and their proprietary stamp over the cork of the bottle.

A DAINTY BRANCH OF ART.—A high reputation awaits Mrs. Read for the exquisite workmanship and general adaptability to their purpose of the Ladies' Skirt Supporters and Chest Expanders, of which she made such fine display at the late Fair. Her "Lady's Bust" is another aid to feminine beauty, which confers perfection on the wearer. Mrs. Read's establishment, 109 Montgomery street, is richly worth a visit.—San Francisco Sunday Mercury.

MANY OF THE DISEASES which hitherto baffled and defied the highest medical skill, are now speedily cured by Dr. H. A. BENTON, whose processes of applying electricity receive the approbation of all prominent physicians. The nerves are directly reached, and patients suffering from chronic complaints find almost immediate relief, and rapidly recover their former healthy condition. Dr. Benton is a physician of excellent reputation, and as a Medical Electrician occupies the front rank in his profession.—Golden Era.

TRIMMINGS.—Mrs. NORCROSS, No. 5 Masonic Temple, Montgomery street, is prepared to fill orders for civic and military at the shortest notice; also, invites the ladies to call and examine trimmings for Opera Cloaks received per steamer from New York. Mrs. Norcross has a Show Case on exhibition at the Fair, containing goods which for elegance and taste are not surpassed by any other establishment on the Pacific coast.—San Francisco Leader, Sept. 16th.

TOYS.—Toys can be purchased of Feldbush & Co., 307 California street, at 25 per cent. below the usual rates. Call and examine stock and prices.

DR. C. W. MOORE'S MEDICAL AND SURGICAL INSTITUTE.—In speaking of this Institution, the Sunday Mercury says: "Aside from the most skilful treatment and nursing, the large, airy and elegantly-furnished rooms, will enable the patients to enjoy all the comforts and luxuries of a home. All in all, we regard Dr. Moore and his Institute a most valuable acquisition to the Pacific Coast—the need of which we have long since felt." See advertisement.

MONEY TO LOAN.—$5,000 to loan, in small sums, on City Property, for a term of years; repayments received in monthly instalments. Deposits received at 1 per cent per month from month to month. Apply to the California Building and Loan Society, 406 Montgomery street, opposite Wells, Fargo & Co's.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direst poisons, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds, purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known, then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing amyl or fusil oil, a mortal poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, antibilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional culling and walk of life. Beware of imitations and impostures.

MACHINES SOLD IN TWO YEARS!

The almost incredible increase in the sale of the Singer Machine during the past two years is owing to the popularity of the LETTER A TRANSVERSE SHUTTLE Family Machine, which was introduced in 1860, since which time it has earned and established a reputation for family uses equal to the celebrated manufacturing machines of this firm, which are generally acknowledged even by dealers in other sewing machines, to be unequalled for such purposes.

TO THE LADIES OF CALIFORNIA.

IT IS A FACT, which all should know, that
Washing may be Done for Half the Cost,
and in half the time, required by pursuing the method now in use. An enormous waste of time and materials attends the old and ordinary process. And this is not because a better method is not known, but because housewives persist in treading in the beaten track followed by their mothers and grandmothers before them, opposing every change, and refusing even TO MAKE A FAIR TRIAL of those new inventions which scientific research has produced.

If the housekeepers of San Francisco and of the State will try the

California Washing Extract,

simply by way of experiment, they will be amazed to find how much unnecessary labor may be saved by its use. It may be obtained at all the principal Groceries of the city, or in quantities of the Agents, HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN.

The use of the EXTRACT renders "rubbing," "pounding," "washboards," and all the severe drudgery of the usual method quite unnecessary. It thoroughly cleanses, without injuring the clothes. In short, it works such wonders as no one will credit without witnessing them. All that the inventor asks of any doubting housewife is

A SINGLE TRIAL.

The following certificate from the State Assayer, furnished after an analysis of the EXTRACT, speaks for itself:

A. ENQUOIS—Dear Sir: I have examined the sample of liquid handed me, and find it free from acid or any substance that would be injurious to clothing.
Very respectfully, B. B. THAYER.

THE DECISIVE BATTLE

OF THE

SEWING MACHINES!

Campaign of 1865!

FIRST PREMIUM

AWARDED THE FLORENCE!

AT THE

State Fair of California,

BY A COMMITTEE COMPOSED OF THE

BEST MECHANICAL TALENT OF THE STATE.

THE REPORT:

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE.—After a careful investigation of this NEW AND BEAUTIFUL MACHINE, viewing it as we do in a mechanical point of view, we consider that it is in many respects worthy of much prnise, particularly that portion of its mechanicnl nrrangement by which the REVERSIBLE motion is obtainod, which is simplicity itself, and in our opiniou worthy of special consideration; also, the

COMPLETE AND POSITIVE CONTROL OVER THE TENSION,

as exhibited in this Machine, along with the mechanica arrangement for taking up the slack of the thread, as was shown in sewing without any alteration, and without any stoppage of Machine,

FROM THE FINEST LACE TO FOUR THICKNESSES OF LEATHER.

"Your Committee, therefore, after a close and careful investigation, consider it ONE OF THE BEST AND MOST IMPORTANT IMPROVED MACHINES NOW IN USE.

"We, therefore, in view of the above facts, award it FIRST AND HIGHEST PREMIUM.

MERCANTILE LIBRARY ASSOCIATION.

Building Fund.

AT A MEETING OF THE BOAD OF TRUSTEES of the Mercantile Library Association, held October 10th, 1865, it was unanimously

Resolved, That the Trustees form themselves into a Committee of the Whole, to obtain Life Memberships and Donations, with a view of purchasing a lot and erecting a building thereon for the use of the Association.

The payment of one hundred dollars in gold coin secures a Life Membership, and it is hoped that the sum of twenty thousand dollars may be subscribed in this way alone. No subscriptions are binding unless the above sum shall be raised by Life Memberships and Donations before February 1, 1866. Subscription books may be found at the Library, or with any of the following members of the

THE BUTTERFLY.

THOU little beauty, wafted by
Upon the summer's gentle sigh:
What art thou? Tell me, pray!
A sunbeam wandering from the sky,
That earthward found its way?

A gorgeous flower, too rudely blown?
A beautiful bright birdling, flown
From some enchanted coast—
A winged mosaic that hath known
More art than man can boast?

Spring's sudden flying brought to view
Thy form among the moss that grew
Along the garden wall;
I saw thee as thou didst renew
The fleeces of thy pall.

And from the homely commonplace
Of thy crude life I now can trace
Thy fair and wondrous powers;
I learn the secret of the grace
That brightens my long hours.

When folded in the noiseless gloom—
Lo! the shut portals of thy room
Were opened wide, at last;
Sunlight had cleft the sealèd tomb
Wherein thy lot was cast.

May not the homely thought we find
Among the rudest of our kind
Yet serve an end complete,
If chance it be but choicely lined
As was thy winding sheet?

For so a poem will forsake
Its little hiding cell, to wake
In life's delicious pain,
When sunshine of the heart shall break
The chrys'lis of the brain.

THE MOUSE-TRAP.

"WE that have free souls, it touches us not."

HAMLET—Act III., Scene 2.

THE resident correspondent of the Alta California in the Humboldt is not ashamed to sign his name to his letters. "Harry Palmer" is a pretty powerful writer. It is not every one that can do this style of thing:

"From yonder eminence, as far as the eye can pierce through the distant blue horizon, it rests upon the waving scenery in the gentle breeze. The slight uprisings and descents undulate the gigantic forest and imposes upon the view, while the tinted sunbeams paint the picturesque of the ivy-green, broad as the expanse of the deep."

The eye "piereing through the distant blue horizon" is a boldly original idea. "The waving scenery in the gentle breeze" is a good piece of descriptive writing, but slightly theatrical. Stage scenery may wave in a gentle breeze, but "earthquake" would have been better in this case—"waving scenery in a gentle earthquake." That's better. You know, Harry Palmer, it takes an earthquake to wave any considerable amount of scenery. You cannot say "the slight uprisings and descents imposes on the view," without violating one of the rules of English grammar, but it doesn't look bad in the Alta. We knew when we read "the tinted sunbeams paint the picturesque of the ivy-green, broad as the expanse of the deep," that you were a poet. There's a misty grandeur about that sentence, which shows it to be the composition of a poet. "The picturesque of the ivy-green." Beautiful! We don't exactly understand whether it is the picturesque that is "broad as the expanse of the deep," or the ivy-green, or the style of painting done by the sunbeams, but it reads well in the Alta. It is seldom we meet with so many beauties in half a dozen lines. Those who did not read "Harry Palmer's" last letter can judge how fine it was by that little specimen block. There's one foot ten inches and a quarter, all just like that. "Harry Palmer" finishes his letter with a beautiful poem. There are five inches of poem; we cut off three-quarters of an inch:

"STILL THE CONTRAST.

Now from the pen the drop portrays the smile
That o'er the vision steals the constant while,
Of him whose thought of want affects no more:
Whose step is lift afresh upon the shore
Of the Humboldt."

That's pretty good for a Humboldt poet, who writes for the Alta, eh? But he ought to have got in something about "ile" at the very beginning—have struck "ile" at once, and then gone on boring afterwards. It only wants a little change, Palmer—this is the style:

Now from the tool the drop betokens ile,
And o'er the visage creeps a joyous smile.

And so on; that's only a suggestion, Harry—excuse our calling you "Harry"—we don't pretend to write poetry. The second verse is pretty:

"Montgomery's mingled host, aghast they stand,
In wonder view the smiles from a happy land,
Eager for the gain, still drawing nigh,
Listening to the tongues that never lie,
From the Humboldt."

"Tongues that never lie, from the Humboldt!" Your tongue, and the tongues of the other fellows who write for the Alta? Is that it? A sort of poetical license, eh? Harry Palmer, you're doing yourself an injustice in burying yourself in the Humboldt. You ought to be down among "Montgomery's mingled host," boring there. Has the oil up there affected many people in the way it has you? Don't wait long before you write again; a letter like that one in last Tuesday's paper is a feature. Make the Alta people pay for them. You do, do you? Excuse the question; but some people are not aware of their own worth. We really wish that we could afford space in the MOUSE-TRAP to reproduce Harry Palmer's poem, "Still the Contrast," entire. We trust that the extracts we have given will be sufficient to prove that "the resident correspondent of the Alta California in the Humboldt" is no ordinary man, and writes no ordinary letters.

THE latest telegraphic advices with respect to the condition of Ireland, are to the effect that the Fenian excitement has almost entirely subsided. A few Fenians are to be tried by Special Commission for trying to get their countrymen into trouble, and thus ends the Irish Rebellion of 1865. This will be sad news for the proprietors of the Irish People, and for those patriotic Irishmen who have been collecting money to free Ireland and establish an Irish Republic. The wrongs of Ireland are manifold. Talk of the Irish people not being free! They are only too free—with their money, when a pack of designing scoundrels make an appeal to them. Poor Ireland! She has suffered more wrongs at the hands of her own children than have ever been inflicted on her by the Saxon.

WE see it stated that a colored man in Virginia has obtained a contract to carry mails. We have no prejudice against negroes, but we must say that it seems improper for the Government to give encouragement to black mail operations.

THE origin of the name of the capital city of Massachusetts is, perhaps, not generally known; Boston is simply an abbreviation of Boss-town, and the city was so named by the inhabitants, under the impression that it would "boss" the whole of the United States, and probably the rest of creation.

AT the last meeting of the Board of Supervisors, "a number of proposals were received for burying the indigent dead of the city, varying in amount from $3.75 to $8 per case;" so says the Call. We don't believe that the indigent dead would have any cases at all. The Internal Revenue Tax has caused a rise in coffins, and certainly $3.75 is no price at all for any sort of a case. So thought the Supervisors: they referred the matter to the Hospital Committee, with instructions to report how cheaply an indigent dead body could be decently put away in the ground.

THE Portland correspondent of the Sacramento Union, declares that there is not room for more than one hundred more girls in Washington Territory, and for one hundred and fifty more in Oregon, thus providing for two hundred and fifty out of Mercer's ship-load of one thousand. What is to be done with the remaining seven hundred and fifty? It won't do to talk of pitching them into the Bay as the cruel little Call did last week. There would be very little trouble about the matter if they were coming through Salt Lake City instead of round the Horn; Brigham would welcome the whole thousand. Surely California has room for seven hundred and fifty more women. The matrimonial market is not overstocked; a wife is still a very expensive article; but when seven hundred and fifty damsels are put in the market, the price of wives will come down, and husbands will proportionately increase in value. Now young ladies can, running over the names of a number of beaux, say "Who shall I have?" Many have quite a large and desirable assortment of young men out of which to choose a husband. Let those fastidious young damsels who have refused this one because he was too poor, another because his hair was not the right color, and for other equally trivial reasons rejected offers of marriage, tremble. Their reign is short. When those thousand young ladies arrive, the cry will be "Who'll have me?" The gentlemen will, as they should, be able to make a choice out of a large number. We do not dread the arrival of that fair army. Let them come on. Send us still another thousand. When there are more women, there will be more marriages; and a man will not be so apt to covet his neighbor's wife when there is a fair prospect of his being able to get one of just the same kind—a nice, loving, domesticated woman—without spending his lifetime in looking for her.

THE Call says that Gardner, who was arrested for for cry, stated that he had paid three daily papers for puffing the Cocos Island scheme, with stock in the company. The Call draws a decidedly false conclusion from this; it says:

"According to the statement of Gardner and other parties the 'favor' of the press of San Francisco has recently become an expensive luxury".

We think Gardner bought the favor of the press at a remarkably cheap rate, if he paid for it in Cocos Island stock. We fancy that, if an actor were to offer an "independent theatrical critic" a number of tickets of admission to his benefit, in payment for a column puff of his great impersonation of some character, the independent critic would not accept them as an equivalent, in place of cash; yet Cocos Island stock is likely to turn out of even less value. The favor of the press must be dirt cheap, if Gardner's statement be true; we do not believe the reporters and "critics" of the daily press would accept a bribe; one of them may occasionally, when he does a man a good turn, accept $50, "just to cover the cost of composition."

THE Flag displays a mean jealousy of the dead dog "Bummer," and the honors paid to his memory. Surely, a dog who did so much towards exterminating rats may naturally be regretted in a city so cursed with them as is San Francisco; but, perhaps, the Flag may be prejudiced against him on this account. When the Flag dies, it cannot expect to be as much lamented as Bummer, for it has been in existence in this city but a very short time, and can scarcely, we should imagine, have the vanity to claim equality with Bummer, who, while he lived, did the city better service than the Flag, under its present management, would do in a century. Yet, if the Flag will die within any reasonable space of time—say, three weeks or a month—it shall not lack an epitaph.

How seldom does one see an advertisement worded with scrupulous regard to the truth! How refreshing it is to read such an advertisement as appeared in Tuesday's Call. It commences thus: "$1,200.—For Sale at a Great Bargain. On account of declining business, a first class Saloon trade." That's honest. The advertiser does not tell any yarns about wanting to go East; he says he wants to get out of the saloon "in consequence of declining business." But, though the business may be declining, what there is left is "first class;" the customers, though not numerous, are very select. We hope that honest man, who does not desire to get anyone to purchase his business without giving him plainly to understand that he sells on account of declining business, will get a customer.

THERE is a rumor that Jeff Davis is to be released. If he be released without a trial, it is certain that President Johnson will incur the deadly hatred of all the newspapers in the United States. If there is no sensation trial of Jeff Davis, they are robbed of thousands of dollars. Have not the newspapers suffered enough from the abrupt termination of the cruel war without being cheated out of the daily report of the trial of Jeff Davis?

AN Irishman who was brought up in the Police Court some time ago charged with whipping his scolding wife, claimed that he was guilty of no offence, and that he was acting in strict accordance with an ordinance of the Board of Supervisors. "Sure your honor," said he to the Judge, "I was only abating a nuisance."

TREM.

THE BABY LOOKING OUT FOR ME.

TWO little busy hands patting on the window,
Two laughing bright eyes looking out at me,
Two rosy cheeks dented with a dimple:
Mother-bird is conning, baby; do you see?

Down by the lilac-bush, something white and azure
Saw I in the window as I passed the tree;
Well I knew the apron and shoulder knots of ribbon
All belonged to baby, looking out for me.

Talking low and tenderly
To myself as mothers will,
Spake I softly, "God in Heaven
Keep my darling free from ill.
Worldly gear and worldly honors
Ask I not for her from thee:
But from want and sin and sorrow,
Keep her ever pure and free."

* * * * * * *

Two little waxen hands,
Folded soft and silently;
Two little curtained eyes
Looking out for me no more:
Two little snowy cheeks,
Dimple-dented nevermore;
Two little trodden shoes,
That will never touch the floor;
Shoulder-ribbon softly twisted,
Apron folded, clean and white;
These are left me—and these only
Of the childish presence bright.

Thus He sent an answer to my earnest prayer,
Thus He keeps my darling free from earthly stain,
Thus He folds the pet lamb safe from earthly straying,
But I miss her sadly by the window pane,
Till I look above it; then with purer vision,
Sad, I weep no longer the lilac-bush to pass,
For I see her angel, pure and white, and sinless,
Walking by the harpers, by the sea of Glass.

Two little snowy wings
Softly flutter to and fro,
Two tiny childish hands
Beckon still to me below;
Two tender angel eyes
Watch me ever and earnestly
Through the loop-holes of the stars—
Baby's looking out for me.

THE MYSTERIOUS SKETCH.

AN ARTIST'S STORY.

NEARLY opposite the church of Saint Bedad, in Nuremberg, stands an ancient inn, narrow and lofty, with an indented gable, small, dusty, casements, and the roof surmounted by a plaster image of the Virgin. Many years ago, when beginning the world as a young artist, I took up my abode in this quaint hostelry. I had come to Nuremberg in order to study the works of the old masters: but, my funds running short, I was obliged to take portraits—and such portraits! Stout old ladies, each with her cat on her lap; rosy burgomasters, wigged and cocked-hatted—all plentifully and impartially illuminated with ochre and vermillion.

At length my resources began to fail: and mine host, who at first had been all civility, began to importune me in a somewhat insolent manner for the amount of my bill. One evening, as I was passing up-stairs to my attic, Master Rapp called after me: "Hallo! youngster, when are you going to pay me? Your bill now amounts to one hundred and sixty florins, ten krentzers. Pray, when am I likely to see the color of your money?" I muttered some sort of indistinct reply, and hastening to my room, locked the door and threw myself, dressed as I was, on my bed. Revolving my miserable position in my mind, all the high aspirations after excellence which had hitherto buoyed me up, seemed to forsake me, and a sordid, hungry craving for money took their place. At length my eyes grew heavy and my thoughts confused, and I slept profoundly for some hours. About two o'clock I awoke in a strange sort of excitement. Having lighted my lamp, I seized a piece of paper and a crayon, and drew a rapid sketch, in the Dutch style, feeling all the time as if the composition was not mine, but as if each stroke was suggested by some one who merely used my hand and pencil as unconscious and unresisting instruments. The sketch thus traced represented a gloomy court, surrounded by lofty but crumbling walls, which were furnished with large hooks at the height of seven or eight feet from the ground. On the left was a trellis of laths, through which one saw an ox cut in quarters, suspended by strong pulleys from the roof of a shed. Streams of blood flowed across the pavement, and met in a trench filled with refuse and rubbish. At one end of the court was a cart house, through the open door of which were seen a pile of wood and some bundles of straw. Pieces of ragged rope, an old hen-coop, and a broken rabbit-hutch littered the foreground. On the right, one corner of the sketch remaining blank, I hesitated what to put there; something seemed to move, to hover around it. Suddenly a foot turned up, and detached from the ground appeared to my mind's eye. Following the inspiration I sketched on rapidly, and beneath my crayon grew a leg joined to the foot, then a floating garment, at length the entire figure of an old woman, pale, emaciated, with dishevelled hair, thrown down against the low parapet of the wall, and struggling against a hand which clutched her throat.

I was drawing the scene of a murder; the crayon fell from my hand. I shuddered as I looked at the woman's face, contracted by terror, while both her hands convulsively grasped the arm of her murderer. But his face—I saw it not; it was hidden from me as by some veiling shadow—I could not finish the sketch.

"I am fatigued," I said, passing my hand over my damp forehead; "to-morrow I will finish the design; there remains but that one figure to put in."

Hastily undressing, I was soon in bed, and before five minutes had elapsed I was sunk in a profound slumber. When I awoke it was broad daylight. I hastened to dress, and was preparing to resume my task, when I heard two knocks at the door.

"Come in!"

The door opened, and a tall old man, dressed in black, stood at the threshold.

"Herr Heinrich Kapff, the painter?" said he.

"At your service, sir."

He bowed his head, and said, introducing himself: "Baron Frederick Von Spreckdahl."

That the rich amateur Von Spreckdahl, who was also Judge of the Criminal Tribunal, should condescend to visit my poor attic, was indeed an unlooked-for event. I cast an embarrassed glance at the mean, scanty furniture, the low ceiling, and the worm-eaten flooring; but my visitor seemed to pay no attention to these details. Seating himself near my small table: "Herr Kapff," he said, "I come——"

At that moment his eyes fell on the unfinished sketch, and he gazed at it fixedly for several moments.

"Are you the author of this drawing?" he asked, looking at me with the same attention which he had bestowed on my work.

"I am, sir."

"What is its price?"

"I do not sell my sketches; it is merely a design for a painting.

"Ah!" said he, taking up the paper delicately with the tips of his long, sallow fingers; and with the aid of his eye-glass he studied the sketch closely.

"And the dimensions of this painting, Herr Kapff?" said he at last, without looking up.

"Four feet by three."

"Its price?"

"Fifty ducats."

My visitor laid the sketch on the table, and drew from his pocket a long, well-filled purse of green silk. "Fifty ducats," he repeated; "there they are." And throwing down the pieces, the baron saluted me, and was gone before I had sufficiently recovered from my amazement to utter a word of thanks. I heard his walking-stick strike on each stair as he descended, and I ran down quickly after him. But when I reached the door of the inn he was already gone; I looked up and down the street, but he was not to be seen.

"Well, this is odd enough," I muttered; and having remounted the five flights of stairs I sat down at the table, brightened by the unwonted gleam of gold, and resolved to finish the sketch without delay; a few more touches of the crayon were all that was required. But these few touches, try as I would, I could not give. I had lost the clue to the design; the mysterious personage would not come out of the limits of my brain. It was of no use to draw and efface, and draw again and retouch; the creature of my pencil was as discordant with his surroundings as one of Raphael's figures would be in a village ale-house by Teniers. I threw down my crayon in despair, and the perspiration stood in large drops on my forehead.

Confused voices, and heavy steps mounting the stairs: my door was violently shaken.

"In the name of the law, open!"

Trembling, though I scarce knew why, I obeyed. Two muscular hands instantly grasped my collar, and a fat little man in green uniform who smelled strongly of beer, came close to me, and said: "Heinrich Kapff, I arrest you."

"For what crime?" I inquired, as I recognized the chief of police.

"Come along," he cried roughly, and made a sign to one of his men to handcuff me.

Resistance of course was useless. I was effectually secured, and conveyed down stairs by some of the party; while the others ransacked my room in every corner, prodding the furniture, and turning over on the floor my poor wardrobe and other scanty possessions. My captors thrust me into a covered carriage, and two of them entered after me, and took their places one at each side.

"What have I done," I inquired again.

"Hans," said one of them to the other, with a sour smile, "he asks what he has done!"

Soon a dark shadow enveloped us, as the carriage rolled under the gloomy archway which leads to the Raspel Haus, or city prison. The jailor, with a gray woolen cap on his head, and a short pipe between his lips, received me from my conductors, and having silently introduced me into a cell, locked and barred the door, and left me to my reflections.

The room was small, but tolerably clean, and the walls being newly whitewashed, presented no inscriptions or drawings, save a rude sketch of a gibbet, probably executed by my predecessor. It was lighted by a small window, nine or ten feet from the ground, and the furniture consisted of a bundle of straw and a bucket. I seated myself on the straw, and remained, I know not how long, plunged in a gloomy reverie. Very soon the door grated on its hinges; my jailor appeared, and desired me to follow him.

I was conducted into a gloomy sort of judgment-hall, at the upper end of which were seated two judges, one of them being my late visitor, Von Spreckdahl. A clerk, employed in tickling his ear with the feather of his pen, sat before the table. Von Spreckdahl, raising his voice, addressed me:

"Heinrich Kapff, how did you become possessed of this drawing?"

He showed me the nocturnal sketch: I examined it, and replied:

"It was done by me."

There was a silence, and the clerk wrote down my reply. I thought within myself: "What is the meaning of this? What connection can the sketch have with my pushing Rapp down stairs?"

"It was done by you," repeated Von Spreckdahl. "What is the subject of it?"

"It was fancy sketch."

"You have not copied the details from any painting or engraving?"

"No sir; I invented them all."

"Prisoner," said the judge in a severe tone, "I advise you to reflect. Do not lie."

I reddened with anger, and said, emphatically: "I have spoken the truth."

"Write, clerk," said Von Spreckdahl.

"And this woman," continued he, who is being assassinated at the edge of the well, have you imagined her figure also?"

"Certainly."

"You never saw her?"

"Never."

With an indignant gesture Von Spreckdahl rose from his chair; then resuming his seat, he appeared to consult in a low tone with his colleague.

"What can it all be about? What have I done?" murmured I to myself. Addressing my guards, Von Spreckdahl said: "Conduct the prisoner to the carriage. We are going to the Metzger strasse. Heinrich Kapff, you are pursuing a deplorable path. Consider that if the justice of man is inflexible, the mercy of God may be obtained by a full confession of your crimes."

I could not reply. I felt as if under the influence of some horrible dream, and prepared to follow my guards in silence. Two policemen and I entered the carriage, which rolled along through several streets. One of my guards took out his snuff box, and offered a pinch to his companion. Mechanically I also extended my finger and thumb toward the box, but its owner drew it back with a gesture of aversion, and quickly replaced it in his pocket. I felt the hot blood mounting to my forehead, but before I could speak the carriage stopped. One of the policemen got out, while the other held me, fettered as I was, by the collar, until seeing his comrade ready to receive me, he thrust me rudely out.

All these precautions to secure my person augured no good, but just then I was given no time for reflection. My guards hurried me along a narrow, filthy alley, bounded by high walls, and through which trickled a fœtid stream of some thick, dark liquid. Arrived at the end, they opened a door, and pushed me before them into a square court. During our progress a strange horror had taken possession of me, not arising from the uncertainty and mystery of my position, but rather like the effect of nightmare. I seemed to be walking in a frightful dream, seeing and acting without my own volition, and under a haunting conviction of the unreality of all the objects around. But this horror became very tangible and real when I looked around the place where I now found myself. There was the very identical court which I had drawn the night before—the walls furnished with hooks, the broken hen-coop, the rabbit-hutch; not a single detail, not even the most trifling, was wanting!

Beside the well stood the two judges, Von Spreckdahl and Richter. At their feet lay the corpse of the old woman, her long gray hair dishevelled, her face livid, her eyes starting from her head, and her tongue protruding from between her clenched teeth. It was a horrid spectacle.

"Prisoner," said Von Spreckdahl, in a solemn voice, "have you anything to say?" I made no answer.

"Do you acknowledge that you threw this woman, Theresa Becker, into this well, after having strangled her and taken possession of her money?"

"No," I cried; "no! I do not know this woman; I never saw her until now. May God help me!"

"It is enough," said he, in a dry tone; and then, without adding another word, he and his colleague took their leave.

My guards conducted me back to the Raspel Haus, and left me alone in my cell. I fell into a profound stupor, and when but half aroused from it, my conscience awoke to a sort of morbid activity, and I began to ask myself if I had not really assassinated the old woman!

Day dawned, and slowly lighted up my gloomy prison. The window looked on the street. It was a market-day, and I heard the rolling of the carts laden with fruits and vegetables. I could distinguish the cackling of the live poultry, and the animated discourse of the butter-women. As the morning advanced the noise became greater, and the buzz and movement of life around me seemed to restore courage to my heart. I felt an irresistible desire to see what was going on around me, and to look once more on the faces of my fellow men.

My predecessors in the cell, animated, no doubt, by a like desire, had scooped holes in the wall to facilitate their mounting to the window. I climbed up, and holding the bars, managed to seat myself on the narrow ledge. Once there, I gazed entranced on the crowd, the life, the movement; tears flowed down my cheeks; I felt an intense longing for life as life, simply to breathe, and move, and feel the sun. "Ah!" I exclaimed, "to live—only to live! Let them sentence me to hard labor; let them attach a weight to my leg. What does it matter, provided only that I live?"

The quaint old market on which I looked offered a gay and animated spectacle. The peasant-women, in their Bavarian costumes, were seated behind their baskets of eggs, fruit, and vegetables, and their cages filled with poultry; butchers with naked arms were chopping meat on their blocks; peasants, with their large-brimmed felt hats set far back on their heads, leaned on their stout holly-sticks, and smoked their pipes. The changing, animated scene captivated my attention, and, in spite of me, distracted my thoughts from my sad situation. As I continued to gaze on the crowd a butcher passed by, his back bent under an immense quarter of beef which he bore on his shoulders. His arms were bare, his elbows raised, his head bent down in front. His hair falling down in a measure concealed his face, and yet at a first glance I shuddered. "It is he!" I exclaimed inwardly.

All my blood flew back to my heart. I leaped from the window down into my prison, shivering, my teeth chattering, while the rebellious blood flowed back again, and mounted hotly to my cheeks and forehead.

"It is he! He is there—there—and I—I must die to expiate his crime. O my God, help me! What am I to do?"

A sudden idea, an inspiration, as I believe, from heaven, darted through my mind. I put my hand into my coat pocket, and found my crayons. Rushing to the clean white-washed wall, I sketched the scence of the murder with marvellous force and rapidity. No more uncertainty, no more wavering attempts. I knew the man who grasped the luckless woman's throat; I saw him as if he were sitting to me for his portrait. At ten o'clock the jailer entered my cell.

"What is this?" he asked with surprise, looking at my sketch.

"Go, ask my judges to come hither," I cried, still pursuing my work with feverish ardor.

"They await you in the Judgment Hall," replied he.

"Tell them to come; I have a disclosure to make," said I, as I put the finishing touch to the murderer's figure. It looked as if it lived and breathed; foreshortened on the wall, the features stood out with wonderful force and reality.

The jailor went out, and in a few minutes the two judges appeared. With my hand extended, and trembling in every limb, I said to them, "Behold the assassin!"

Von Spreckdahl carefully and quietly examined the sketch. "His name?" he inquired.

"I know it not," I replied; "but at this moment he is in the market cutting up meat at the third stall on the left, as you enter from the Trabanten Strasse."

"What do you advise?" said my judge to his colleague.

"That we should instantly send for the man," he replied, in a grave tone.

Stepping out into the corridor, he gave his orders to the policemen stationed there. During their absence the two judges remained standing, contemplating the sketch. Suffering from strong reaction, I sank upon the ground, and buried my head between my knees.

Soon steps resounded from afar along the vaulted passages. Those who have not waited for the hour of deliverance, and counted the minutes, then as long as centuries—those who have not felt the poignant emotions of suspense, terror, hope and doubt—they cannot conceive the sharp agony of that moment. I could have distinguished the footsteps of the murderer, marching between his guards, from a thousand others. They approached; the judges themselves appeared moved. I raised my head, and my heart felt as though it were grasped with an iron hand. My eyes were fixed on the closed door; it opened—the man entered. His cheeks were red and swollen; his large jaws were contracted, causing the muscles to stand out even up to his ears; and his small, restless, tawny-colored eyes sparkled beneath a pair of thick reddish eyebrows.

Von Spreckdahl silently showed him the sketch. Then this powerful, sanguine-complexioned man turned pale—pale as death. Uttering a roar which startled us all, he opened his immense arms, and bounding backward he succeeded in overthrowing two of his guards. There was a terrific struggle in the corridor; we could hear the panting respiration of the butcher, deep imprecations, broken words, and the stamping and shuffling of many feet. At length the assassin was lead in, his head sunk on his breast, and his eyes blood-shot, his limbs firmly fettered. Again he looked fixedly at the drawing on the wall, seemed to reflect, and muttered, as if to himself, "Who, then, could have seen me—at midnight?"

I was saved.

Mrs. Opie—an author and poet as different as possible from Mrs. Barbauld—was an acquaintance of my mother. Her novels were, at this time, very popular, and her husband was equally famous as an historical painter. He had many admirers, but his works were not of a high order. He made all his male faces with large, ugly noses, so that one could always know his pictures by that feature. My mother had such an instinctive appreciation of painting that Mr. West made a point of going with her to the annual exhibition of living artists, that he might hear her natural remarks on the principal pictures. She criticised all Opie's so severely, that Mr. West feared she might be overheard by him and hastened to tell her whose they were. Mr. West's pictures did not wholly escape her criticism, but she generally knew beforehand which were his.

When Mrs. Opie became a gay widow, we often met her at the house of a mutual friend, where her eccentric conduct amused some, and disgusted others. I have seen her astonish a grave circle of elderly people by jumping up and dancing a shawl-dance, then in vogue on the stage, flourishing away to a tune of her own singing, apparently unconscious of the effect she was producing. She used to carry about with her, in all her visits, a pretty little stringed instrument, in the classic form of a lyre, and sing her own songs, with great expression, to that accompaniment. She said she could always find out the secrets of a young girl's heart, if she could sing to her alone. She tried her experiment on me, and I confes, proved right.

Mrs. Opie was fair, with delicate features, and a form of symmetrical beauty. The well-formed hands and arms were always on exhibition, and short and scanty skirts disclosed the prettiest feet and ankles. Her talents and accomplishments, her novels, her poetry, and her singing, made her, for a time, a favorite with the fashionables of London, and she highly enjoyed her popularity; but it did not last long, and, when it failed, she took refuge from the gay world in a circle of wealthy and highly cultivated Quakers. The Gurneys, Barclays, Hoares, Woods, and Frys, were her intimate friends, and, after several years passed among them, she joined the Society of Friends, and adopted their dress and language. I saw her once after her metamorphosis, and could but remark the discrepancy between her costume and her manners, which still savored of the wicked world. The pretty foot was still seen, though the dress was long and ample, and the glove was unnecessarily taken off to show the beautiful hand. Amelia Opie was not changed, only acting a new part.—Mrs. Farren's Recollections of Seventy Years.

Notes on Overwork.—Unwise above many is the man who considers every hour lost which is not spent in reading, writing, or study, and not more rational is she who thinks every moment of her time lost which does not find her sewing. We once heard a man advise that a book of some kind be carried in the pocket, to be used in case of an unoccupied moment—such was his practice. He died early and fatuous.

There are women who, after a hard day's work, will sit and sew by candle or gas-light till their eyes are almost blinded, or till certain pains about the shoulders come on, which are almost insupportable, and are only driven to bed by the physical incapacity to work any longer. The sleep of the overworked, like those who do not work at all, is unsatisfying and unrefreshing, and both alike wake up in weariness, sadness, and languor, with an inevitable result, both dying prematurely.

Let no one work in pain or weariness. When a man is tired, he ought to lie down till he is fully rested, when, with renovated strength, the work will be better done, done the sooner, and with a self-sustaining alacrity. The time taken from seven or eight hours' sleep out of each twenty-four is time not gained, but time much more than lost; we can cheat ourselves, but we cannot cheat nature. A certain amount of food is necessary for a healthy body, but if less than that amount be furnished, decay commences the very hour. It is the same with sleep; any one who persists in allowing himself less than nature requires will only hasten his arrival to the mad-house or the grave.

MRS. JAMESON'S COMMONPLACES.

At dinner to-day there was an attempt made by two very clever men to place Theodore Hook above Sydney Smith. I fought with all my might against both. It seems to me that a mind must be strangely warped that could ever place on a par two men with aspirations and purposes so different, whether we consider them merely as individuals, or called before the bar of the public as writers. I do not take to Sydney Smith personally, because my nature feels the want of the artistic and imaginative in his nature; but see what he has done for humanity, for society, for liberty, for truth—for us women! What has Theodore Hook done that has not perished with him? Even as wits—and I have been in company with both—I could not compare them; but they say the wit of Theodore Hook was only fitted for the company of men—the strongest proof that it was not genuine of its kind, that when most bearable, it was most superficial. I set aside the other obvious inference, that it required to be excited by stimulants and those of the coarsest, grossest kind. The wit of Sydney Smith almost always involved a thought worth remembering for its own sake, as well as worth remembering for its brilliant vehicle: the value of ten thousand pounds sterling of sense concentrated into a cut and polished diamond. It is not true, as I have heard it said, that after leaving the society of Sydney Smith you only remembered how much you ha laughed, not the good things at which you had laughed. Few men—wits by profession—ever said so many memorable things as those recorded of Sydney Smith.

We all remember the famous bon mot of Talleyrand. When seated between Madame de Stael and Madame Récamier, and pouring forth gallantry, first at the feet of one then of the other, Madame de Stael suddenly asked him if she and Madame Récamier fell into the river, which of the two he would save first? "Madame," replied Talleyrand, "je crois que vous pouvez nager!" Now we will match this pretty bon mot with one far prettier, and founded on it. Prince S., whom I knew formerly, was one day loitering on the banks of the Isar, in the English garden at Munich, by the side of the beautiful Madame de V., then the object of his devoted admiration. For a while he had been speaking to her of his mother, for whom, vaurien as he was, he had ever shown the strongest filial love and respect. Afterwards, as they wandered on, he began to pour forth his soul to the lady of his love with all the eloquence of passion. Suddenly she turned and said to him, "If your mother and myself were both to fall into this river, whom would you save first?" "My mother!" he instantly replied; and then, looking at her expressively, immediately added, "To save you first would be as if I were to save myself first!"

Once, when I was at Vienna, there was a dread of hydrophobia, and orders were given to massacre all the dogs which were found unclaimed or uncollared in the city or suburbs. Men were employed for this purpose, and they generally carried a short heavy stick, which they flung at the poor proscribed animal with such certain aim as either to kill or maim it mortally at one blow. It happened one day that, close to the edge of the river, near the Ferdinand's-Brucke, one of these men flung his stick at a wretched dog, but with such bad aim that it fell into the river. The poor animal, following his instinct or his teaching, immediately plunged in, redeemed the stick, and laid it down at the feet of its owner, who, snatching it up, dashed out the creature's brains. I wonder what the Athenians would have done to such a man? they who banished the judge of the Areopagus because he flung away the bird which had sought shelter in his bosom?

Carlyle said to me: "I want to see some institution to teach a man the truth, the worth, the beauty, the heroism of which his present existence is capable; where's the use of sending him to study what the Greeks and Romans did, and said, and wrote? Do ye think the Greeks and Romans would have been what they were, if they had just only studied what the Phœnicians did before them?" I should have answered, had I dared: "Yet perhaps the Greeks and Romans would not have been what they were if the Egyptians and Phœnicians had not been before them."

"I observe," said Sydney Smith, "that generally about the age of forty, women get tired of being virtuous and men of being honest." This was said and received with a laugh as one of his good things; but, like many of his good things, how dreadfully true! And why? because, generally, education has made the virtue of the woman and the honesty of the man a matter of external opinion, not a law of the inward life.

Joanna Baillie had a great admiration of Macaulay's Roman Ballads. "But," said some one, "do you really account them as poetry?" She replied, "They are poetry if the sounds of the trumpet be music!"

A king or a prince becomes by accident a part of history. A poet or an artist becomes by nature and necessity a part of universal humanity.

(For the Californian.)

THE LETTER "A" AND ITS ASSOCIATES.

We begin our education with a, b in the Primer, and we end it, after years of academic and collegiate training, with A. B. at the end of our names. We thus seem to run in a circular curriculum, and our goal is our starting point; and yet we seldom stop to consider that the alphabet, which is the initial step in our intellectual career, and seeming simplicity itself, is the product of a profound and patient analysis of the vocal sounds, a result achieved only after ages of spoken and yet unwritten language, and after many successive approaches in the way of picture-writing, hieroglyphics, and syllabic alphabets, like the Chinese. What to us contains simply the dry seeds of knowledge is the ripened fruit of centuries of bygone experience and pre-exerted thought and skill.

We have twenty six letters in our alphabet, and yet an alphabet which should have a character for every distinct elementary sound would contain upwards of a hundred different letters. As it is, we make twenty-six suffice, by requiring each to do various duty, having a, for instance, to represent seven different sounds, e five; and so of the others, both vowels and consonants. But what we thus gain in simplicity we lose in precision and in exactitude, both of orthography and of orthoepy. Thus, by reason of the variable functions of the letter a, there never has been any uniformity in its enunciation, and the first word uttered by an American child is either ma, with the sound of a as in fat, or ma with the sound of a as in marble, according as the child is born in Dixie or in New England. Neither is there any common consent among adults or among scholars as to how the first letter of the alphabet should be pronounced. One sings a sarm, another a sam; one larfs, another laffs; one, in telling you the time, says harf parst, another says haf past.

And there is the same diversity in regard to the short sound and the broad sound of a in different parts of France, though, sooth to say, the French have, as a general rule, attained a far greater degree of precision and of uniformity in their pronunciation, particularly of the vowel sounds, than we have.

To illustrate the great diversity in our language in the pronunciation of the letter a, it will suffice simply to mention a few words in every-day use, about which we venture to say hardly two persons can be found who agree throughout, and who follow analogy consistently, e. g., parent, patent, patron, patriot, national, rational, apparatus, Arab, volcano, lava, lama, drama, matron, Java. In fact, it is very easy to convict almost any one of not following analogy—to ask the man who says pat-ron why he does not also say lat-ent, or the man who says pa-tent why he says pat-ronize or pay-eantry.

In regard to the pronunciation of words taken directly from foreign languages, usage seems to be about equally divided between giving the foreign or the obvious English force to the syllables; and, where authorities differ, it is courtesy in conversation to adopt for the nonce the pronunciation of your interlocutor, who may chance to first introduce a word which you are obliged to repeat after him, lest a marked or emphatic deviation from his method might seem like an intentional rebuke or an assumption of superior wisdom on your part.

Chancing, one of these late moonlight evenings, to suggest to an acquaintance the propriety of taking a promenade, pronouncing the latter word according to Webster, our friend, who is recently from a boarding-school, and knows some French, replied that it was really a delightful evening for a promenard.

We rejoined that it would be almost equally agreeable to parard under a collonard, or to lean over the balustrard sipping some lemonard and listening to a serenard.

And, indeed, if we pronounce one of these French words as the French do, why not all, and so of façade, renegade, and similar words? Though, in point of fact, one of the above methods is about as near the true French as the other.

Rev. John Lord, the somewhat famous historical lecturer, always takes pains to pronounces Versailles Vayrsahyuh, and yet he says Paris like other folks; and why do people who would not be caught failing to pull the third syllable of Acapulco, say nevertheless Mexico, instead of Mayheeco? Is the capital of a country of less consequence than a provincial town?

In regard to the pronunciation of foreign names of persons and of places, great latitude is allowed, even among educated persons; for no one could pronounce all geographical names correctly—i. e., as the natives pronounce them—without being acquainted with all the languages spoken on the globe, and so it has been the custom of the enlightened nations to modify foreign names and adapt them to their own language. Thus—Wien, which we call Vienna; Bourgogne, which we call Burgundy; Napoli, which we call Naples; and a host of other European places are called by a dozen different names in Europe. And so of the names of persons who have passed into history. It was not Christopher Columbus, as we spell the name, who discovered America, or Americus Vespucius who christened it: neither was there an astronomer known to his friends by the name of Copernicus.

Nothing will ever remedy these anomalies but the prevalence of a universal language, a tendency towards which some may think they discover in the rapid spread of books and journals, and in the increasing intercommunication of all nations.

Two tendencies are observable in our living language: the one, a disposition to harmonize the pronunciation with the spelling; the other, to adapt the spelling to the pronunciation: thus, just as one class of people in New England began to pronounce bouquet book-ay, according to the language from which it is taken, another class, with the authority of Webster, began to spell it boquet, dropping the u from the first syllable to make the spelling conform thus far to the prevailing pronunciation; though this, it is obvious, was only doing the work by halves. And this suggests the vital question not settled by law or custom among scholars, to-wit: whether foreign words, domesticated in our language, shall be allowed to retain the garb and accent of foreigners, or whether they shall conform to the spirit and laws of our language. Shall our mother tongue be a jargon of all tongues, or shall it be a symmetrical whole—drawing supplies from all sources, yet moulding them to new forms, according to its own laws of growth? Shall we encourage a disposition prevalent in certain fashionable circles to Frenchify the English language, or shall we oppose this insidious process of lingual miscegenation?

A striking illustration of the second of the two tendencies above referred to is observable in the vigorous movement inaugurated a few years since in favor of phonetic writing and printing. This system, which aims at the suppression of all silent letters and at spelling words according to their sounds—while increasing the number of characters in the alphabet for greater precision—has met with considerable favor among sensible men. The etymologists have opposed it on the ground that the parentage of words is lost sight of when their salient features are so trimmed down. But in many cases, by retrenching the number of letters we return to the original orthography. This is the case with all such words as labor, favor, honor, odor, etc., from which we have dropped the u, which the English, with their characteristic tenacity of old customs, still retain.

It is well known that the Norman conquerors introduced into Britain the French language, which then became and for a long time continued to be the language of the realm. During that time our Anglo-Saxon tongue was enriched by many words of Latin derivation not taken immediately from the Latin but mediately through the French. In borrowing these words from the Latin, the French had added letters and otherwise changed their form to adapt them to their use, and we took them from their hands.

By dropping the superfluous o in the last syllable of such words as ridiculous, pious, impervious, obvious, odorous, et id omne genus, we return to the exact Latin word, and we hope to see the time when this intrusive little o shall be banished from the society which it does not adorn.

Two clerks once discoursing of their former greatness in the old country, one boasted that he had belonged to a firm in London where the ink used in keeping the books cost £1,000 a year—to which the other sneeringly replied: "Humph! I was partner in a firm in Liverpool where we instructed the clerks not to dot their i's or cross their t's, and we saved £5.000 a year by that operation."

Now, if the latter individual had claimed such a saving in ink, from the omission of the silent letters, in writing, we would be more inclined to believe him, for it is safe to say that, every year, in England and America, hundreds of thousands of dollars in time, ink, money, and type, are lost by reason of the silent letters. Doubtless, some of the reforms urged by advocates of phonography and phonotypy will be gradually adopted, but the shackles of custom and established usage are very hard to be broken, and old dead limbs stick to the tree long after all sap and life has left them.

When "Libra" gets more leisure—that is to say, when Arrah-na-Pogue is "played out," the Atlantic cable laid, the Pacific Railroad completed, and when Washoe mines begin to pay dividends—then he or she, as the case may be, intends to write a very instructive, entertaining, and original article for THE CALIFORNIAN on the subject of pronunciation.

It might begin somewhat thus: The short sound of u, as in tub, is probably the simplest and easiest of all the vocal utterances. It is nothing more than a slightly gutteral breathing from the parted lips, in which neither tongue, teeth, lips nor palate take any part. No better evidence is needed of its easy utterance than the fact that careless and indolent speakers invariably substitute it for each of the vowels, when they occur in unaccented syllables, as in ability, society, innocence and partition, very commonly pronounced abil-uh-ty, su-siety, in-nuh-cenee, pur-tition. And this gutteral u, by universal consent, is allowed to supplant all the other vowels in the last syllables in such words as friar, sofa, paper, robber, nadir, tapir, actor, satyr, zephyr, where a, e, i, o and y all have the sound of the second u in sulphur, and also the y and o in myrrh and myrtle and governor, and so on of other words.

But, without finishing the able article above promised, we wish to call attention to an error quite common in the public papers, in the use of such expressions as an uniform rule, an United States officer. Writers are misled by the rule about using an before a vowel; but u, when it forms a syllable by itself at the commencement of a word, has the sound of yu, and it is as improper to write an unit as to write an youth. The case is different with an uncle, an uncertain, etc.; but don't, dear, reader, use such expressions as an useful invention, an Unitarian, an united company, even though the Alta or THE CALIFORNIAN should set you the example.

There are three principal ways in which the words of the language are mutilated, maltreated, and variously suffer violence at our hands: First, They are often beheaded, and their gory trunks are left, bereft of sense and intelligence. This is the favorite barbarity of our African brethren. Second, They are often dismembered and disemboweled, and their very hearts torn out of them by hasty contractors of speech. Thirdly, Many people have a vile habit of biting the tails off the ends of their words, and retaining them in the mouth, so that the words come forth curtailed of their fair proportions, and the g's are dropped from endings in ing, just as the frightened lizards are said to drop their caudal appendages in their haste to escape. And so the poor words are born blind, halt, crippled, and deformed. And thus endeth the first lesson on this theme by

LIBRA.

BLIND TOM, THE MUSICAL PHENOMENON.—Blind Tom, the negro boy pianist, gave his first concert at Dodworth Hall. The house was well filled by a very fashionable and critical audience, who listened to the performance and imitations of this wonderful musical phenomenon with the greatest astonishment, enthusiasm, and satisfaction. As a wonder Tom merits all that has been said of him. His power of memory is remarkable; also in execution, touch, and interpretation of some pieces, he exhibits skill and the intelligence of a master, notwithstanding at times his look and motions are like one bereft of all reason. Tom played last evening "Sonete Pathetique," by Beethoven, first movement; Thalberg's "Home, Sweet Home;" Gottschalk's "Last Hope;" "Lucretia Borgia" fantasie, and selections from "Norma," "Il Trovatore," and several of his own compositions. After the execution of each piece Tom applauds himself with all the enthusiasm of any member of the audience, and appears just as well pleased and delighted. He is certainly a wonder in his way, and his entertainment will not fail to interest and satisfy any one who may wish to see and hear a wonderful musical prodigy.—New York Herald, Oct. 10th.

FROM the Nevada Transcript, of the 8th instant, we learn that both flues of the boiler of the Pennsylvania Mill, one mile from Nevada, collapsed on the day previous, throwing the boiler three hundred yards. On its way (at a distance of two hundred yards) it passed through a dwelling house, killing instantly Mrs. Marion Hutchinson, and completely destroying the building and furniture. Several men were within a short distance of the boiler at the time of the explosion, but none were materially injured. The occurrence is attributed to incompetence on the part of the engineer in charge—a "green hand"—who had perhaps been employed because his sort of engineering was cheaper than that of an experienced person.

A SHREWD ASTROLOGER.—An astrologer having predicted the death of a woman with whom Louis XI., of France was in love, and which the chapter of accidents had been so kind as to verify, the prince sent for him, and sternly told him, "You, sir, who foretell everything, pray when shall you die?" The astrologer coolly replied, "I shall die, Sire, three days before your Majesty." This reply so alarmed the king that he ordered him to be lodged in one of his palaces and taken care of.

A fire occurred in Sacramento, on the morning of the 7th instant, commencing in the establishment of C. Allen, wire-worker, east side of Fifth street, between J and K. The building was destroyed, and an adjoining one, used as an arsenal, considerably damaged. Some Government stores, tents, etc., were burned. The Bee says the fire was clearly the work of an incendiary.

M. THEIRS.—In a Paris assembly, the Swedish ambassador, Count de Lowenstein, told the assembled company the particulars of the assassination of Charles III. He was present at that bloody scene which furnished M. Scribe the incident on which he built "Gustave III." and "Bertrand et Raton," and gave M. Verdi the "book" of his "Ballo in Maschera." During the narrative M. Theirs said nothing; but when Count de Lowenstein ended the story, the host remarked: "Capitally told, my dear count, and every assertion you have made strictly true; nevertheless, you have forgotten some important particulars." The count exclaimed: "I have forgotten some particulars?" M. Theirs smiled, and began to tell the history. He rejuvenated it, and mentioned new curious, and omitted particulars. The circle were astonished and delighted, and Count de Lowenstein said: "You are right; that is the true history. I had forgotten it, I confess, dear Minister; 'twas you who saw Charles III. assassinated, not I!"

THE VINE.

(VITIS VINIFERA.)

"Turn we a moment Fancy's rapid flight
To vigorous soils and climes of fair extent,
Where, by the potent sun elated high,
The vineyard swells refulgent on the day;
Spreads o'er the vale, or up the mountain climbs
Profuse; and drinks amid the sunny rocks,
From cliff to cliff increased, the heighten'd blaze.
Low bend the weighty boughs; the clusters clear
Half through the foliage seen, or ardent flame,
Or shine transparent, while perfection breathes
White o'er the turgent film the living dew."

Beautiful and glowing as is this description of the vine, we may yet truly say it needs not the poet's pencil to enhance its charms, for when left to follow its own elegant fancies, and to twine its tendrils to any prop which offers itself, it does, indeed,

"Outstrip all praise,
And make it halt behind."

Such is its character in many parts of Spain and Italy where it is not cultivated for wine. It is then seen with the most picturesque effect, hanging its gay festoons to neighboring trees, asking support, and giving beauty. Southey has the following beautiful description of it:

"These scenes, profusely blest by Heaven, they lift
Where o'er the hazel and the quince, the vine
Wide mantling spreads; and, clinging round the cork
And ilex, hangs amid their dusky leaves
Garlands of brightest hue, with reddening fruit
Pendent on clusters cool of glassy green."

In those parts, however, where it is cultivated for wine, all its native gracefulness is lost, and in France and Germany especially, "the pole-clipt vinyards," as Shakspeare rightly designates them, are always disappointing objects to travellers who are unprepared for their appearance under culture. The vines are trained to poles, seldom more than a yard high, and all their wild luxuriance is pruned, the more to enhance the size and flavor of the fruit. In the latter country, they are constantly seen mingling their trellised branches laden with translucent clusters—the very image of plenty—with the ruined fortresses and baronial castles which overhang the Rhine, and there, though still suffering from the pruning knife, they look well from contrast—most assuredly they do so in poetry:

"Above the frequent feudal towers,
Through green leaves left their walls of gray,
And many a rock which steeply lowers,
And noble arch in proud decay,
Look o'er this vale of vintage bowers."

The earliest authentic history we have of the cultivation of the vine, is in the book of Genesis, where we are told "Noah began to be a husbandman, and he planted a vineyard." If, however, we might trust to poetry, we should find that it was of yet prior date, for it is described as one of the pleasant pursuits of our first parents to lead

——"The vine,
To wed the elm."

We also learn from the same authority, that in that garden of bliss there were

——"Umbrageous grots and caves
Of cool recess o'er which the mantling vine
Laid forth her purple grape, and gently crept
Luxuriant."

The next poetical intimation we have of its culture, is from Homer:

"Here order'd vines in equal ranks appear,
With all th' united labors of the year;
Some to unload the fertile branches run,
Some dry the blackening clusters in the sun,
Others to tread the liquid harvest join—
The groaning presses foam with floods of wine;
Here are the vines in early flower descried,
Here grapes discolored on the sunny side,
And there in Autumn's richest purple dyed."

Fiction apart, however, the cultivation of the vine was certainly a matter of great moment in the East. The vineyards were most commonly planted on the southern side of a hill, and surrounded by walls or a hedge of thorns, everything being first cleared away which might injure the growth of the plants; a striking commentary this on the first and second verses in the fifth chapter of Isaiah. Like most other choice fruits, the vine migrated from the East to the West.

Some writers affirm it is truly wild in Greece, a circumstance which others doubt, but if not indigenous from a very remote period, it has been completely naturalized both there and in other parts of Southern Europe, where its culture has long formed a chief branch of rural economy.

Virgil, who seems almost as good a naturalist as a poet, discourses very learnedly on the cultivation both of the vine and olive in his second Georgic. He informs us how, and when, and where to plant them, and in strains so sweet that the rough labors of husbandry appear no longer a part of the original curse. Speaking of the natural habitat of the vine, he says:

"Nor every plant on every soil will grow:
The sallow loves the wat'ry grounds and low;
The marshes alders. Nature seems t' ordain
The rocky cliffs for the wild ash's reign;
The baleful yew to northern blasts assigns,
To shores the myrtles and to mounts the vines."

But when under culture he allows the situation to be a matter of choice, recommending only a corresponding difference in the mode of planting:

"Choose next a province for thy vineyard's reign,
On hills above, or in the lowly plain;
If fertile fields or valleys be thy choice,
Plant thick, for bounteous Bacchus will rejoice
In close plantations there. But if the vine
On rising ground be placed, or hills supine,
Extend thy loose battalions largely wide,
Opening thy ranks and files on either side;
But marshall'd all in order as they stand,
And let no soldier straggle from his band."

No plant, perhaps, has so much classical fame as the vine. It has been the favorite theme of poetry in all ages and in all countries. We select the following from Homer's multitudinous store:

"Depending vines the shelving caverns screen,
With purple clusters blushing through the green."

And from Virgil:

"For now the year in brightest glory shines,
Now reddening clusters deck the bending vines."

The magnificent clusters of beautiful fruit which adorn its branches are the produce of a remarkably small, insignificant flower, which possesses, however, in a considerable degree, the redeeming quality of fragrance, a quality for which Lord Bacon greatly commends it.

"Next to the violet," says he, "is the musk rose, then the strawberry leaves dying with a most excellent cordial smell, then the flower of the vine—it is a little dust, like the dust of a bent which grows upon the clusters in the first coming forth." But we can adduce far higher authority than his in praise of the perfume of this little flower; he who spake "of trees from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon, even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall," says: "The fig-tree putteth forth her green figs, and the vines with the tender grapes give a good smell."

It has been known to attain a very great age, even superior to that of the oak itself, and will bear fruit to the last. Its wood is very durable, and it is said that the great doors of the cathedral of Ravenna were made of planks of the vine.

THEATRICAL TALK.

AT Maguire's Opera House on Monday evening, Mrs. Harry Jackson, lately arrived from Australia, made her first appearance before a Californian audience. Shakspeare's comedy of Much Ado About Nothing was performed. Mrs. Jackson made a most favorable impression on all who witnessed her performance of "Beatrice." She showed as fine a conception of the character as Mrs. Charles Kean, by whom the character was last played on the Opera House boards, and being considerably younger than that veteran actress, was by so many years the more perfect a "Beatrice." There is an ease and finish about this actress which is very charming; her reading is unexceptionably good: she has a fine voice and graceful carriage. To set against these advantages, it is hard for the most severe critic to find any failing which he can adduce as an offset. Perhaps a little more power might be desired in some parts—a little more animation—but after the exhibitions of power I have witnessed on the San Francisco stage, when angry stars with lurid glare shot across the theatrical horizon, my soul longs for quiet, and the mild, even lustre of Mrs. Jackson's acting, is perfectly delicious. Mr. George C. Boniface's acting in "Benedick," served one good purpose; his uneven rant and solemn mouthing heightened the effect of Mrs. Jackson's artistic impersonation of "Beatrice." On Tuesday, Mrs. Harry Jackson appeared in the character of "Pauline" in The Lady of Lyons, the occasion being the benefit of Senorita Maria, a clever little danseuse, who leaves for the East on the America on Monday. Mr. Boniface's "Benedick" was bad enough, but his "Claude Melnotte" was a little the worst of his efforts. I hope if Mr. Boniface is to undertake the leading business at this theatre where there are two actors far better qualified for the position, but who, alas, are "California actors," that he will not, for some time to come, again play "Claude Melnotte." If I were under any obligation to discover something good in so bad a performance, I should say that Mr. Boniface's reading in the scene where he describes to "Pauline" the extent of his estate, was tolerably good, but, taken as a whole, his enaction of "Claude Melnotte" was unutterably bad. Mrs. Harry Jackson in the character of "Pauline," was delightful; there were a thousand beauties to be discerned in it by the close observer. Mrs. Jackson has a most expressive countenance, and evinces great skill in the manner in which she causes it to depict the emotion called for by the text. The facial contortions of many actors and actresses, which they make in their attempts to express love, rage, grief, despair, etc., are painful to witness. Mrs. Jackson's face was a study for a painter as she stood listening to the mock prince's tale of the happiness in store for her; she listened in rapt attention, her eyes looking far off into the future, her hands clasped together; as "Claude" bends his face towards hers, her eyelids droop with maiden modesty, and the hands half unclasp; he proceeds with his story, and again she is all attention, drinking in with greedy eagerness his glowing description. I am well aware that Mrs. Harry Jackson is not a "star"—that is, not a star that was worth much "billing," no "mammoths," or anything of that kind—and I ought not to bestow so much space on her, but she is so sterling an actress, depends so much on having studied her profession, and has never in one single instance—that I have observed—had resort to any meretricious "originality" to trap applause, that I am only too glad to have an opportunity to praise an actress who has not come amongst us as "the world-renowned," the "dramatic genius," "the magnificent," or distinguished by some other high-sounding title—goodness knows when I shall ever have another opportunity; all the "stars," now-a-days, are comets with long flaming tails. On Wednesday evening Hamlet was performed once more, Mr. Daniel E. Bandmann impersonating the Danish Prince, and Mrs. Harry Jackson appearing in the character of "Ophelia," which she acted very finely. On Thursday evening Lady Audley's Secret was produced, Mrs. Harry Jackson displaying much power in her rendition of the part of "Lady Audley," while Mr. Charles Thorne played "Robert Audley" in a style which left nothing to be desired. Last night Mr. Daniel E. Bandmann took another benefit, appearing in his great impersonation of "Narcisse." To-night, The Merchant of Venice will be performed, Mr. Bandmann playing "Shylock," and Mrs. Harry Jackson filling the part of "Portia." This afternoon the bill will consist of Lady Audley's Secret, Mrs. Harry Jackson appearing as "Lady Audley." On Monday Mr. Harry Jackson appears in the drama of the Creole.

On Monday at the Academy of Music, Miss Emily Thorne made her first appearance in California in the character of "Hester Grazebrook" in Tom Taylor's comedy of the Unequal Match. Miss Emily Thorne's style of acting is delightfully natural. Miss Thorne possesses a very sweet and well cultivated voice, and is an accomplished ballad singer: she has, by the talent she has displayed both as an actress and vocalist, firmly established herself in the good graces of the public. Two more first appearances were made on the same occasion: Mr. Harry Wall appeared in the character of "Sir Harry Arncliffe" in the same comedy, and filled it creditably, and George Pardey, a young low comedian of much promise, played "Blinkensop" very cleverly. Miss Thorne was admirably well supported. Mr. Dan Setchell was immensely funny in the character of "Dr. Botcherby;" Miss Belle Land played "Lady Montressor" with considerable animation; Miss Sophie Worrell played "Bessie Hebblethwaite," a pert lady's maid, with much spirit, and all the members of the company filled the parts entrusted to them very satisfactorily. In the afterpiece Somebody Else, Miss Thorne acted and sang most charmingly in the character of "Minnie;" Mr. Dan Setchell exhibited much dry humor in his impersonation of "Hans Moritz," and Miss Louise Clarksou, who exhibits gratifying signs of improvement in acting and reading, played the part of "Louise" very pleasingly. The Unequal Match was played every evening until last night, when the Widow's Stratagem was substituted in its place. On Wednesday, Miss Emily Thorne sang the patriotic ballad "Shout for our Glorious Banner," which was composed expressly for her, appearing in the costume of the Goddess of Liberty; in this she drew the most enthusiastic shouts of applause from the audience, and was vociferously encored. Little Jennie Worrell has received her full share of applause every evening for the clever style in which she has performed a song and dance. A new burlesque entitled Arrah-na-Poke, now in rehearsal, is to be produced shortly. California Diamonds is also underlined. The Academy has been well filled every evening since the first appearance of Miss Emily Thorne, who is such a good actress and so sweet a singer, that I doubt not she will long retain the high place she has already gained in the estimation of the public. This afternoon the Unequal Match will be performed. The performance this evening will consist of the Widow's Stratagem and Somebody Else.

Arrah-na-Pogue is to be played for the last time at the Metropolitan Theatre on Monday, attaining its fiftieth representation. Mr. Charles Wheatleigh has reserved this last jubilee night, which closes the most successful and longest run ever achieved by any drama presented in this city, for his benefit. On Tuesday, the spectacular, sensational drama of Savannah will be produced. The same lavish expenditure of money which contributed so much to the success of Arrah-na-Pogue has characterized the preparations for the production of this new sensation. Magnificent new scenery has been painted by Mr. Torning, and grand scenic effects have been prepared under the supervision of Mr. James Dowling. Mr. Shiels, the well known Scotch comedian, an actor who, during his engagement under Mr. Wheatleigh, made rapid advances in popular favor, and whose impersonation of "Major Coffin" in Arrah na Pogue was a neatly and finished piece of acting, starts on the America on Monday for New York.

TOUCHSTONE.

SEVEN TIMES THREE.—LOVE.

I LEANED out of window, I smelt the white clover,
Dark, dark was the garden, I saw not the gate;
"Now, if there be footsteps, he comes, my own lover—
Hush, nightingale, hush! O, sweet nightingale, wait
Till I listen and hear
It a step draweth near,
For my love he is late.

"The skies in the darkness stoop nearer and nearer,
A cluster of stars hangs like fruit in the tree,
The fall of the water comes sweeter, comes clearer:
To what art thou listening, and what dost thou see?
Let the star-clusters glow,
Let the sweet waters flow,
And cross quickly to me.

"You night-moths that hover where honey brims over
From sycamore blossoms, or settle or sleep;
You glowworms shine out, and the pathway discover
To him that comes darkling along the rough steep.
Ah, my sailor, make haste,
For the time runs to waste,
And my love lieth deep—

'Too deep for swift telling: and yet my one lover
I've conned thee an answer, it waits thee to night."
By the sycamore passed he, and through the white clover,
Then all the sweet speech I had fashioned took flight;
But I'll love him more, more
Than e'er wife loved before,
Be the days dark or bright.

[Jean Ingelow's "Songs of Seven."

THE MOUNTAIN GLOOM.

I DO NOT know any district possessing a more pure or uninterrupted fulness of mountain character (and that of the highest order,) or which appears to have been less disturbed by foreign agencies, than that which borders the course of the Trient between Valorsine and Martigny. The paths which lead to it out of the valley of the Rhone, rising at first in steep circles among the walnut trees, like winding stairs among the pillars of a Gothic tower, retire over the shoulders of the hills into a valley almost unknown, but thickly inhabited by an industrious and patient population. Along the ridges of the rocks, smoothed by old glaciers into long, dark, billowy swellings, like the backs of plunging dolphins, the peasant watches the slow coloring of the tufts of moss and roots of herb which, little by little, gather a feeble soil over the iron substance; then, supporting the narrow strip of clinging ground with a few stones, he subdues it to the spade; and in a year or two a little crest of corn is seen waving upon the rocky casque. The irregular meadows run in and out like inlets of lake among these harvested rocks, sweet with perpetual streamlets, that seem always to have chosen the steepest places to come down, for the sake of the leaps, scattering their handfuls of crystal this way and that, as the wind takes them, with all the grace, but with none of the formalism, of fountains: dividing into fanciful change of dash and spring, yet with the seal of their granite channels upon them, as the lightest play of human speech may bear the seal of past toil, and closing back out of their spray to lave the rigid angles, and brighten with silver fringes and glassy films each lower and lower step of sable stone; until at last, gathered altogether again—except, perhaps, some chance drops caught on the apple-blossom, where it has budded a little nearer the cascade than it did last spring—they find their way down to the turf, and lose themselves in that, silently; with quiet depth of clear water furrowing among the grass blades, and looking only like their shadow, but presently emerging again in little startled gushes and laughing hurries, as if they had remembered suddenly that the day was too short for them to get down the hill.

Green field, and glowing rock, and glancing streamlet, all slope together in the sunshine towards the brows of the ravines, where the pines take up their own dominion of saddened shade; and with everlasting roar in the twilight, the stronger torrents thunder down pale from the glaciers, filling all their chasms with enchanted cold, beating themselves to pieces against the great rocks that they have themselves cast down, and forcing fierce way beneath their ghastly poise.

The mountain paths stoop to these glens in forky zigzags, leading to some gray and narrow arch, all fringed under its shuddering curve with the ferns that fear the light; a cross of rough-hewn pine, iron-bound to its parapet, standing dark against the lurid fury of the foam. Far up the glen, as we pause beside the cross, the sky is seen through the openings in the pines, thin with excess of light; and, in its clear, consuming flame of white space, the summits of the rocky mountains are gathered into solemn crowns and circlets, all flushed in that strange, faint silence of possession by the sunshine which has in it so deep a melancholy; full of power, yet as frail as shadows; lifeless, like the veil of some sea spirit, that lives and dies as the foam flashes; fixed on a perpetual throne, stern against all strength, lifted above all sorrow, and yet effaced and melted utterly into the air by that last sunbeam that has crossed to them from between the two golden clouds.

High above all sorrow: yes; but not unwitnessing to it. The traveller on his happy journey, as his foot springs from the deep turf and strikes the pebbles gaily over the edge of the mountain road, sees with a glance of delight the clusters of nut-brown cottages that nestle among those sloping orchards, and glow beneath the boughs of the pines. Here, it may well seem to him, if there be sometimes hardship, there must be at least innocence and peace, and fellowship of the human soul with nature. It is not so. The wild goats that leap along those rocks have as much passion of joy in all that fair work of God as the men that toil among them. Perhaps more. Enter the street of one of those villages, and you will find it foul with that gloomy foulness that suffered only by torpor, or by anguish of soul. Here, it is torpor—not absolute suffering—not starvation or disease, but darkness of calm enduring; the spring known only as the time of the scythe, and the autumn as the time of the sickle, and the sun only as a warmth, the wind as a chill, and the mountains as a danger. They do not understand so much as the name of beauty, or of knowledge. They understand dimly that of virtue. Love, patience, hospitality, faith—these things they know. To glean their meadows side by side, so happier; to bear the burden up the breathless mountain flank, unmurmuringly; to bid the stranger drink from their vessel of milk; to see at the foot of their low deathbeds a pale figure upon a cross, dying also, patiently; in this they are different from the cattle and from the stones, but in all this unrewarded as far as concerns the present life. For them, there is neither hope nor passion of spirit; for them neither advance nor exultation. Black bread, rude roof, dark night, laborious day, weary arm at sunset; and life ebbs away. No books, no thoughts, no attainments, no rest; except only sometimes a little sitting in the sun under the church wall, as the bell tolls thin and far in the mountain air; a pattering of a few prayers, not understood, by the altar rails of the dimly gilded chapel, and so back to the sombre home, with the cloud upon them still unbroken—that cloud of rocky gloom, born out of the wild torrents and ruinous stones, and unlightened, even in their religion, except by the vague promise of some better thing unknown, mingled with threatening, and obscured by an unspeakable horror—a smoke, as it were, of martyrdom, coiling up with the incense, and, amidst the images of tortured bodies and lamenting spirits in hurtling flames, the very cross, for them, dashed more deeply than for others, with gouts of blood.

Do not let this be thought a darkened picture of the life of these mountaineers. It is a literal fact. No contrast can be more painful than that between the dwelling of any well conducted English cottager, and that of the equally honest Savoyard. The one, set in the midst of its dull flat fields and uninteresting hedgerows, shows in itself the love of brightness and beauty; its daisy-studded garden beds, its smoothly swept brick path to the threshold, its freshly sanded floor and orderly shelves of household furniture, all testify to energy of heart, and happiness in the simple course and simple possessions of daily life. The other cottage, in the midst of an inconceivable, inexpressible beauty, set on some sloping bank of golden sward, with clear fountains flowing beside it, and wild flowers, and noble trees, and goodly rocks gathered round into a perfection as of Paradise, is itself a dark and plague-like stain in the midst of the gentle landscape. Within a certain distance of its threshold the ground is foul and cattle-trampled; its timbers are black with smoke, its garden choked with weeds and nameless refuse, its chambers empty and joyless, the light and wind gleaming and filtering through the crannies of their stones. All testifies that to its inhabitant the world is labor and vanity; that for him neither flowers bloom, nor birds sing, nor fountains glisten; and that his soul hardly differs from the gray cloud that coils and dies upon his hills except in having no fold of it touched by the sunbeams.—Ruskin's Modern Painters.

ETYMOLOGY OF NAMES OF COUNTRIES.—Europe, signifies a country of white complexion; so named because the inhabitants there were of a lighter complexion than those of either Asia or Africa.

Asia, signifies between, or in the middle, from the fact that geographers then placed it between Europe and Africa.

Africa, signifies the land of corn, or ears. It was celebrated for its abundance of corn, and all sorts of grain.

Spain, a country of rabbits, or conies. This country was once so infested with these animals, that the inhabitants petitioned Augustus for an army to destroy them.

Italy, a country of pitch; from its yielding great quantities of black pitch.

Gaul, modern France, signifies yellow-haired; as yellow hair characterized its first inhabitants.

Hibernia, is utmost, or last habitation; for beyond this, westward, the Phœnicians, we are told, never extended their voyages.

Britain, the country of tin; as there were great quantities of lead and tin found on the adjacent island. The Greeks called it Albion, which signifies in the Phœnician tongue, either white or high mountains, from the whiteness of its shores, or the high rocks on the western coast.

AMIABILITY.—Perhaps no word in the American language is more frequently misapplied than the adjective, amiable. My neighbor tells me that Mrs. Liston is such an amiable, agreeable woman, she is confident I will value her acquaintance highly. That kind of shroud wrapped around Mrs. Liston's character and laid in such a caressing way in my arms, put in a little dash of saltlessness in my pre-opinion. It took the relishable smack away. A day or two later, I met Mrs. Liston. Her conversation amounted in the aggregate to a permutation of "yes," "no," "I think so," "thank you," "indeed!" smiles, simpers, and parlor twaddle. She ventures no new idea, for fear of venturing on somebody's toes. She maintains no point; it would be exhibiting strong-mindedness. Her amiability is of cabbage-leaf texture. One might send a gust of eloquence or a whirlwind of invectives against her in the presence of others, and no difference in the effect be visible.

It is her forte to make people believe she is saturated through and through with sanctified sweetness, and she almost invariably produces the desired result. People wonder how one can help living agreeably with Mrs. Liston. Men with scolding wives call Liston a lucky fellow, and the minister names her as a model of Christian beauty and uniformity. Those who know her in the kitchen as in the parlor call her a termagant, with a slick coating of suavity always on hand for immediate donning. There is a vast difference in seeing Mrs. Liston surrounded by guests and in looking at her through her husband's eyes at a quiet dinner. He finds her pretty, meek "thank you's" metamorphosed into hateful fault-findings; her serene smiles come at the ringing of the door-bell.

I have a settled antipathy against this popular amiability. Give me hail and earthquakes, thunder and lightning, but deliver me from this insipid, hypocritical nothingness. Grant human friends occasionally. They always have some thorns of unlikeness; but they are vastly more agreeable than one continual monotonousness of dead calm, of harmony.

QUEEN ELIZABETH AS A MUSICIAN.—A graphic account is given by Mr. James Melvil, the Scottish Ambassador, of Queen Elizabeth's performance of the Virginal. It is quoted in Dr. Rimboult's work on the piano-forte: "After dinner," writes Melvil, "my Lord of Hudson drew me into a quiet gallery, that I might hear some music (but he durst not avow it)—where I might hear the Queen play on the 'Virginals.' After I had harkened awhile, I took by the tapestry that hung by the door of the chamber, and stood a pretty space from her, hearing her play excellently well. But she left off immediately as soon as she turned about and saw me, and came forward, seeming to strike me with her hand, alleging that she used not to play before men, but when she was solitary, to prevent melancholy. She asked me how I came there. I answered, as I was walking with Lord Hudson, as we passed by the chamber door I heard such a melody as ravished me, whereby I was drawn in ere I knew how, excusing my fault of homeliness, as being brought up in the Court of France, where such freedom was allowed, declaring myself willing to endure what punishment Her Majesty should be pleased to inflict on me for so great an offence, And then she sat down on a low cushion, and I upon my knees by her; but with her own hand she gave me a cushion to lay under my knee, which at first I refused, but she compelled me to take it. She inquired whether my Queen (Mary of Scots) or she played best. In that I found myself obliged to give her the praise."

A MANUSCRIPT of Gretry, the celebrated musician, has been sold recently, which is not a little singular. It relates, in a letter to a friend, how he had always prayed as a child, before attending his first communion, that he might be killed that day if he were not to be a good man and eminent in his profession. On that day, after the communion, he ascended the belfry to see the bell rung, during which time a block of wood, weighing four hundred pounds, fell on the head of Grétry and stunned him. He recovered, to the astonishment of every one, shortly after, and, remembering his prayer, took it as a proof from Heaven that he should some day succeed in his profession. It is needless to add that he did so.

AN odd sort of bet was decided, a few weeks ago, at Paris, in the Seine, near one of the bridges, in the presence of thousands of spectators. Count de S—— bet Monsieur P——, that he, the count, would swim about for ten minutes, during which time he would read, in a loud and audible voice, from a book, which he agreed to keep, the whole of the time, free from any contact with the water, or even a splash. The count, who is a splendid swimmer, did what he proposed, and was welcomed with vociferous cheers at the end of his arduous undertaking. The wager was for five hundred francs.

THE occupation of mendicity, in Vienna, seems flourishing, as a beggar has just died there, bequeathing 8,000 florins, or £800, to his daughter, the fruits of his savings during nine years that he had followed the profession.

THE BONES OF THE BOURBONS.

HISTORICAL SKETCH.

"NO man," says the Koran, "knows the spot on earth where his grave shall be made." The Bourbons thought they knew, but, like meaner folks, they were out in their reckoning, so far, at least, as related to their final place of sepulture. In vain they built themselves a mighty mausoleum. For eleven hundred years the abbey church consecrated to St. Denis held the bones of Capets, Carlovingians, and descendants of "the good King Dagobert," but the revolntionary storm swept away all before it, and all the other relics, till then held sacred. There are few events of that terrible time more completely demonstratiug the snbversion of the royalty which had endured so long, than the decree of the convention of the 6th of August, 1792, six months after the execution of Louis XVI., which sent the rabid populace of Paris trooping to St. Denis to obliterate the recollection of the kings of France by destroying their very tombs and burying their remains in the common fosse. In the tombs of hollowed stone of the earlier monarchs, little worth notice was found. In that of King Pepin there was a small quantity of gold wire, nothing more, but each coffin bore the simple inscription of the name of its inmate ou a leaden plate, and the greater part of these plates were much oxidized, and in a very bad condition, so that the names were in mauy instances nearly illegible. The plates, however, were not wanted for preservation, bnt together with the leaden coffins of Philippe le Hardi and Isabella of Arragon, and the leaden roof of the abbey church, were taken to the Hotel dc Ville of Paris, aud there uielted down aud cast into musket balls. The most remarkable object discovered was a silver seal, of ogive form, belonging to Constance of Castille, the second wife of Louis VII., who died in 1100. It weighed three ounces and a half, and, silver money being out of fashion, was not converted into either cash or bullets, but found 'ts way to the muuicipal stronghold, and was thence transferred to the caoinet of antiquities of the Natioual (not the Imperial) Library. Though only three days' labor was actually bestowed, the work of demolition was, from various causes, suspended from August till October, but on the 12th of that month, it was resumed, and with renewed vigor the destroyers forced their way into the vaults of the Bourbons.

The first coffiu they met with was one which might have demanded forbearance, had there been any but overbearing spirits in the midst of such unhallowed ruffianism; it was that of Henri Quartre! His body was in a good state of preservation, and his features were perfectly recognizable: the winding sheet was also in a good state of preservatiou. For two days his remains were exposed to public view; and then they were remorselessly cast into the yawuing trench which awaited them. The same fate awaited the bones of Louis XIII. and his descendants. The first-named mouarch was recognized by his moustaches, and Louis XIV. by his prominent features; but his face, that face which had received so much adoration in his lifetime, was now black as ink. To this complexion had it come at last. The bodies of his immediate family, and especially that of the Grand Dauphin—oh, graudeur!—were in a state of liquid putrefaction. The hearts of some of the princes were found nuder the coffins, iucased in lead with enamelled inscriptions! the lead was carefully taken away, the withered hearts were tossed with howls and execrations into the commou fosse. On the fifth day, after having taken all the bodies which were regularly interred in the royal vault, the depredators came, at the further end, to another coffin, placed on a stoue bench about two feet from the ground, in a recess formed in the thickness of the wall. The situation of this coffin showed that it was that of the last king who had died, which always occupied tho recess in question till his successor came to replace him. In this instance the successor never came.

As if open day were uecessary for fully satisfying the vengeauce of the revolutionary mob, eager to wreak their brutal fury on all the Bourbons in the person of the one, ill-called "Le Bienaime," the coffin of Louis XV. was dragged from the crypt to the brink of the trench and there opeued. The body was taken out of its leaden case, and swathed like a mummy, appeared to be in a good state of preservation; but the instant the bandages were removed, the royal corpse took its revenge on the surrounding multitude. It was, as might have been expected, considering the disease of which the profligate king died, in a state of direst putrefaction, and from the loathsome carcass came so pernicious an odor that all fled from it in dismay. At length, in order that the Jacobin body-snatchers might complete their purpose, recourse was had to the firing of muskets, and burning of gunpowder, to purify the air, and when the fumigation had lasted long enough, the blackened fragments of royalty were hurried into the pit on a bed of quicklime—somewhat different from the sumptuous couch at Versailles!—aud quickly concealed from human senses.—All the Year Round.

BUOYANCY OF JOURNALISM.—A boat made out of old newspapers, rowed several miles by an adventurous youth, is the latest English novelty.

A PLEA FOR TOBACCO.

UNDER this caption, a contributor to the Round Table says: "It is a very easy thing for an opponent of tobacco to apparently prove, by statistical evidence, its highly injurious effects upon mankind. For instance, let us snppose he wishes to show that its use leads to insanity. He goes to an insane asylum and ascertaius that of 500 inmates 300 were great smokers. He publishes this fact, and then there is a terrible outcry throughout the civilized world, and even some of those who have smoked on in happiness for years tremble for their reason. It would be perfectly practicable, by like means, to establish the injnrious effects of bread and milk upon the human mind. These statisticians do not thiuk of making their inquiries of tobacco-users who neither become demeuted nor suffer any other inconvenience throngh their devotion to the weed. The fact is, that so far from being deleterious, tobacco is, to the vast majority of those who indulge in it, a positive blessing. The complaints and invectives against it come from those who either have no experience of its benefits, or those who, having feebly attempted to habituate themselves to it, have been frightened before the system had adapted itself to the new order of things. Most of our tastes are acquired. In reality, there is but one in the way of food which is natural, and that is born with us.

The greatest men of modern times have been and are smokers of tobacco. Whether we seek among those who have devoted themselves to art, to science, to literature, or to war, we find this to be the case. The weed disposes the mind to reflection. It brings the brain into that condition most favorable for a calm and philosophical study of the subject before it, dispels the doubts and cares which every-day events are constantly exciting, renders us confident of our own powers, and engenders within us a spirit of universal friendship.

But the influence of tobacco upon the mind is not the only benefit to be derived from its use. It promotes digestion, and is highly conducive to the assimilation of the food to the several purposes and the various wants of the organism. It is a well-ascertained fact in physiology that whatever increases the quantity of saliva likewise angments the amount of gastric juice secreted. This is very beautifully shown in the dog. The experimental physiologist makes an opeuing into the stomach of one of these animals, aud fastens in it a small silver tube capable of being opened or closed at will. When any strongly salival substance, such as vinegar or tobacco is put into the mouth of an animal prepared in this manner, the secretion of gastric juice is at once excited, and the fluid passes through the open tube in quite a stream. The benefit of an affer-dinner cigar is, therefore, not to be despised in these days of indigestible meals.

But for any permaneutly beneficial influence to be derived from the use of tobacco, moderation in its employment is absolutely essential. Over-indnlgence is certain to be prejudicial. No fixed rules can, however, be given on this point. What is excess for one is temperance for another, and thus each individual must find his own standard, and abide by it. Two or three cigars a day may ordiuarily be regarded as the proper amount of tobacco to be smoked, and it is best to indulge only after meals.

All our encomiums apply only to smoking. Chewiug is a filthy habit, and one that is also injurious, on account of the great loss of saliva it occasious. Snuff-taking has almost gone out of fashion, and scarcely, therefore, needs consideration.

"CHRISTOPHER ROMAUNT'S" WORKS.—The S. F. Bulletin, of 4th November, amoug several California items, gives the following:

"Another San Frauciscan, James F. Bowman, is engaged in writing books of adventure for juvenile reading, to be published by Gould, Lincoln & Co., of Boston. A little work by Mr. Bowman, called The Island Home, published by the same firm several years ago, has had a large sale, gone through several editions iu this country and England, been translated into French aud German, and has made the nom de plume of the author—"Christopher Romaunt"—familiar to thousands. His juvenile stories are written in excellent English, aud in their description of scenery, natural objects, and the habits and customs of strange people in strange lands, are truthful, and imbued with a strong local coloring, so that they not only entertain but instruct."

THERE was a deacon in a town in Maine by the nme of Day—by trado a cooper. One Sabbath morning he heard a number of boys playing in front of his house, and he weut out to stop their Sabbath breaking. Assuming a grave countenance, he said to them: "Boys do you know what day this is?" "Yes, sir," replied one of the boys, "Deacon Day—the cooper."

NEW BOOK BY AN OLD RESIDENT.—Ticknor & Fields will publish in December The Life and Public Services of Samuel Adams, in three volumes octavo, by his great-grandson, William V. Wells, of San Francisco.

THE GOOD OLD DAYS.—The following description of things in the last generation is given by Sydney Smith:

"A young man, alive at this period, hardly knows to what improvements of human life he has been introduced; and I would bring before his knowledge the following eighteen changes which have taken place since I first began to breathe in it the breath of life—a period amounting now to nearly seventy-three years:

"Gas was unknown. I groped about the streets of London in all but the darkness of a twinkling oil lamp, under the protection of watchmen in their grand climacteric, and exposed to every species of depredation and insult.

"I have been nine hours sailing from Dover to Calais, before the invention of steam. It took me nine hours to go from Taunton to Bath, before the invention of railroads, aud I now go in six hours from Taunton to London. In going from Tauuton to Bath I snffered between 10,000 and 12,000 severe contusions before stone-breaking Macadam was born.

"I can walk, by the assistance of the police, from one end of London to another without molestation; or, if tired, get into a cheap and active cab, instead of those cottages on wheels, which the hackney coaches were at the begiuning of my life. I had no umbrella; they were little used and very dear. There were no water-proof hats, aud my hat has often been reduced by rains into its primitive pulp.

"I could not keep my small-clothes in their proper place, for braces were unknown. If I had the gout, there was uo colchicum. If I was bilious, there was no calomel. If I was attacked by ague, there was no quinine. There were filthy coffee-houses, instead of elegant clubs. Game could not be bonght. There were no banks to receive the savings of the poor. The Poor Laws were gradually sapping the vitals of the country; and, whatever miseries I suffered, I had no post to whisk my complaints for a single penny to the remotest corner of the empire; and yet, in spite of all these privations, I lived on quietly, and am now ashamed that I was not more discontented, and utterly surprised that all these changes and inventions did not occur two centuries ago.

"I forgot to add that, as the baskets of stage-coaches, in which luggage was then carried, had no spring, your clothes were all rubbed to pieces; and that even in the best society one-third of the gentlemen, at least, were always drunk."

SWISS BRIDGES.—The traveller in Switzerland is struck with the peculiarity of their bridges, which are mostly roofed in the same fashion as their chalets, the utility of which practice is not manifested at first, but is doubtlesss for the purpose of protecting them from the snow, which would otherwise block up their transit. There are several very curious specimens of these housed bridges in the antiquated city of Lucerne, which is situated in the midst of the most splendid scenery, aud at the end of one of the most picturesque lakes in all Europe—probably in all the world. They are thrown across the river Reuss, which, although it enters the lake at Altorf as a turbid, puddled stream, resembling milk, having passed through the lake, issues a beautiful sea green, with all the swiftness of a mountain torrent at Lucerne. I know not why the flowing of a peaceful river should not only attract but also rivet one's attention irresistibly: but so it was, that both here and at Geneva, (where the Rhone issues a beautiful azure blue.) I could stand by the hour to look upon it. Against panels which are fastened to the timbers supporting one of the bridges, I think they call it the mill-bridge, you have delineated the Dance of Death, after Holbein's famous picture at Basle. Against the sides of another, which runs in a slanting direction across the mouth of the Reuss, on one side there are upwards of seventy pictures, which describe the feats of the patron saints of Lucerne, while on the opposite there are the same number, describing, historically, various scenes in Swiss history.

DEATH of DR. WORCESTER.—The death of the eminent lexicographer, Joseph E. Worcester, occurred at his residence in Cambridge (Mass.,) October 27th. He was born in Bedford (N. H.,) August 24, 1784, and was over eighty-one years of age at his decease. He graduated at Yale College in 1811. Besides his famous dictionary, he was the author of a geographical dictionary or Universal Gazateer, Gazateer of the United States, Elements of Geography, Ancient and Modern; Epitome of Geography, Sketches of the Earth and its Inhabitants, Elements of History, Ancient and Modern; Spelling-book of the English Language, Remarks on Longevity, and several other valuable works. He received the degree of LL. D. from Dartmouth College and Brown University.—Sacramento Union.

A LEARNED and enthusiastic orator recently startled his audience by the following sentence: "Sir, let those beware who would trifle with the popular will. In the langnage of the poet, Facilis decensus averni, 'The voice of the people is the voice of God.'" This is nearly as good as the illustration once used by a member of a certain down East Legislature: "Mr. Speaker," said the member, "this matter," referring to the question under debate, "is like Pandora's box, the more you stir it the worse it smells."

POLITICAL "SHEEP WALKERS."

THE public should be thankful that the Daily Examiner has offered them, in a contribution signed by "A Democrat and a Secessionist," a sincere statement of those principles of which it is a consistent advocate. They should be grateful that this Democratic-Secessionist avers that all Democrats who are not Secessionists are "sheep that have wandered from the fold." There is a rare felicity in his metaphor, of which he was evidently unconscious. Sydney Smith's famous epithet of "Sheep Walkers," as applied to a certain class of bliud conservatives, accurately portrays the California sham Democracy. They still pursue the same old devious and beaten paths, over which their leaders and ancestors have passed. Progress has availed herself of short cuts, or of steam and electricity on the high road: the "Sheep Walkers" swerve not from their accustomed track. Should an obstacle occur, there is generally a sheep-walk around it, which, after some bleating and the exercise of a blind instinctive faculty, is invariably found.

Rare and instructive instances of "sheep-walking" are afforded in the columns of the Daily Examiner, Marysville Express, and lately the Downieville Standard. It might be imagined that, with slavery dead, the epithet "Abolitionist" had lost some of its terrible keenness as a weapon in the hands of the Democracy. It is still flourished, however, with an air of freshness and originality. A favorite argument that Free Schools and the Landing of the Pilgrims are jointly and somewhat indefinitely connected with the destruction of American Civil liberty, is still offered with every demonstration of novelty. Allusions to the "Resolutions of 98," the Fugitive Slave Law, Amalgamation, etc., are still made. Their columns are protracted into a vast "sheep walk," beaten hard with the successive footprints of past democracy, with the succulent herbage cropped on either side. Perhaps it may be owing to the influence of Spring that the leading bell-wether of the Downieville Standard skips and gambols in his accustomed walk. He intimates that if Lincoln be among the hosts of Heaven, "Nero and Caligula are perambulating the streets of New Jerusalem, and the Devil is sitting at the right hand of God." We do not know how it may be with Nero and Caligula, but the indications about Downieville would seem to favor the conclusion that the devil, at least, has not yet been translated.

With the exception of these sporadic efforts of the Downieville paper, which might be popularly expressed as "cavorting," the spectacle of this incessant sheep-walking is apt to be dreary. We do not see the necessity for this repetition of well known and by-gone formulæ. We cannot imagine why these gentlemen are so bitter. We are told that General Lee is President of a College, that another Democrat and Secessionist is President of a railroad company, that the ingenuous and high-minded General Hardee has had a dinner given to him by several Union officers, that Davis is shortly to be released, that Wirtz will not be hung, and that, in the words of Mr. Squeers, "all is happiness and joy." We cannot see why, in return for this tacit recognition of the past services of "Democrats and Secessionists," unfortunate Republicans and Union men are to be assailed with the "ancient and fish-like" epithets that have grown mouldy in the vocabulary of the chivalrous Democracy.

When the Revolution which separated the Colonies from the mother country was over, and American Independence achieved, there were yet to be found old loyalists and tories, who secretly drank the health of King George, and, in feeble coteries in the city of New York, bewailed the progress of the young Republic, and reverted fondly to the days when stamped paper and taxed tea were sent from England. We can respect those honest sheep-walkers, whose only fault was their blind loyalty to the government that had given them place and protection, and under whose despotic rule they were willing to suffer, rather than rebel. But what shall we think of the modern tory—the Democratic sheep-walker? What shall be said of men who view only with anger the spectacle of their country rising triumphantly from the smoke of a terrible civil war, with the one black stain washed from her escutcheon, with a position and a power among the nations of the globe, until now unknown and unacknowledged? What shall be said of those who would go back to chaos, because the world was not of their forming; who would sow again the seeds that have already ripened to their destruction? It were unfair to the blind instinct which guides the sheep, to elevate the Democratic sheep-walker to their level.

HOME CULTURE.

STRANGERS are very apt to receive a favorable impression of the literary and æsthetic culture of Californians. They look upon the well-filled shelves of the public libraries, on the overflowing counters of Roman and Bancroft, on the quantity of Eastern papers and magazines sold by the newsdealers, on the Art Union and picture galleries, on theatres blazing with theatrical and operatic stars, and, from a hasty generalization of these facts, come to a conclusion extremely flattering to our vanity. Very often this is the result of a previous misconception of the absorbing nature of our business pursuits; more frequently of a total misconstruction of that constant demand for excitement, which is a peculiarity of our temperament.

The capacity for appreciating the gentle arts, and the faculty of creating or fostering them, are two different things. It is a lamentable fact that, while Californians liberally compensate Eastern talent for the pleasure they derive from it, they are totally indifferent to it for its own sake, and ignore its cultivation at home. The best Californian talent is obliged to go abroad for recognition. A young San Francisco artist, hardly remembered by name in his native city, is flattered in European circles, and has his last picture complimented by Bierstadt as one of the best on the New York Academy walls. A soprano singer, of little renown in her adopted State, passes the gauntlet of continental criticism, is honored by an extravagant title, and the chronicle of her success is copied in our papers and read by hundreds who never heard her sing. A California humorist, whose crude, but original sketches have been a feature of our local press, is handsomely recognised by a critical Eastern authority, and the criticism read here by a class who never before heard of the humorist. While there is a disposition abroad to accept anything Californian as an evidence of merit and ability, at home our literature languishes and our talent falls into desuetude. A local satirical monthly paper, whose illustrations compete fairly with the best artistic ability of the East, whose columns often sparkle with a wit and humor so well appreciated abroad as to be plagiarised and appropriated, has barely gained as yet a local habitation and a name.

Various reasons are given for this neglect. It is urged frequently that the competition of Eastern talent keeps down home cultivation. The recognition of our home talent abroad, and the fact that many of the Eastern literary papers taken are often filled with California reprints, shows the fallacy of this reasoning. The argument that our population is not large enough to support profitably local literature is shown to be illogical from the premises assumed in the previous proposition. A more sensible reason may be found in that crude state of our civilization and social organization, which keeps us from seeking pleasure and comfort within ourselves—in the absence of the influences of HOME—in the unsettled, migratory and insincere foundations of our society. Until time shall remove this, we cannot expect to foster and cultivate the gentle arts, or cause them to take root in our soil, nor can we deserve the reputation of a literary and artistic community.

TELEGRAPHIC NEWS.—The work of reconstruction is making headway rapidly in the Southern States. Georgia has repudiated the Confederate war debt. It is "semi-officially" announced, through Washington correspondents, that seats will be granted in Congress only to the representatives of those States which have repudiated the Southern debt, and adopted the anti-slavery amendment... The State elections show large Republican gains in New York, Massachusetts and Maryland. New Jersey has gone Republican... Lord John Russell had succeeded Palmerston as Prime Minister of England... The English press favor the settlement of the claims for indemnity for damage done by Confederate cruisers... The cholera was raging in Spain and parts of southern Europe. Several deaths from cholera have occurred on a ship in New York harbor.

NEW MUSIC.—M. Gray, Music Publisher and importer, No. 613 Clay street, has laid upon our table a copy of "Maria Dolores," the Cuban song sung so charmingly by Adelaide Phillips. It is a pleasant souvenir of the great contralto. The words of this Cancion Cubana are left in the original tongue; they are a mere vehicle for the melody, and the song would not be benefitted by their translation.

OLD ACQUAINTANCES AMONG BOOKS.

THE first lustrums of one's intellectual life are generally spent in a hungry search after novelty in literature. The fresh youth who once discovers that there is something in the Arabian Nights or Peregrine Pickle that will while away time not to be devoted to tag or marbles, commences a vacation's race after ideas extending over more books than would quantitatively satisfy the literary appetite of an old student like my friend Ancient during an entire decade. The fields of literature are to the boy much in the same light as are the meadows and baskets of a first country visit to a young cockney. He runs a muck among the green things, tearing up this plant, wrenching off that branch, and loading himself with flowers regardless of his future purposes as to them. Everything is beautiful; everything gratifies his crude taste; and nothing comes amiss to his budget of souvenirs.

But by-and-by, the literary fledgling discovers that there are blossoms in books as worthless from being common as are certain wild flowers that have wearied the eye in its pleasant rest upon the green and unpretending sod. He begins to sneer at more callow admiration than his that may be called up by something which he has outgrown. Those who speak of fairy stories with the most contempt are generally precocious children who have just arrived at a proper skepticism about the supernatural, or more elderly people, who, notwithstanding their years, have hardly penetrated much farther into metaphysics. But this vigorous making of corduroy roads through literature, cannot be the work for a lifetime. The mind finally wearies of the novelty of everything—variety becoming, as a Milesian might say, too commonplace. After the summit of intellectual acquirement has been passed, the patient scholar is pleased to turn back and macadamize. The brain finds difficulty in remembering the hordes of new acquaintances to whom it is introduced; and a feeling of relief is experienced in turning back to old pages thumbed lovingly in the handling of boyhood.

It is too conservative a prejudice of taste perhaps, to find one's self flinging down sentiment glittering in all the blaze of modern adaptation and piping hot from the bookbinder's hands to go back to Tristram Shandy and his relatives, discolored, as their history is, by the fingerings of generations; but—and I fancy that many of my readers will sympathize with me therein—I cannot help turning back affectionately at times to Captain Tobias, to re-read old passages, after a futile unsatisfied glance at the shelf where reposes a platoon of the essayists of a raw ten years' service. It may be a mark of mental decay to hanker after certain pothouse ballads of the days of Queen Bess, when sneaking through a volume of late War Lyrics; but I cannot help feeling that I would acknowledge my failing to some future section of posterity with full hope of being shrived by their high priest of taste.

A book that you have read at all sorts of ages and among all sorts of people and scenes, has a sort of visionary commentary settling down upon its white margin, that gives the text a peculiar brilliancy of intelligence in your eyes. What matters it if that verse of Keats is turgid with epithetic honey? It was delightful to you that long winter evening so many years ago, when you stretched yourself before a log fire and read, wishing that you too were only under the spell of St. Agnes. This poem of Shelley's is not to your mental liking now; but when you lay once under the trees far away on some eastern hillside with a friend at your elbow, whose voice seems now to come back to your ears making notes of the words to express itself by, you liked Shelley and everything about him. The books of those days are too holy to call forth your better formed opinions of the cynical present, and you read again with something like a return to mental youth combined with a sadness moved by the contrasts in life's epochs.

There are certain trite bits of Horace which I always gratefully pardon country editors, (and sometimes writers of higher pretensions,) for introducing in a battered grammatical state into their columns, because I am thereby reminded of ancient pleasures, when the halcyon still rested on the quiet flood of student life, and the construing of those same passages was the most arduous labor of the hour. There is nothing perhaps, (the classic earl will pardon me if there is,) particularly beautiful in the story of the arrival of Ulysses among the Phæacians; it may indeed be a passage where Homer took a Horatian nap: but I never can see the name of that island but a throng of pleasing recollections arise, of modern date, for which the bard is nowise responsible. Never call a man pedantic because he airs his "little Latin and less Greek" at inopportune moments. It may be that there is a double pleasure of both memory and association that has called forth the unhappy quotation.

Perhaps, many a man admires and appreciates Shakspeare, because he was a happy lover at the time when he first listened to his plays; and that "Juliet" on the stage and his own Mary by his side, "Jessica" and Jennie are so mixed up in his memory, that he indulgently refuses to decree partition of the pleasing perceptions, and gives them all to the poet. Therefore, thou German actor, be thou cautious about thy new texts; deal gently with the received stage version; and remove not the landmarks of theatrical tradition, inasmuch as thou mayst disturb thereunder a pleasing lot of mouldy reflections upon the past, and thereby sow dragon's teeth in an audience that may rouse up into ruthless and injudicious critics. The divine William will pardon thee, if thou flingest aside the commentators, and stickest to the deep rooted notions of his corporate representatives of the English stage.

Paul and Virginia, I heard branded the other day as a book "fit only for girls and spoony boys." My indignation has not yet settled into ordinary resentment. Could a book that has had a tender niche in the hearts of father and son, mother and daughter, for so long, ornamenting the literature of so many languages into which it has been translated, have finally come down to be considered in the same sort of light that we would regard a mongrel cross by a Sunday-school story out of a feuilleton from the pen of that literary French impropriety with two k's in his name?

There is a little poem by Mrs. Norton, entitled the "Dying Hour." It may be beautiful, and it may be nothing more than a sentimental bit of trash by a scribbling woman. I read it carelessly long ago: but the measure somehow kept the verse coherently in my head, in spite of my indifferenee. It came in my mind afterwards, when at the bedside of a young soldier dying among strangers. He wasted by fever until his delirious efforts to move degenerated into a mere waving of the hand, and his voice had become almost unintelligible. He fancied himself at home, where he doubtless had some love, whose eidolon was hovering about his mental vision. There was a beautiful girl bending over him, whom he had never seen until the fever had dethroned his reason. He managed to hold her hand with his failing grasp, and muttered his old vows to her as though she filled the place of the absent one, and talked to her of ancient trysting places, of rides and amusements, until the lady herself was fain to weep for the poor mistaken boy. I never now pick up the book without turning instinctively to what to me is the most touching poem in the language.

Remembrance adds to the value of every book. There is a personal recollection that makes a volume valuable to you or me, for certain currents of thought into which it draws us. There is a gential memory that makes certain authors grow with the race to which they belong. Homer was a nobler man in the days of Plato: he expressed more, was more reaching in his ideas, and absorbed more of Grecian intellect than when his poor personality was sneered to death by the poor fishers' boys, or when first the rude rhapsodies were chaunted at festivals. Shakspeare is a higher creation to-day than when his plays were brought out on his own imperfect stage. Goethe will increase in stature as long as there is a single-hearted German to read him; and that famous sentiment of Terence, so regularly applauded in Rome, becomes more sublime as each new generation of schoolboys learns to scan it. The elegy of the Latin poet upon the death of his mistress' sparrow grows more touching as the lovers of every age sigh in sympathy over the poor little bird. Every man who has flung out a passionate expression of his humanity wins another hold on the rock of mortal life, by reason of the tenacity of his part of the world's memory.

There is one Book which has, century by century, become a better member of the literary assemblage. Here, let me forewarn suspicious orthodoxy that I have no irreverent intentions. The Bible has grown in inspiration, in pathos, and in sublimity with the age. You, my infidel friends, are much mistaken, if you imagine that Colenso, or a faculty of mathematicians as good or better than that troublesome bishop, can break the force of the book. We are indifferent to figures. Let the facts of calculation be what they may, the story of Rebecca, the strife of Jacob, the affection of Ruth, the love of Jonathan for David, and the apologue of the man of Uz, have been subjects too long for admiration and reverence on the part of the world of civilization to be dethroned by a mere rebellion of insurgent arithmetical problems. There is a divinity now in the volume, invited there by the faith of ages, which can never be evicted. The personal, the gential, and the universal memory of humanity has grown about every text, until not one can be wrenched away. There is one psalm which I have heard read by one who opened to it whenever she was in trouble. It commences: "Bless the Lord, O my soul: and all that is within me bless his holy name." I would not hesitate in granting my faith to everything, lest I should lose my right to a blind reverence for that one chapter.

DIONYSIUS VAGO.

"BUMMER'S" ELEGY.—"Bummer," whilom companion of "Lazarus," whose joint exploits, in the flesh, have been so long a solace to chronicler and reporter, even in death is not forgotten. Jump and "Trem" have, with pen and pencil, apotheosized the defunct canine, and their combined effort, on a letter sheet, is the latest sensation.

A NUMBER of quartz claims have been taken up near Copperopolis, some of which are considered quite valuable. They are large and well defined.

THE BALLAD OF MR. COOKE.

A LEGEND OF THE CLIFF HOUSE.

WHERE the sturdy ocean breeze,
Drives the spray of roaring seas
That the Cliff House balconies
Overlook:
There, in spite of rain that balked,
With his sandals duly chalked,
Once upon a tight-rope walked
Mr. Cooke.

But the Jester's lightsome mien,
And his spangles and his sheen,
All had vanished, when the scene
He forsook;
Yet in some delusive hope—
In some vague desire to cope—
One still came to view the rope
Walked by Cooke.

* * * * * *

Amid Beauty's bright array,
On that strange eventful day—
Partly hidden from the spray—
In a nook,
Stood Florinda Vere de Vere,
Who, with wind-dishevelled hair
And a rapt, distracted air,
Gazed on Cooke.

Then she turned and quickly cried
To her lover at her side,
While her form with Love and Pride
Wildly shook:
"Clifford Snook! O hear me now—
Here I break each plighted vow!
There 's but one to whom I bow,
And that's Cooke!"

Haughtily that young man spoke:
"I descend from noble folk—
'Seven Oaks' and then 'Se'mnoak,'
Lastly, Snook,
Is the way my name I trace;
Shall a youth of noble race,
In affairs of Love give place
To a Cooke?"

"Clifford Snook! I know thy claim
To that lineage and name,
And I think I've read the same
In Horne Tooke;
But I swear, by all divine,
Never, never to be thine
'Till thou canst upon yon line
Walk like Cooke."

Though to that gymnastic feat
He no closer might compete
Than to strike a balance sheet
In a book,
Yet thenceforward, from that day
He his figure would display
In some wild athlethic way,
After Cooke.

On some household eminence,
On a clothes-line or a fence,
Over ditches, drains and thence
O'er a brook;
He, by high ambition led,
Ever walked and balanced,
Till the people wondering said:
"How like Cooke!"

Step by step did he proceed,
Nerved by valor—not by greed—
And at last the crowning deed
Undertook.
Misty was the midnight air,
And the Cliff was bleak and bare,
When he came, to do and dare,
Just like Cooke.

Through the darkness, o'er the flow,
Stretched the line where he should go
Straight across as flies the crow
Or the rook:
One wild glance around he cast,
Then he faced the ocean blast—
And he strode the cable, last
Touched by Cooke.

Vainly roared the angry seas;
Vainly blew the ocean breeze;
But, alas! the walker's knees
Had a crook;
And before he reached the Rock,
Did they both together knock,
And he stumbled with a shock—
Unlike Cooke!

Downward dropping in the dark—
Like an arrow to its mark,
Or a fish-pole when a shark
Bites the hook—
Dropped the pole he could not save;
Dropped the walker; and the wave
Swift engulfed the rival, brave,
Of J. Cooke!

Came a roar across the sea,
Of sea lions in their glee,
In a tongue remarkably
Like Chinnook;
And the maddened sea-gull seemed
Still to utter, as he screamed:
"Perish thus the wretch who deemed Himself Cooke!"

But, on misty moonlit nights,
Comes a skeleton in tights;
Walks once more the giddy heights
He mistook:
And, unseen to mortal eyes—
Purged of grosser earthly ties—
Now at last, in spirit guise,
Outdoes Cooke.

* * * * * *

Still the sturdy ocean breeze
Sweeps the spray of roaring seas
Where the Cliff House balconies
Overlook;
And the maidens, in their prime,
Reading of this mournful rhyme,
Weep, where in the olden time,
Walked J. Cooke.

BRET.

CALIFORNIA MINING BUREAU ASSOCIATION.—We have received a copy of the Constitution and By-Laws of this association, whose objects, as stated in an introductory article, are to assist in developing the mineral resources of the State, furnish remunerative employment to laboring men, and reduce oppressive taxes by "largely increasing the amount of taxable property." They propose to seek and procure all available information concerning the mineral resources of every country in the State:

"This will embrace all the mines of every description which are being worked, with every particular concerning them that can be obtained; all those which have suspended operations for want of means, of success, or whatever cause, all those which are held by parties unable to develop them, all promising ledges discovered, and placer mines lying unworked for the want of water or other causes. The Petroleum interests of the State will also receive the attention of the Association. Great care will be taken that the information obtained shall be reliable. This will be properly arranged and recorded in the office of the Society, and will be the property of its members; and, from time to time, such facts as may be of general interest, will be given to the public through the press. It is believed that in this way inealculable good can be done. Our immense resources will thus become known both at home and abroad. The inviting opportunities on every hand for profitable investment, must inevitably attract capital and enterprise. The State has sustained immeasurable injury from sales of mines upon fraudulent representations, by unscrupulous speculators. These swindles have been the means of destroying, in a measure, the confidence of capitalists in the value of our mines and in our integrity as a people. The Association will put it out of the power of these public pests to succeed in their attempt at imposition, by furnishing reliable information to those seeking investments. At the same time the value of really meritorious mines, instead of being overlooked, as has been too often the case heretofore, will become known. The distrust now felt will thus be removed as soon as the reliable character of the Association becomes established, and capitalists will first seek information from it before investing."

A recommendation signed by many capitalists, is incorporated in the pamphlet.

THE NOBLE SAVAGE.

To come to the point at once, I beg to say that I have not the least belief in the Noble Savage. I consider him a prodigious nuisance, and an enormous superstition. His calling rum fire-water, and me a pale-face, wholly fail to reconcile me to him. I don't care what he calls me. I call him a savage, and I call a savage a something highly desirable to be civilized off the face of the earth. I think a mere gent (which I take to be the lowest form of civilization) better than a howling, whistling, clucking, stamping, jumping, tearing savage. It is all one to me, whether he sticks a fishbone through his visage, or bits of trees through the lobes of his ears, or birds' feathers in his head; whether he flattens his hair between two boards, or spreads his nose over the breadth of his face, or drags his lower lip down by great weights, or blackens his teeth, or knocks them out, or paints one cheek red and the other blue, or tattoos himself, or oils himself, or rubs his body with fat, or crimps it with knives. Yielding to whichsoever of these agreeable eccentricities, he is a savage—cruel, false, thievish, murderous; addicted more or less to grease, entrails, and beastly customs; a wild animal with the questionable gift of boasting; a conceited, tiresome, bloodthirsty, monotonous humbug.

Yet it is extraordinary to observe how some people will talk about him, as they talk about the good old times; how they will regret his disappearance, in the course of this world's development, from such and such lands where his absence is a blessed relief and an indispensable preparation for the sowing of the very first seeds of any influence that can exalt humanity; how, even with the evidence of himself before them, they will either be determined to believe, or will suffer themselves to be persuaded into believing, that he is something which their five senses tell them he is not.

There was Mr. Catlin, some few years ago, with his Ojibbeway Indians. Mr. Catlin was an energetic earnest man, who had lived among more tribes of Indians than I need reckon up here, and who had written a picturesque and glowing book about them. With his party of Indians squatting and spitting on the table before him, or dancing their miserable jigs after their own dreary manner, he called, in all good faith, upon his civilized audience to take notice of their symmetry and grace, their perfect limbs, and the exquisite expression of their pantomime; and his civilized audience, in all good faith, complied and admired. Whereas, as mere animals, they were wretched creatures, very low in the scale and very poorly formed; and as men and women possessing any power of truthful dramatic expression by means of action, they were no better than the chorus at an Italian Opera in England—and would have been worse if such a thing were possible.

Mine are no new views of the noble savage. The greatest writers on natural history found him out long ago. Buffon knew what he was, and showed why he is the sulky tyrant that he is to women, and how it happens (Heaven be praised!) that his race is spare in numbers. For evidence of the quality of his moral nature, pass himself for a moment and refer to his "faithful dog." Has he ever improved a dog, or attached a dog, since his nobility first ran wild in woods, and was brought down (at a very long shot) by Pope? Or does the animal that is the friend of man, always degenerate in his low society?

It is not the miserable nature of the new savage that is the new thing; it is the whimpering over him with maudlin admiration, and the affecting to regret him, and the drawing of any comparison of advantage between the blemishes of civilization and the tenor of his swinish life. There may have been a change now and then in those diseased absurdities, but there is none in him.

Think of the Bushmen. Think of the two men and the two women who were exhibited about England for some years. Are the majority of persons—who remember the horrid little leader of that party in his festering bundles of hides, with his filth and his antipathy to water, and his straddled legs, and his odious eyes shaded by his brutal hand, and his cry of "Qu-u-u-n-aaa!" (Bosjesman for something desperately insulting I have no doubt)—conscious of an affectionate yearning towards that noble savage, or is it idiosyncratic in me to abhor, detest, abominate, and abjure him? I have no reserve on this subject, and will frankly state that, setting aside that stage of the entertainment when he counterfeited the death of some creature he had shot, by laying his head on his hand and shaking his left leg—at which time I think it would have been justifiable homicide to slay him—I have never seen that group sleeping, smoking, and expectorating round their brazier, but I have sincerely desired that something might happen to the charcoal smouldering therein, which would cause the immediate suffocation of the whole of the noble strangers.

A party of Zulu Kaffirs have been exhibited at St. George's Gallery, Hyde Park Corner, London. These noble savages are represented in an agreeable manner; they are seen in an elegant theatre, fitted with appropriate scenery of great beauty, and they are described in a very sensible and unpretending lecture, delivered with a modesty which is quite a pattern to all similar exponents. Though extremely ugly, they are much better shaped than such of their predecessors as I have referred to; and they are rather picturesque to the eye, though far from odoriferous to the nose. What a visitor, left to his own interpretings and imaginings, might suppose these noblemen to be about, when they give vent to that pantomimic expression which is quite settled to be the natural gift of the noble savage, I cannot possibly conceive; for it is so much too luminous for my personal civilization, that it conveys no idea to my mind beyond a general stamping, ramping, and raving, remarkable (as everything in savage life is) for its dire uniformity. But let us—with the interpreter's assistance, of which I for one stand so much in need—see what the noble savage does in Zulu Kaffirland.

The noble savage sets a king to reign over him, to whom he submits his life and limbs without a murmur or question, and whose whole life is passed chin deep in a lake of blood; but who, after killing incessantly, is in his turn killed by his relations and friends, the moment a gray hair appears on his head. All the noble savage's wars with his fellow savages (and he takes no pleasure in anything else) are wars of extermination—which is the best thing I know of him, and the most comfortable to my mind when I look at him. He has no moral feelings of any kind, sort, or description; and all his "mission" may be summed up as simply diabolical.

The ceremonies with which he faintly diversifies his life are, of course, of a kindred nature. If he wants a wife, he appears before the kennel of the gentleman whom he has selected for his father-in-law, attended by a party of male friends of a very strong flavor, who screech and whistle and stamp an offer of so many cows for the young lady's hand. The chosen father-in-law—also supported by a high-flavored party of male friends—screeches, whistles and yells (being seated on the ground, he can't stamp) that there never was such a daughter in the market as his daughter, and that he must have six more cows. The son-in-law and his select circle of backers screech, whistle, stamp, and yell in reply that they will give three more cows. The father-in-law (an old deluder, overpaid at the beginning, accepts four, and rises to bind the bargain. The whole party, the young lady included, then falling into epileptic convulsions, and screeching, whistling, stamping, and yelling together—and nobody taking any notice of the young lady (whose charms are not to be thought of without a shudder)—the noble savage is considered married, and his friends make demoniacal leaps at him by way of congratulation.

When the noble savage finds himself a little unwell, and mentions the circumstance to his friends, it is immediately perceived that he is under the influence of witchcraft. A learned personage, called an Imyanger or Witch Doctor, is immediately sent for to Nooker the Umtargartie, or smell out the witch. The male inhabitants of the kraal being seated on the ground, the learned doctor, got up like a grizzly bear, appears, and administers a dance of a most terrific nature, during the exhibition of which remedy he incessantly gnashes his teeth, and howls: "I am the original physician to Nooker the Umtargartie. Yow yow yow! No connexion with any other establishment. Till till till! All other Umtargarties are feigned Umtargarties, Boroo Boroo! but I perceive here a genuine and real Umtargartie, Hoosh Hoosh Hoosh! in whose blood I, the original Imyangerand Nookerer, Blzzerum Boo! will wash these bear's claws of mine. O yow yow yow!" All this time the learned physician is looking out among the attentive faces for some unfortunate man who owes him a cow, or who has given him any small offence, or against whom, without offence, he has conceived a spite. Him he never fails to Nooker as the Umtargartie, and he is instantly killed. In the absence of such an individual, the usual practice is to Nooker the quietest and most gentlemanly person in the company. But the Nookering is invariably followed on the spot by the butchering.

Some of the noble savages in whom Mr. Catlin was so strongly interested, and the diminution of whose numbers, by rum and small-pox, greatly affected him, had a custom not unlike this, though much more appalling and disgusting in its odious details.

The women being at work in the fields, hoeing the Indian corn, and the noble savage being asleep in the shade, the chief has sometimes the condescension to come forth, and lighten the labor by looking at it. On these occasions he seats himself in his own savage chair, and is attended by his shield-bearer: who holds over his head a shield of cowhide—in shape like an immense muscle shell—fearfully and wonderfully, after the manner of a theatrical supernumerary. But lest the great man should forget his greatness in the contemplation of the humble works of agriculture, there suddenly rushes in a poet, retained for the purpose, called a Praiser. This literary gentleman wears a leopard's head over his own, and a dress of tigers' tail; he has the appearance of having come expressly on his hind legs from the Zoological Gardens; and he incontinently strikes up the chief's praises, plunging and tearing all the while. There is a frantic wickedness in this brute's manner of worrying the air, and gnashing out "Oh what a delightful chief he is! O what a delicious quantity of blood he sheds! O how majestically he laps it up! O how charmingly cruel he is! O how he tears the flesh of his enemies and crunches the bones! O how like the tiger and the leopard and the wolf and the bear he is! O, row row row row, how fond I am of him!"—which might tempt the Society of Friends to charge at a hand-gallop into the Swartz-Kop location and exterminate the whole kraal.

When war is afoot among the noble savages—which is always—the chief holds a council to ascertain whether it is the opinion of his brothers and friends in general that the enemy shall be exterminated. On this occasion, after the performance of an Umsebenza, or war song—which is exactly like all the other songs—the chief makes a speech to his brothers and friends, arranged in single file. No particular order is observed during the delivery of this address, but every gentleman who finds himself excited by the subject, instead of crying "Hear, hear!" as is the custom with us, darts from the rank and tramples out the life, or crushes the skull, or mashes the face, or scoops out the eyes, or breaks the limbs, or performs a whirlwind of atrocities on the body, of an imaginary enemy. Several gentlemen becoming thus excited at once, and pounding away without the least regard to the orator, that illustrious person is rather in the position of an orator in an Irish House of Commons.

In all these ceremonies the noble savage holds forth to the utmost possible extent about himself; from which (to turn him to some civilized account) we may learn, I think, that as egotism is one of the most offensive and contemptible littlenesses a civilized man can exhibit, so it is really incompatible with the interchange of ideas; inasmuch as if we all talked about ourselves we should soon have no listeners, and must be all yelling and screeching at once on our own separate accounts: making society hideous. It is my opinion that if we retained in us anything of the noble savage, we could not get rid of it too soon. But the fact is clearly otherwise. Upon the wife and dowry question, substituting coin for cows, we have assuredly nothing of the Zulu Kaffir left. The endurance of despotism is one great distinguishing mark of a savage always. The improving world has quite got the better of that too. In like manner, Paris is a civilized city, and we shall never hear, and never have heard in these later days (of course) of the Praiser there. * * * *

To conclude as I began. My position is, that if we have anything to learn from the Noble Savage, it is what to avoid. His virtues are a fable; his happiness is a delusion; his nobility, nonsense. We have no greater justification for being cruel to the miserable object than for being cruel to a William Shakspeare or an Isaac Newton; but he passes away before an immeasurably better and higher power than ever ran wild in any earthly woods, and the world will be all the better when his place knows him no more.

Subjects for Our Artists.—Puck, thinking that the artists of San Francisco may be in want of ideas for subjects, begs to suggest the following:

G. J. Denny—"Strong Tide, July 1st, 1865." We would recommend this talented marine painter to produce, as a companion picture to this, "The Buoy."

Virgil Williams—"The Board of the Mercury; a companion picture to The Ford, Yo-semite Valley."

S. M. Brookes—"Illicit Still Life, or The Potheen Manufacturers."

Thomas Hill—"The First Smile; a companion picture to Good Morning."

Charles Nahl—"The Poles Attacked by Indians; a Scene on the Plains."

P. Loomis—"The Wood Cutter."

Mezzara—"A Jolly Bust."

A. K. Kipps—"Scriptural Paintings; Landscapes representing the Hills' skips."

F. A. Butman—"The Fall of the Leaf; a Dinner-Table Sketch."

S. W. Shaw—"A Woman."

E. W. Perry Jr.—"Havana Weeds; a companion picture to California Wild Flowers."

Fortunato Arriola—"The Fat Boy."

L. F. Ireland—"Drawing of a Fenian, after Hanging."

A Startling Announcement.—A few days ago, the inhabitants of a country town were filled with conjecture at the following sign, painted in large capitals on the front of a house recently fitted up and repaired:

"Mrs. Brown, Dealer in all sorts of Ladies'

All was consternation. Inquiry was instantly set on foot as to who this Mrs. Brown might be. But no one could tell. Great anxiety prevailed as to the proclamation of the new establishment; and for two whole days all was surmise and consultation. On the third morning, behold! the mystery was unravelled. The house-painter, who had, it seems, been suddenly attacked with a fit of sickness, returned to finish his work, and concluded by adding,

"And Gentlemen's Wearing Apparel."

Squeaking Boots not Admissable.—The following notice is affixed to the Wesleyan chapel in Chiseldom: "Notice is hereby given, that all persons who wear squeaking boots are requested not to be behind time (ten minutes) of the commencement of divine service on Sundays, to the annoyance of the congregation."

HUNT'S IMPROVED WIND-MILL.

THIS WIND-MILL IS RAPIDly taking the place of all other Mills on the Pacific Coast. These Mills are so simple in their construction that, when once built, they can be put in order by almost any person; and when once in order they will run for years without repairs.

Prices, from $50 to $1,000.

ROUND AND SQUARE WATER TANKS BUILT TO ORDER.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

INTERIOR ITEMS.

The Nevada Transcript says it is thonght that about four hundred persons will winter at Summit City. The California Quartz Mill, said to be the finest in the county, will be ready to start in about two weeks. Several other mills are in course of erection, and will soon be ready to start, while a large number of sites have been selected for the erection of mills early next summer. The South Yuba Canal Company are building a substantial dam across the lower end of Fordyce Valley. The work is under the superintendence of Dan Rich, under whose supervision the Yuba dam was built. The latter is said to be the finest piece of work in the State. At the lower end of Fordyce Valley, the Old Man Mountain on one side and the Old Woman on the other, almost touch each other, leaving only a gap wide enough for the waters of the river to pass. This gap closed, and the valley will be one of the largest and best in the world. Nature has built the reservoir, and the South Yuba Company have already commenced to shut the gate. Next spring the whole valley will form a beautiful lake, of an average depth of fifteen or twenty feet.

The Territorial Enterprise of the 3d instant says that a lady who arrived in Virginia from Egan Cañon, states that on Saturday night, Oct. 28th, a large force of Pi-Ute Indians surrounded Ione City, Nye county, Nevada, driving all the inhabitants into one of the principal buildings of the place, when a parley ensued. The Indians stated that they did not wish to murder the inhabitants of the town, but that they were in a destitute and starving condition, and they must have the means of procuring food, or they would sack the town. They demanded two hundred dollars, and the people of the place, not being in a position to defend themselves, acceded to to their demand and paid them the sum asked, when the Indians went away without further molesting them. The lady further states that the news reached Austin while she was there, that two men, prospectors, had been murdered in the edge of Death Valley, in San Antonio District, by Indians. S. E. Greeley, with a large party of citizens, intended starting the next day (Sunday) for the purpose of recovering their bodies. The Indians appear to be in a desperate and starving condition. This region of country is just on the line between the Shoshones and Pi-Utes, and it is hard to say which tribe it was that committed the above hostile acts, but at Austin the Pi-Utes are blamed.

On the arrival of the train from Shingle Springs and Folsom, on Monday, says the Union of the 8th inst., a woman arrived whose conduct at the cars excited some little attention from the hackmen and runners who were on hand soliciting custom. She stated to the crowd that if she could see "an honest face" among those present she would go with the individual who owned it. On looking around carefully, she picked out Ned Reed, of the What Cheer House, as the individual who "filled the bill," and at once started off with him down the street. He took her to the parlor of the What Cheer House, and proceeded about his business, but she became excited at his absence, and he had to be sent for again before she became pacified. During the day and night she became more violent, and yesterday she was pronounced insane by the examining physician. She will probably be sent to Stockton to-day. The woman gave her name as Miss Ellen Higgins. It is not known whether she came from Shingle Springs, Placerville, Virginia City, or any intermediate point.

By Whittler and Jenks, says the Yreka Union, just in from Surprise Valley, we learn that on the morning of the earthquake at San Francisco, Goose Lake, situated a short distance this side of the summit of the Nevada range of mountains, near the northern line of California, was covered with a great number of water spouts, rising at the same time and at short distances from each other over the whole surface of the lake, presenting much the appearance of an immense school of whales "blowing." The fact, with its relation—the earthquake, then unknown to Whittler and Jenks—extends the field of investigation to the scientific.

In mentioning the mills which are being constructed at a foundry in Sonora, the Herald says: A mill was sent from there this week, to be used at Stockton in the copper separating process. There are now in process of construction three mills—one of twenty stamps, which is nearly finished; another of ten stamps, which is partly completed, and one of five stamps, just commenced—all intended for different mines in our county.

The Marysville Express, of November 6th, states that Harry I. Thornton, formerly State Senator from Sierra county, but now a paroled prisoner from the Confederate service, reached Marysville on the 27th, and left Saturday morning for Austin, Nevada, where he proposes practicing law.

The Calaveras county seat case, on trial at Sacramento last week, resulted in favor of San Andreas. The case now goes to the Supreme Court as a final resort.

A CRAZY HUMBUG.

GEORGE JONES, ALIAS "THE COUNT JOANNES," MAKES AN ASS OF HIMSELF AND A FOOL OF GENERAL LEE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 3d.—Midnight.

I hasten to place before your readers—i. e. the public—the following correspondence; and even my enemies should cease to envy and malign, when, as a forgiving foe, I can point to so bright a page in my biography as is unfolded by the subjoined autograph letter from General Robert E. Lee, in accepting my proffered legal services against the charge of alleged treason. His remarks in regard to the assassination of President Lincoln will be received throughout the country with interest and belief—and in aid of the Christian policy of reconstruction by President Johnson.

That which I allude to in the latter portion of my subjoined response in reference to my interviews with the Secretary of War and Attorney General, will be transmitted either to-morrow or next day for the public, forming another of my letters from Washington—following this correspondence, and as adjunct to it. Respectfully, THE COUNT JOANNES.

CITY OF NEW YORK, N. Y., August 14, 1865.

To General Robert E. Lee, of Virginia—General: I herewith inclose a copy of my public letter to his Excellency the President of the United States, published in the New York News. It is written in patriotic loyalty and knowledge of the laws.

In the latter part I honestly proffer my legal services (gratuitously of course) to defend you and your late chief from the alleged charge of treason as preferred by indictment against each of you at Norfolk and in the District of Columbia.

My legal argument in the letter to the President is regarded here, by learned persons of different politics, as being unanswerable and conclusive upon the subject matter contemplated.

In 1840, I received, in the city of Richmond, Va., the gold medal for my public oration in that capital upon the National Independence (July 4, 1840.) My sentiments of patriotism then enunciated by me still abide, and give me authority to renew the offer of my legal services, as a champion of the Constitution in its full integrity, and in which, politically, in the words of St. Paul, "We live, and move, and have our being." In the forensic sense I write this letter, and shall rejoice to know, by your response, that the Presidential letter and this to yourself are duly appreciated by you, and my legal services accepted, should they be required, or in other words, should you be arraigned on the charge of treason.

My hearted detestation of the murder of the late President Lincoln (though by a monomaniac) does, I am sure, meet the perfect sympathy of every gentleman in the South. A letter from you to that effect, and which I could publish in our chief journals, would have a good result to soften harsh asperities in the North, and thus smooth the way to reconciliation. Soliciting your earliest reply.

Yours respectfully, GEORGE, THE COUNT JOANNES.

ANSWER BY GENERAL LEE.

NEAR CARTERSVILLE Va., Sept. 4, 1865.

Sir: I received, a few days since, your communication of the 14th ultimo, transmitting a copy of your published letter to the President of the United States.

Your arguments and conclusions are duly appreciated, and I am exceedingly obliged to you for the offer of your legal services—to defend me against the charge of treason. Should they become necessary, they will be gratefully accepted. In your letter to me, you do the people of the South but simple justice, in believing that they heartily concur with you in your opinion (and "hearted detestation") in regard to the assassination of the late President Lincoln. It is a crime previously unknown to this country, and one which must be deprecated by every American. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant, ROBERT E. LEE.

To George, the Count Joannes, City of N. Y.

RESPONSE.

WASHINGTON D. C., October 2, 1865.

General: Your letter of the 4th ult., postmarked Richmond Va., on the 13th, owing to my temporary absence from New York, in this city, on a mission of peace and reconciliation, has only reached me this evening (from an error in transmission,) and I hasten to acknowledge its receipt.

You have given me true cause for intellectual pride by accepting my legal services to defend General Robert E. Lee, of Virginia, against the charge of treason, and that decision, following your attentive perusal of my public letter to the President of the United States upon the theme of "What is Treason," etc.

Free as a mountain eagle, and as aspiring for all honorable and sunlight distinctions, and which I have received in Europe and America, yet I held them as feathers in the scale of honor when compared to the greater distinction which you have bestowed upon me and my intellect; and to have achieved which amply repays me for my many years of laborious practical studies of the Constitution and laws of this country, and of all other nations, ancient and modern.

The spirits of Daniel Webster and Henry Wheaton, my former tutors and friends, are at this moment invoked by me in all their intellectual grandeur and patriotism, to sustain me in my loyal duty and accepted services.

And this extends, also, to the captive in Fortress Monroe, in whose behalf, within the last forty-eight hours, I have had two courteous interviews with the Hon. the Secretary of War, and one of deep interest with the Attorney General, followed by a petition to the President for the action of His Excellency and his Cabinet Council of Administration, the Secretary of War admitting that my loyalty and patriotism were unquestionable.

I could enlarge upon these interviews, but I reserve a description of them for my public letter to the same journal as contained my address to the President.

I have the honor, General, to remain your fellow citizen.

Truly and respectfully, GEORGE, THE COUNT JOHANNES.

To General Robert E. Lee, Virginia.

EXIT "BUMMER."—As we have devoted but little space to an event which has filled our local contemporaries with as much sorrow (judging from the columns of lamentation it has called forth) as would the decease of the best biped in the city, we give "Mark Twain's" view of the occurrence, as recorded in the ENTERPRISE of the 8th. Strangely enough, Mark, who can't stand the "ballad infliction," seems to think there has not been quite enough "Bummer:"

"The old vagrant 'Bummer' is really dead at last; and although he was always more respected than his obsequious vassal, the dog 'Lazarus,' his exit has not made half as much stir in the newspaper world as signalised the departure of the latter. I think it is because he died a natural death: died with friends around him to smooth his pillow and wipe the death-damps from his brow, and receive his last words of love and resignation; because he died full of years, and honor, and disease, and fleas. He was permitted to die a natural death, as I have said, but poor Lazarus 'died with his boots on'—which is to say, he lost his life by violence; he gave up the ghost mysteriously, at dead of night, with none to cheer his last moments or soothe his dying pains. So the murdered dog was canonized in the newspapers, his shortcomings excused, and his virtues heralded to the world; but his superior, parting with his life in the fullness of time, and in the due course of nature, sinks as quietly as might the mangiest cur among us. Well, let him go. In earlier days he was courted and caressed; but latterly he had lost his comeliness—his dignity had given place to a want of self-respect, which allowed him to practice mean deceptions to regain for a moment that sympathy and notice which had become necessary to his very existence, and it was evident to all that the dog had had his day: his great popularity was gone forever. In fact, Bummer should have died sooner: there was a time when his death would have left a lasting legacy of fame to his name. Now, however, he will be forgotten in a few days. Bummer's skin is to be stuffed and placed with that of Lazarus."

TO REMOVE A "STY" FROM THE EYELID.—The sty is strictly only a little boil, which projects from the eyelid. It is of a dark red color, much inflamed, and occasionally a great deal more painful than might be expected, considering its small size. It usually disappears of itself after a little time, especially if some purgative medicine be taken. If the sty should be very painful and inflamed, a small warm poultice of linseed meal or bread and milk must be laid over it, and renewed every five or six hours, and the bowels freely acted upon by a purgative draught, such as the following: Take of Epsom salts, half an ounce; best manna, two drachms; infusion of senna, six drachms; tincture of senna, two drachms: spearmint water, one ounce; distilled water, two ounces. Mix, and take three, four or five tablespoonsful. When the sty appears ripe, an opening should be made into it with the point of a large needle, and afterwards a little of the following ointment may be smeared over it once or twice a day. Ointment: Take of spermaceti, six drachms; white wax, ten drachms; olive oil, three ounces. Mix them together over a slow fire, and stir them constantly until they are cold.

HOW DIFFERENT NATIONS EAT.—The Maldavian islanders eat alone. They retire into the most obscure parts of their houses, and then draw down the cloths that serve as blinds to their windows, that they may eat unobserved. On the contrary, the islanders of the Philippines are remarkably sociable. Whenever one of them finds himself without a companion to share his meal, he runs till he meets with one, and however keen his appetite may be, he ventures not to satisfy it without a guest. The tables of the rich Chinese shine with a beautiful varnish, and are covered with silk carpets very elegantly worked. They do not make use of plate, knives, or forks; every guest has two little ivory or ebony sticks, which he handles very adroitly. A Kamschatkan kneels before his guest; he cuts an enormous slice from a sea-calf; he crams it entire into the mouth of his friend.

A MAN by the name of Gillerland was instantly killed, and another one severely wounded by a cave in the Star Spangled Banner claims on the 28th ult., says the Nevada Transcript. The Gazette says the name of the man killed was S. R. Stevens, and the other, Edwin O'Connor.

CALEB LYON, of Lyonsdale, Governor (re-appointed) of Idaho, arrived at Salt Lake Oct. 28th, en route to his Territory, to re-enter on his official labors as Governor and Superintendent of Indian Affairs.

CONGRESS HALL.—On Bush street, adjoining the Russ House, a new hall, bearing the above title, has been opened, devoted to Terpsichore; it is under the management of Mr. and Mrs. Cogill. The main hall is 60 by 66 feet, well constructed, has better acoustic properties than any hall in the city, and is connected with a large dining hall, anti] rooms, etc. Congress Hall can be rented for lectures, balls, or private parties when not occupied by the assemblies. Apply to Mr. Cogill, on the premises.

IN WOMAN HOW EXCELLENT, and much to be admired, is a fragrant purity and complexion of the skin! What is more unsightly than a greasy, rough, sallow, bad complexion? Davidson's Circassian Bloom should be on every toilet of fashion and beauty.

Mosgrove & Blakely's new Dry Goods Store is in Colton's building, 222 Third street, between Howard and Tehama. Their stock consists in part of the following goods, all of which will be found to be of the very best materials, and at prices which must command the notice of purchasers:

Dress Goods—A large assortment tastefully selected. Their Empress Cloths, Poplins, Melanges, Chenes, and particularly that rich new fabric, "Moonlight on the Lake," cannot be surpassed for Ladies' Fall and Winter Suits.

Hoyle's genuine English Calicoes.

Irish Linen Goods—All from the celebrated manufacturers, Richardson Sons & Owden, Belfast.

Mission and Eastern Blankets and Flannels.

Ladies and Gents' Furnishing Goods; and a large assortment of all goods usually kept by a first class Dry Goods Store.

AN INTERESTING LETTER.

Very few persons, even among physicians, would have been willing upon any terms to have been in the condition of the writer of the following letter on the 14th of February last. I will anticipate somewhat his report of the facts, by saying that on the 15th August, 1865, he made me a visit, "the very picture of health." Time, which tries and proves all things, has sufficiently tested this case, and shown that neither relapse or collapse having followed, the cure is perfect, and can be cited among the scores of similar cases, the result of my improved mode of treating disease without medicine.

G. M. BOURNE,
Water Cure Physician,
No. 10, Masonic Temple, Post street.
August 27, 1865.

Sacramento, April 30, 1865.

Dr. G. M. Bourne—Dear Sir: It is with pleasure and satisfaction that I now let you know of my good health. Looking back on what I have passed through, it seems as if I was lifted from the grave, and I think it my duty to acknowledge to you and the world the benefit I derived from water treatment as administered by you in your celebrated baths. It was in August, 1864, when disease developed itself with a severe cough. I then took medicines, getting worse, with chills, fevers, loss of strength, and was pronounced consumptive. This set me to thinking, and finally I determined to leave my business and go to the Sandwich Islands, having been informed that I could not be cured here. I went to San Francisco, and while waiting for a ship, called upon Dr. Bourne, who stated that a trip to the Sandwich Islands would probably result disastrously, was wholly unnecessary, as I could then be speedily cured at his establishment. I placed myself under his treatment, and in one week was so much improved that I thought I could risk returning home and to my duty as Engineer on the Central Pacific Railroad. The doctor objected; but I thought I knew better, and returned to my duty. In about two weeks my cough returned, and I kept getting worse, and, contrary to Dr. Bourne's injunction never to take medicine again, committed that folly, and soon was so completely run down that I could scarcely walk; so, as a last resort, I concluded once more to try the Water Cure. I went to San Francisco—few of my friends expected me to return; in fact, I thought my return doubtful. On arriving at Dr. Bourne's establishment (February 14, 1865,) I was not able to get into the bath without assistance, but in a few days I began to gain. I remained with him only six weeks, when I left, "a wiser and a better man," without the aid of medicine. I have now been at work several weeks, and find that I am gaining every day, and at present bid fair to be stouter than ever before. Persons visiting the Doctor's establishment will find it just what it should be, in both Ladies' and Gentlemen's Departments, and I cannot say too much in praise of the Doctor's kind attention to his patients.

This letter I write for the benefit of the afflicted, to be used as the Doctor decides, and should it be the means of directing any one to his care and treatment who (as they assuredly will) find relief, I will be paid for my trouble. Your obedient servant,

JAMES CAMPBELL,
Engineer Central Pacific Railroad.

San Francisco, August 25, 1865.

Advised by the undersigned, Mr. James Campbell, of the Central Pacific Railroad (who was then in a most deplorable state of ill health,) placed himself under the care of Dr. Bourne, the Water Cure Physician. Some six months or more afterward he visited this city, when I accidentally met him at Dr. Bourne's establishment, and, I am happy to say, restored to the enjoyment of good health and in fine spirits. JOHN SULLIVAN.

☞ Dr. Boarne treats all diseases of the throat, chest, and lungs—which includes diptheria, bronchitis, incipient consumption, pleurisy, croup, etc.—with the greatest success. Great relief is afforded in advanced stages of consumption. Rheumatism, paralysis, neuralgia, fever and ague, dropsy, etc., etc., are also cured quickly, pleasantly, and economically. No medicine whatever.

Visit Haskell's Mammoth Tea Store, and examine the splendid display of choicest Teas, Wines and Groceries, now selling at greatly reduced prices, at Wholesale and Retail.

Store fronts on Market and Sutter streets, below the Market House. Open every evening until seven o'clock, and on Saturdays until ten P. M

Dentist Work.—Messrs. Knowles & Clark have an improved method of combining their gold and valcanite material in the manufacture of dentistry, which renders the work superior in finish and durability. The samples of their handiwork on exhibition at the late Fair were much admired, and we observe that they were awarded a special premium silver medal.—Mining and Scientific Press.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

Dr. Wm. K. Doherty's Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

A TRUE STORY.

DEDICATED TO THE SICK.

There dwelt in Sacramento a pale, bilious mechanic,
His muscles were strengthless, his blood it was chill;
And the wife of his bosom believed, in her panic,
The husband she worshipped was hopelessly ill.
Seeking daily for help, in her wifely devotion,
All vainly she tried pill, powder and potion—
Till at last, when a prey to grief's wildest emotion,
Of HOSTETTER'S BITTERS she heard from a friend.

She purchased the cordial, half hoping, half fearing,
A prayer on her lip and a tear in her eye;
And taking his hand, with words kindly and cheering,
Besought him the tonic for her sake to try.
As he drank, a new life through his system seemed stealing,
Each following draft did its mission of healing,
Until, strong in health and most grateful in feeling,
He told the "true story" here twined into song.

It is also proper to state that the Bitters are sold exclusively in glass, and never, under any circumstances, by the gallon or barrel. Imposters and imitators are abroad, and the only safeguard the public have against them is to see that the Bitters they buy have the engraved label and note of hand of Messrs. Hostetter & Smith, and their proprietary stamp over the cork of the bottle.

A Dainty Branch of Art.—A high reputation awaits Mrs. Read for the exquisite workmanship and general adaptability to their purpose of the Ladies' Skirt Supporters and Chest Expanders, of which she made such fine display at the late Fair. Her "Lady's Bust" is another aid to feminine beauty, which confers perfection on the wearer. Mrs. Read's establishment, 109 Montgomery street, is richly worth a visit.—San Francisco Sunday Mercury.

Many of the Diseases which hitherto baffled and defied the highest medical skill, are now speedily cured by Dr. H. A. Benton, whose processes of applying electricity receive the approbation of all prominent physicians. The nerves are directly reached, and patients suffering from chronic complaints find almost immediate relief, and rapidly recover their former healthy condition. Dr. Benton is a physician of excellent reputation, and as a Medical Electrician occupies the front rank in his profession.—Golden Era.

Trimmings.—Mrs. Norcross, No. 5 Masonic Temple, Montgomery street, is prepared to fill orders for civic and military at the shortest notice; also, invites the ladies to call and examine trimmings for Opera Cloaks received per steamer from New York. Mrs. Norcross has a Show Case on exhibition at the Fair, containing goods which for elegance and taste are not surpassed by any other establishment on the Pacific coast.—San Francisco Leader, Sept. 16th.

Toys.—Toys can be purchased of Feldbush & Co., 307 California street, at 25 per cent. below the usual rates. Call and examine stock and prices.

Dr. C. W. Moore's Medical and Surgical Institute.—In speaking of this Institution, the Sunday Mercury says: "Aside from the most skilful treatment and nursing, the large, airy and elegantly-furnished rooms, will enable the patients to enjoy all the comforts and luxuries of a home. All in all, we regard Dr. Moore and his Institute a most valuable acquisition to the Pacific Coast—the need of which we have long since felt." See advertisement.

MONEY TO LOAN.—$5,000 to loan, in small sums, on City Property, for a term of years; repayments received in monthly instalments. Deposits received at 1 per cent per month to month. Apply to the California Building and Loan Society, 406 Montgomery street, opposite Wells, Fargo & Co's.

TO THE LADIES OF CALIFORNIA.

IT IS A FACT, which all should know, that

Washing may be Done for Half the Cost,

and in half the time, required by pursuing the method now in use. An enormous waste of time and materials attends the old and ordinary process. And this is not because a better method is not known, but because housewives persist in treading in the beaten track followed by their mothers and grandmothers before them, opposing every change, and refusing even TO MAKE A FAIR TRIAL of those new inventions which scientific research has produced.

If the housekeepers of San Francisco and of the State will try the

California Washing Extract,

simply by way of experiment, they will be amazed to find how much unnecessary labor may be saved by its use. It may be obtained at all the principal Groceries of the city, or in quantities of the Agents, HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN.

The use of the EXTRACT renders "rubbing," "pounding," "washboards," and all the severe drudgery of the usual method quite unnecessary. It thoroughly cleanses, without injuring the clothes. In short, it works such wonders as no one will credit without witnessing them. All that the inventor asks of any doubting housewife is

A SINGLE TRIAL.

The following certificate from the State Assayer, furnished after an analysis of the EXTRACT, speaks for itself:

A. ENQUOIS—Dear Sir: I have examined the sample of liquid handed me, and find it free from acid or any substance that would be injurious to clothing.

Very respectfully, B. B. THAYER.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

KATE ROCKFORD, Plaintiff, vs. FRANCIS ROCKFORD, Defendant.—Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to FRANCIS ROCKFORD, Defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this honorable Court, dissolving the Bonds of Matrimony existing between Plaintiff and Defendant, and allowing Plaintiff to resume her maiden name of Kate Fossit, for costs of suit, and general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 23d day of June in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five.

"We that have free souls, it touches us not."

HAMLET—Act III., Scene 2.

SINCE Tupper wrote Proverbial Philosophy, a whole pack of scribblers have taken to writing sentimental truisms. There's Thoreau; nice bosh some of his sayings are. Here's a specimen:

"Even the tenderest plants force their way up through the hardest earth, and the crevices of rocks; but a man no material power can resist. What a wedge, what a beetle, what a catapult, is an earnest man! What can resist him?"

Fancy calling a man a "beetle." We suppose he would call a negro a "black beetle." Here's another:

"Pursue, keep up with, circle round and round your life, as a dog does his master's chaise. Do what you love. Know your own bone; gnaw at it, bury it, unearth it, and gnaw it still. Do not be too moral. You may cheat yourself out of much life so. Aim above morality. Be not simply good; be good for something."

Bah! Why didn't he say "circle round and round like a dog running after his tail." The advice "Do what you love," is simply abominable. Is a man, if he loves a woman, to "do" her? We suppose the English of this is "Do as you like." Men are very apt to do so when they are able. Thoreau is thoroughly right when he says you may cheat yourself out of much life by being too moral; but then, on the other hand, you may shorten your life considerably by being too immoral. The following will be published in hundreds of newspapers no doubt, as a wonderful bit of wisdom; and what is there in it?

"How shall we earn our bread, is a grave question yet it is a sweet and inviting question." Let us not be content to get our bread in some gross, careless, and hasty manner. Some men go a-hunting, some a-fishing, some a-gaming, some to war; but none have so pleasant a time as they who in earnest seek to earn their bread. Not only the rainbow and sunset are beautiful, but to be fed and clothed, sheltered and warmed aright, are equally beautiful and inspiring."

How shall we earn our bread, is a grave question, and how shall we earn stewed quail, and mushrooms, and oyster omelettes, and pate de foie gras, is a precious deal more sweet and inviting. We suppose that Thoreau does not consider that men who go a-hunting, or a-fishing are in earnest. As to going a-gaming, we heard a man say one day this week, that every man had an object in life, and his, for the last ten years, had been to beat faro; he said "there is something glorious in raking down a pile of twenties." Every one will agree with Thoreau that, to have a good French dinner every day, with a bottle, or say a bottle and a half of Burgundy, to wear clothes made by a tailor who understands his business, have a handsome suite of rooms, a fast horse, and a rich uncle to pay your debts, is worth a score of rainbows and sunsets, but who didn't know that before Thoreau told him? Thoreau proves himself an idiot by his mode of observing a sun set. He says:

"Now a nights, I go on to the hill to see the sun set, as one would go home at evening."

As if he couldn't see the sun set without climbing a hill. The man doesn't know how to make himself comfortable, and yet pretends to teach other people how to enjoy themselves. We suppose if seeing the sun set from the top of a hill is equal, in his estimation, to going home to bed seeing the moon rise, it is the same as having his supper. Moonshine is quite as substantial as the vaporings which the Bulletin's beetle (we mean that as a compliment,) published last Monday under the title of "Thoughts from Thoreau."

We notice in the Auburn Stars and Stripes, a poem entitled "Far Away." This is a paraphrase, not to say a parody of "We gather shells." There are eight verses all ending in "far away." It is the prettiest thing we have read since that sweet thing by Andy-Eb. We have room for only three verses:

"Upon the shore
Of evermore
We sport like children at their play;
And gather shells
Where sinks and swells
The mighty sea from far away.

"Upon the beach
Nor voice nor speech
Doth things intelligible say,
But through our souls
A whisper rolls
That comes to us from far away.

"At what it tells
We drop the shells
We were so full of yesterday;
And pick up no more
Upon that shore
But dream of brighter far away."

"A whisper rolling through a soul," is a strong poetical image, perhaps a little far-fetched like the whisper itself, "that comes to us from far away." The last verse is beautiful. The whisper, it appears, is a hint to shell out. The poet who wrote Far Away, if he tells his own experience, must have been in a lamentable condition:

"We drop the shells
We were so full of yesterday."

Good gracious! He was full of shells yesterday. We wonder who wrote this poem. Surely the poet must have been Shelley. He was a confounded fool to go on picking up shells while other people were eating oysters, but that's just like a poet. He gets frightfully ungrammatical, after disgorging those shells:

"And o'er that tide,
Far out and wide,
The yearning of our souls do stray;
We long to go
We do not know
Where it may be, but far away."

The yearning of our souls do stray, do it? And you long to go, you do not know where it may be, but far away, do you? That's the very best thing you can do. Git! Don't let us catch you dumping any more oyster shells into the columns of innocent country papers that don't know the difference between oyster shells and poetry. We must state that the editor of the Auburn Stars and Stripes does not claim this piece of poetical shell-work as original, and it is charitable to suppose that he did not write it himself.

WHAT a blessing the telegraph is! The European news which is sent across the wires is always especially important. For instance:

"The Star publishes in large type a letter from a member of Parliament, hinting that no Cabinet will be satisfactory to his party which does not include Bright, and suggesting his appointment to the Secretaryship of State for India."

That's important intelligence, indeed. The Star publishes in large type a letter from a member of Parliament, hinting that no Cabinet will be satisfactory to his party which does not include Bright, and suggesting his appointment to the Secretaryship of State for India! Consider it done. Bright is Secretary for India. Who is the member of Parliament who hints that Bright must be included in the Cabinet to please his party? The Sacramento Union thinks this remarkable fact that "a member of Parliament" wishes John Bright made Secretary for India, of sufficient importance for editorial comment. The Union, perhaps, is not aware that this little penny paper is the private property of John Bright—"his goods, his chattels; it is his house, his household stuff, his field, his barn, his horse, his ox, his ass, his anything." Wonderful, indeed, that John Bright's little organ should hint that he, John Bright, ought to have a position in the Cabinet. John Bright can have his effusions printed in any sized type which may please his fancy in his own paper; it may be that the letter in large type, suggesting that John Bright be made Secretary for India, was written by John Bright, M. P. The Union thinks the Alabama claims will not create any trouble under these circumstances. If John Bright be made Secretary for Indian Affairs, and, of course, he will be, to please the party of the member of Parliament, whose letter was printed in large type in the penny Star, he will settle the Alabama matter at once. The telegraph has, indeed, brought great news; and the Union possesses a wonderful knowledge of English politics.

"AN exchange reckons that there can't be many women in Heaven, because there is no marrying or giving in marriage in that kingdom," says the New York Leader. It is very wrong to make jokes on such a subject, extremely wrong. If people are wicked enough to do such a thing as to try to prove that there are no women in Heaven, they need only turn to the Book of Revelations, where they will read: "And there was silence in the Heaven for the space of an hour."

THE moral little Call comes out in the new role of rigid sabbatarian. It is perfectly horrified at the conduct of a party of wicked young men who, last Sunday afternoon, played ball in Washington Square, "thereby greatly scandalizing the residents of that portion of the city." The virtuous little sheet preaches a sermon on this text:

"Would it not be better for persons, if they desire to engage in such practices, to pay enough respect to the religious sentiment to the community, to seek some less public place to indulge in their games?"

Certainly, it would. Are there not lager beer cellars open, where these profane Sabbath-breakers can sit and play seven-up, without scandalizing the religious sentiment of the community! Cannot they go to the Odeum advertised in the religious little Call, and dance at the ball given there every Sunday, or play ten pins in the four new alleys, instead of perilling their immortal souls, by playing ball on Sunday on Washington Square? Cannot they go to the sacred (?) concert given every Sunday at Platt's Hall, as advertised in the Call? Can they not, out of the variety of Sunday amusements advertised and puffed as most desirable and praiseworthy in that hypocrical little sheet every Sunday, find one less depraved and abominable than tossing a ball about on a public square on Sunday afternoon, after going to church in the morning? That Sunday's amusement was not advertised in the Morning Call. No * notice announced a base ball club would meet on Sunday afternoon on Washington Square. Sunday amusements, which are not advertised, and which afford no revenue to the venders of wines and liquors, must be discouraged.

WE notice in an advertisement in the Virginia Enterprise having reference to the estate of a person recently deceased, that his executor is A. Fleshhacker. A pretty state society must be in up there, when they make a flesh-hacker executor of a dead man. He'd be the sort of man to be executioner of a live man; but to trust a dead body to a flesh-hacker is horrible. On looking at the advertisement again, we see that it isn't A. Fleshhacker, but A Fleishhacker who is the executor. We beg to apologize to A. Fleishhacker for knocking his i out, but we were in such sad need of a subject for a paragraph, that we felt inclined to destroy his i's or any other man's eyes without any reference to the man's size. We are not afraid of him or any other flesh-hacker. Confound a flesh-hacker, anyhow, whether he be a surgeon or a butcher.

WE hear of Fenian balls all over the United States, but we do not hear of Fenian balls doing much execution in Ireland. It appears, after all, very much as if the Fenian agitation had been got up "just for greens," and that the shamrock will not shake Ireland more severely than the last sham rock of an earthquake shook San Francisco.

"Dogberry," the Golden Era's compressed novelist, has gone into a line of business which resembles that pursued by industrious but not over-scrupulous Celestials. They make a swoop on a clothes-line, prig all the clothes, pick out the marks of ownership, and dispose of their stolen goods. We are ashamed of "Dogberry;" he has talent, and might leave such a trick as that of altering the names in Bret Harte's burlesque of "Fantine," and appropriating it to poor scribblers who, not having brains of their own, are driven to avail themselves of other people's. Oh! "Dogberry." The offence was foul.

THE Flag, speaking of the Mechanics' Pavilion, says:

"It has furnished a great many families with kindling wood, so there may be a chance for it to rise Phœbus-like from its ashes some day."

Can't see the point. If it did rise from its ashes, after being pulled down and cut up into kindling wood, it wouldn't be like Phœbus. Phœbus isn't the name of the bird you intended to refer to. Get a classical dictionary and hunt it up.

"A little boy, five years old, while writhing under the tortures of the ague, was told by his mother to rise up and take a powder his mother had prepared for him. 'Powder! powder!!' said he, rising on his elbow, and putting on a roguish smile, 'Mother, I ain't a gun.'" Exchange.

Funny little boy! We hope his mother charged him and let him off. The ungrammatical little beast ought to have been filled with powder up to the muzzle, and touched off for saying "I ain't," and attempting such an extraordinary gymnastic feat as "rising on his elbow," when he was "writhing under the tortures of the ague."

A NEWSPAPER says: "An almanac for imbeciles, for 1866, has just been published in Paris." It calls this "a French notion." Nonsense! An almanac for imbeciles has been published in England for the last fifty years. What do you call Moore's Prophetic Almanac?

TREM.

THE FIRST PATIENT.

HE was not then the great doctor that you know him now. At that time he was neither officer of the Legion of Honor, nor professor of the Faculty of Paris. Hardly was he known to some few companions of his studies. The horses that drew his carriage were not then born; the pole of his landau was flourishing green in the forest.

He had obtained his title of physician, and lived in a poor garret—as one says—as if there were any garrets that are rich; and to accomplish this miserable result, to have his painted bedstead, his table of sham mahogany, two chairs wretchedly stuffed, and his books—what efforts had it not cost him! He was so poor!

Have you ever known any of these indefatigable young students, born in the humblest ranks, who spend upon their arid labor their ten, their twenty best years of life, without a thought or a care for the pleasures of their age or the passing day? youthful stoics who march with firm step, and alone, towards an end which, alas! all do not attain!

You have wept at that old drama, that old eternal scene which is recounted every day—yet not so old, it is renewed also every day: the bare chamber, no better than a loft—the truckle-bed—the broken pitcher—the heap of straw—the sentimental lithographist will not forget the guttering candle stuck into the neck of a bottle. Thus much for the accessories, then for the persons of the scene; a workman, the father who expects to die in the hospital—his four children—always four—who have not broken their fast that day—and the mother is lying-in with her fifth—and it is winter, for these poor people choose winter always for their lying-in.

Oh! all this is very true and piteous—I weep with you at the cry of those suffering children—at the sobs of their mother. Yet there is another poverty which you know not, which it is never intended that you should know. A silent poverty that goes dressed in its black coat, polished, it is true, where polish should not come, and with a slaty hue—produced by the frequent application of ink to its threadbare surface. It is a courageous poverty which resists all aid—even from that fictitious fund, a debt—which dresses itself as you would dress, if your coat were ten years old—which invites no sympathy—which may be seen in the sombre evening stopping a moment before the baker's shop, or the wired windows of the money-changer, but passing on again without a sigh heard. Oh, this poverty in a black coat? And then it enters into its cold and solitary chamber, without even the sad consolation of weeping with another. No Lady Bountiful comes here. In the picture just now described, she would be seen in the background, entering in at the door, her servant behind loaded with raiment and provisions. What should she here? What brings you here, madam? Who could have sent you here? We are rich! If we were poor should we not sell these books? all these books are ours; madam, we want nothing. Carry your amiable charity elsewhere.

Our young doctor had installed himself in the fifth floor of that historic street, La Cloitre-Saint-Mery—a quarter of the town, poor, disinherited, sad as himself. Where else, indeed, could he have carried his mutilated furniture—which in other quarters would have only excited distrust? There was he waiting for fortune—not, be it understood, in his bed, but following science laboriously, uninterruptedly. His life was so retired—so modest—so silent, that hardly was he known in the house. On the day of his arrival, he had said to the porter, or rather porteress, "Madam, I am a doctor—if any one should want me." This was all the publicity of the new doctor—his sole announcement, his only advertisement. As his fellow lodgers could gather nothing of him to gratify or excite curiosity—as his unfrequented door was always strictly closed, they soon ceased to concern themselves about him. His name even was forgotten; they simply called him the doctor—and with this title our readers also must be contented, unless their own ingenuity should enable them to discover another.

One night our doctor heard unaccustomed noises in the house, doors slamming, people walking to and fro. Presently some one knocked at his door—verily at his door. What was it? Was the patient come at last—that first patient, so anxiously expected? He was dressed in an instant.

"The Countess is dying!" some one cried through the door. "Come directly!"

He was at her bedside in a minute.

The Countess. Such was the title given in derision to precisely the poorest and most miserable old woman in the house. She had been at one period of her life in the service of a noble family as femme-de-chambre; and as a woman who had seen something of the great world, she held unqualified strangers at a certain distance, and, to use a common phrase, kept herself to herself. This had procured her the ill-will and ill-opinion of several other old crones inhabiting the same house, who made her the subject of their perpetual scandal. Without doubt she had poisoned her last master, and could not look a Christian in the face; or at very least she had robbed him. Did you ask for proofs? She had a treasure stitched into a mattress. But she was nearly dying with hunger? Yes—the niggard! She starved herself, she could not spend her treasure.

Monstrous inventions! The poverty of the Countess as they called her in mockery was complete. Niggard she was, and had good reason to be so, in order to subsist on the little annuity she had contrived, in the days of her service, to scrape together. For the rest, as we have no wish to disguise the truth, the Countess was by no means an amiable person—bitter and selfish, hostile to all the world, as venomous as her detractors, and without pity for others, as those so often are who have suffered much themselves.

She was now stretched motionless on her bed. The old crones had come about her less from humanity than to discover the secrets of her den, the access to which she had hitherto strictly defended. She held in her left hand a small packet wrapped up in half a pocket-handkerchief, which she clutched convulsively. It was the treasure, they all exclaimed.

Her case was a grave one—a congestion of the brain. The doctor bled her, and then wrote his prescription—his first! The bleeding brought the Countess to herself. When she heard him tell one of the bystanders to go to the chemist and get the potion—

"Potion!" she exclaimed, laying hold of the paper, "I want no potion—I am not ill. Do you think I have money to pay for your drugs? Go away!—all of you—go!"

She crumpled the prescription in her hand, and was about to throw it on the floor, when something in the paper apparently arrested her. She read the prescription, and, turning to the doctor with a manner quite changed and subdued, asked how much it would cost? She then opened the little packet she had held till then so jealously in her hand. All the old crones stretched forward. A few franc-pieces and some great sous were all the treasure it contained.

That first client, so long looked for, was come at last. Our doctor had his patient—that first patient whom one pets and caresses, to whom one is nurse as well as physician. No uncertain diagnostics there—no retarded visits, no hasty prescriptions. If this one die, it is verily his fault. He devoted himself, body and soul, to the old woman. Certainly the fees would not be very brilliant, nor would the cure spread his reputation very widely. He thought not of this—but save her he must! He absolutely loved this unamiable Countess. He assembled the ban et arriere ban of science, and armed himself cap-a-pie in knowledge for her defence.

The object of all this solicitude received his attentions, however, with an increasing ill-humor, for each fresh medicine made a fresh demand upon her purse. "How long will this last!" she said one day; "I must go out—I have no more money—I must go out this very day."

"Do not disturb yourself," began the Doctor.

"Not disturb myself!" she interrupted; "easy to say! Instead of giving me these drinks and draughts, give me something that will put a little strength into me—for I must go out."

"Listen to me! remain tranquil a few days"——She turned round from him with impatience.

"To leave your chamber now would be to expose your life. Give me but four days; and if you have no more money, I will charge myself with the medicines."

"You!" cried the Countess, looking up with astonishment.

"And why not me?" said the young Doctor. "You shall return it to me some time—when you will."

"You! who have not often a dinner for yourself!"

"Who says that?" asked the Doctor, blushing involuntarily.

"All the house says it."

"Miserable stuff!" he replied; "will you accept what I offer? If I promise, you may be sure I can perform."

The old woman looked at him with surprise, and at length consented to accept his offer and take his remedies.

The young Doctor hastened to his chamber, shut fast the door, and looked round him, with his arms folded—"What is there here," said he, "that I can sell?"

What he found to sell I do not know. Enough that he supplied the Countess with a sum sufficient to procure her the necessary medicines, and to relieve her from care as to the wants of life for some short time. The case proceeded favorably.

At night, as he was returning from one of those solitary walks in which he was accustomed to exhale his sadness, and also to gather fresh resolution for the struggle he had undertaken with destiny, and was slowly mounting the long, dark, dilapidated staircase that led up to that fifth floor on which he resided, he stumbled over some obstacle, and, on looking closer, found it was the body of a woman lying outstretched upon the stairs. It was the Countess. In spite of solicitations and her own promise, she had gone out; but her strength had failed her. She had fallen, and now lay insensible.

Our young Doctor, braving all malicious interpretations, carried her to his own room, which was the nearest place of refuge, and there, by the aid of some cordials he administered, restored her to her senses. She opened her eyes, looked around her, and understanding in whose room she was, she said, with a scrutinizing air, "You are miserably lodged here." It was the only observation his amiable patient made, and she repeated it several times—"You must be miserably off." Even when she had returned to her own room, and he had left her for the night, she still said nothing but—"You are miserably lodged!"

The next morning, when the Doctor visited his patient—and you may be sure his visit was an early one—to his surprise, she was on foot, with sleeves tucked up, sweeping, dusting, and putting to rights her little abode. He was astonished. The shock which she had received the day before, instead of injuring her, had apparently aided in her restoration. She was quite gay.

"You are resolved to kill yourself, then?" said the Doctor.

"I was never better in my life," she answered.

"Do not be too confident," was his reply. "You must keep your room two or three days; and this time," he added, with a smile, "I shall keep guard over you myself."

The Countess consented with a most childlike docility. She would do what he pleased: only yesterday she was obliged to go out—it was absolutely necessary. There was so much gentleness in her altered manner, that the Doctor was disposed to regard this as an alarming symptom in her case.

However, it was not so. Her health, day by day, improved, and the relation between the patient and her medical attendant became more amicable. She proposed, by way of some return, to assist him in his bachelor housekeeping. It would give her no trouble. An hour in the morning, when he was at his lectures, some of which he still followed; and then she could cook, and she could mend. These offers the young Doctor declined with a sort of alarm. Who but himself could readjust those habiliments, whose strong and whose weak points he so very well knew! What needle could, on this ground, be half so skilful as his own? And cooking! Cooking with him! Cook what? On what? In what? It was in vain that the Countess insisted; he would hear of no such thing. He kept his poverty veiled—it was his sacred territory.

Some few days after the Countess's health might be said to be quite re-established, our young Doctor, on entering his room, was surprised to see a letter lying on his table. Correspondence, for the mere sake of letter-writing, he had quite foregone as a pure waste of time; and he had no relatives who interested themselves in his fate, or who could have anything to communicate. Nevertheless, there the letter was, addressed duly to himself. He looked at it with an uncomfortable foreboding, assured that it must bring him some new care, or report some strange disaster.

He sat down, and tore open the envelope. He bounded from his seat again with surprise—the letter enclosed fifteen notes of the Bank of France! It is no fairy tale, but simple history; fifteen good notes of one thousand francs each.

Inside the envelope was written: "This treasure belongs to you as your property. Use it without scruple. The hand that transmits it does but accomplish a legitimate restitution. May the gifts of Fortune conduct you to the Temple of Happiness!" There was no signature.

"Why, it is a dream, a hallucination. Am I growing light-headed?" said the Doctor. But no—it was no dream; there they were—before him—on the little table—those fifteen miraculous pieces of paper. He turned his head away from them; but when he looked again, there they were—in the same place—in the same order—motionless. I leave you to guess his agitation and his many mingled emotions. From whom could this godsend have come? He read and re-read, and turned the letter in every direction. He racked his brain to no purpose to discover his anonymous benefactor. He knew, and was known to, scarcely any one. He strode about his chamber—as well as he could stride in it—inventing the wildest suppositions, which were rejected as soon as made. Suddenly he stopped—struck his forehead as a new thought occurred to him—"Bah!" he cried; "absurd!—impossible!—and yet——"

In a moment he was at the door of the Countess. He paused a moment before he knocked. There was from the landing-place a window at right angles to that of the old woman's apartment; and if her window-curtain happened to be drawn aside, which however, was rarely the case, it was easy to see from it into her room. On the present occasion, not only was the curtain drawn aside, but her window was open, and the Doctor could see this fairy, accused of lavishing bank-notes of a thousand francs, kneeling before a wretched stove, striving with her feeble breath to rekindle a few bits of charcoal, on which there stood some indescribable culinary vessel, containing an odious sort of porridge, at once her dinner and her breakfast!

The Doctor shook his head—it could not be the Countess. Yet, completely to satisfy himself, he entered. She gave him her ordinary welcome, neither more nor less—talked, as usual, of her former masters, of the dreadful price of bread, and the wicked scandal of her neighbors. But what most completely set all suspicion at rest was the manner in which she spoke of the debt which she owed him. "I cannot yet repay you what you advanced for my medicines," she said, with all the natural embarrassment of an honest debtor speaking to a creditor. "You will be wanting it, perhaps. Now don't be angry at what I say—one is always in want of one's little money. In a few days I will try and give you at least a little on account."

"No," said the Doctor, when he was alone: "I can make nothing of it. Away with all guesses!" He resolved to profit by the good fortune, be the giver whom it might. And he hoped so to manage matters, that if, at a future day, an opportunity for its restoration should occur, he should be able to avail himself of it.

He was soon installed in a more convenient apartment, better furnished, and supplied, above all, with a more abundant library. The young Doctor was radiant with hope. Yet he did not quit his old quarter of the town. It need not be said that he took formal leave of his first patient the Countess.

From this time everything prospered with him. As it generally happens, the first difficulty conquered, everything succeeded to his wish. It is the first turn of the wheel which costs so much; once out of the rut, and the carriage rolls. By degrees a little circle of clients was formed, which augmented necessarily every day. His name began to spread. Even from his old residence, where he led so solitary a life, the reputation had followed him of a severe and laborious student, and the cure of the Countess was a known proof of his skill.

Like the generality of the profession, he now divided his day into two portions; the morning he devoted to his visits, the afternoon to the reception of his patients. Returning to his home one day a little before the accustomed hour, he perceived a crowd of persons collected in the street through which he was passing. Perhaps some accident had happened, and his presence might be useful. He made his way, therefore, through the crowd. Yet he nowhere discovered any object which could have collected it. He was merely surrounded on every side by groups engaged in earnest yet subdued conversation. The greater part were women, and both men and women were generally of a mature age, and of that sort of physiognomy which one can only describe as odd—faces ready made for the pencil of the caricaturist. The Doctor, who had no idle time, was about to make his escape, when a general movement took place in the crowd, and he found himself borne along irresistibly with the rest through a large door, which it seemed had just opened, into a spacious hall or amphitheatre. At the upper end was a stage; on the stage a large, strangely-fashioned wheel was placed; and by the side of the wheel stood a little child, dressed in a sky-blue tunic, with a red girdle round its waist, its hair curled and lying upon its shoulders, and a bandage across its eyes. The wheel and the child formed together a sort of mythological representation of Fortune. They were drawing the lottery.

After amusing himself for some time with the novelty of the spectacle, the Doctor began to make serious efforts to extricate himself. As he was threading his way through the crowd, and looking this way and that to detect the easiest mode of egress, he saw, underneath a small gallery at the side of the amphitheatre, in a place which seemed to be reserved for the more favored or more constant worshippers in that temple of Fortune, a face, the last he should have expected to find there. It was no other than the Countess. She was seated there with all the gravity in the world, inclining with a courteous attention to an old man with grey hairs and smooth brown coat, who was very deferentially addressing her.

Having disengaged himself from the throng, and returned to his own house, this appearance of the Countess recurred very forcibly to his mind. "After all," thought he, "it was the Countess!—it was none but she who sent those notes." The enigma was solved. He had made his fortune in the lottery, and without knowing it. He determined to visit his old patient the next morning.

That very evening, however, he was waited on by the same old gentleman in brown coat and grey hairs, who was seen speaking to her at the lottery. He came with a rueful face, requesting him to visit immediately Madame ——, giving the Countess her right name, which it is now too late in our story to introduce. Whatever may have been the ease at some previous time, the wheel of Fortune had that day bitterly disappointed her hopes. She had been carried home insensible. The Doctor hastened to her. It was too late. She had been again attacked by a congestion of the brain, which this time had proved fatal.

There appeared no hopes of a complete solution of the enigma.

"Ah!" said the same old gentleman, as he stood moralizing by his side, "the same luck never comes twice—she should have tried other numbers."

The Doctor saw immediately that the old gentleman had been in the confidence of the deceased. He questioned him. There was a look of significance which betrayed plainly that he knew all. He was, in fact, one of those who earn their subsistence by writing letters for those who are deficient in the skill of penmanship or epistolary composition. He had written the very letter itself; to his pen was owing that sort of copy book phrase, "May the gifts of Fortune conduct to the Temple of Happiness!" The Doctor had, in truth, as he often said when alluding to the subject, made his fortune in the lottery.

We wish we could leave the story here, and let the reader suppose that gratitude alone had induced the old woman to act so generous a part. But the whole truth should be honestly told. There was a mixture of superstition in the case. It was his number that had won the prize, and she considered it, as expressed in the letter which accompanied the notes, in the light of his property. In all countries where a lottery has been long established, the strangest superstitions grow up concerning what are called lucky numbers. In Italy, where this manner of increasing the public revenue is still resorted to, not only is any number which has presented itself under peculiar circumstances sure to be propitious, but there is a well-known book, of acknowledged authority we believe, containing a list of words, with a special number attached to each word, by the aid of which you can convert into a lucky number any extraordinary event which has occurred to you. Let anything happen of public or private interest—let anything have been dreamt, or even talked of that was at all surprising, you have only to look in this dictionary for the word which may be supposed to contain the essence of the matter; as, for instance, fire, death, birth—and the number that is opposite that word will assuredly win your fortune. When the Countess first saw the prescription of the young Doctor, she was going to throw it angrily on the floor; but her eye was suddenly riveted by the numbers in it—the numbers of the grains and ozs. in the cabalistic writing—and she felt assured that in these lucky numbers her fortune was made. The first stake she played she played for him; and, singularly enough, she won! But, as the old gentleman in the brown coat observed, the virtue of the prescription was exhausted. She should have sought for numbers from some other quarter; the second trial she made ended in a severe loss, and was the immediate occasion of her death.—Blackwood's Magazine.

ARTEMUS WARD ON AGRICULTURE.

THE Barclay County Agricultural Society having seriously invited Artemus Ward to address them on the occasion of their next annual Fair, he wrote the President of that Society as follows:

NEW YORK, June 12, 1865.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 5th instant, in which you invite me to deliver an address before your excellent agricultural society. I feel flattered, and I think I will come.

Perhaps, meanwhile, a brief history of my experience as an agriculturist will be acceptable; and as that history no doubt contains suggestions of value to the entire agricultural community, I have concluded to write you through the Press.

I have been an honest old farmer for some four years.

My farm is in the interior of Maine. Unfortunately, my lands are eleven miles from the railroad. Eleven miles is quite a distance to haul immense quantities of wheat, rye, and oats; but as I haven't any to haul, I do not, after all, suffer much on that account.

My farm is more especially a grass farm.

My neighbors told me so at first, and, as an evidence that they were sincere in that opinion, they turned their cows on to it the moment I went off "leeturing."

These cows are now quite fat. I take pride in these cows, in fact, and am glad I own a grass farm.

Two years ago I tried sheep raising.

I bought fifty lambs, and turned them loose on my broad and beautiful acres.

It was pleasant on bright mornings to stroll leisurely out on to the farm in my dressing-gown, with a cigar in my mouth, and watch those innocent little lambs as they danced gaily o'er the hillside. Watching their saucy capers reminded me of caper sauce, and it occurred to me I should have some very fine eating when they grew up to be "muttons."

My gentle shepherd, Mr. Eli Perkins, said: "We must have some shepherd dogs."

I had no very precise idea as to what shepherd dogs were, but I assumed a rather profound look, and said:

"We must, Eli. I spoke to you about this some time ago!"

I wrote to my old friend, Mr. Dexter H. Follet, of Boston, for two shepherd dogs. Mr. F. is not an honest old farmer himself, but I thought he knew something about shepherd dogs. He kindly forsook far more important business to accommodate, and the dogs came forthwith. They were splendid creatures—snuff-colored, hazel-eyed, long-tailed, and shapely-jawed.

We led them proudly to the fields.

"Turn them in, Eli," I said.

Eli turned them in.

They went in at once, and killed twenty of my best lambs in about four minutes and a half.

My friend had made a trifling mistake in the breed of these dogs.

These dogs were not partial to sheep.

Eli Perkins was astonished, and observed:

"Waal! did you ever?"

I certainly never had.

There were pools of blood on the green-sward, and fragments of wool and raw lamb chops lay round in confused heaps.

The dogs would have been sent to Boston that night, had they not rather suddenly died that afternoon of a throat distemper. It wasn't a swelling of the throat. It wasn't diphtheria. It was a violent opening of the throat, extending from ear to ear.

Thus closed their life-stories. Thus ended their interesting tails.

I failed as a raiser of lambs. As a sheepist, I was not a success.

Last summer, Mr. Perkins said: "I think we'd better cut some grass this season, sir."

We cut some grass.

To me the new-mown hay is very sweet and nice. The brilliant George Arnold sings about it, in beautiful verse, down in Jersey every summer; so does the brilliant Aldrich, at Portsmouth, N. H. And yet I doubt if either of these men knows the price of a ton of hay to-day. But new-mown hay is a really fine thing. It is good for man and beast.

We hired four honest farmers to assist us, and led them gaily to the meadows.

I was going to mow, myself.

I saw the sturdy peasants go round once ere I dipped my flashing scythe into the tall green grass.

"Are you ready?" said E. Perkins.

"I am here!"

"Then follow us!"

I followed them.

Followed them rather too closely, evidently, for a white-haired old man, who immediately followed Mr. Perkins, called upon us to halt. Then, in a low, firm voice, he said to his son, who was just ahead of me: "John, change places with me. I hain't got long to live anyhow. Yonder berryin' ground will soon have these old bones, and it's no matter whether I'm carried there with one leg off and terrible gashes in the other or not! But you, John—you are young."

The old man changed places with his son. A smile of calm resignation lit up his wrinkled face, as he said: "Now, sir, I am ready!"

"What mean you, old man?" I said.

"I mean that if you continner to bran'ish that blade as you have been bran'ishin' it, you'll slash h—— out of some of us before we're a hour older!"

There was some reason mingled with this white-haired old peasant's profanity. It was true that I had twice escaped mowing off his son's legs, and his father was perhaps naturally alarmed.

I went and sat down under a tree. "I never know'd a literary man in my life," I overheard the old man say, "that know'd anything."

Mr. Perkins was not as valuable to me this season as I had fancied he might be. Every afternoon he disappeared from the field regularly, and remained about some two hours. He said it was headache. He inherited it from his mother. His mother was often taken in that way, and suffered a great deal.

At the end of the two hours, Mr. Perkins would reappear with his head neatly done up in a large wet rag, and say he "felt better."

One afternoon it so happened that I soon followed the invalid to the house, and as I neared the porch I heard a female voice energetically observe, "You stop!" It was the voice of the hired girl, and she added, "I'll holler for Mr. Brown!"

"Oh no, Nancy," I heard the invalid E. Perkins soothingly say; "Mr. Brown knows I love you. Mr. Brown approves of it!"

This was pleasant for Mr. Brown!

I peered cautiously through the kitchen blinds, and, however unnatural it may appear, the lips of Eli Perkins and my hired girl were very near together. She said: "You shan't do so," and he so-doed. She also said she would get right up and go away, and, as an evidence that she was thoroughly in earnest about it, she remained where she was.

They are married now, and Mr. Perkins no more is troubled with the headache.

This year we are planting corn. Mr. Perkins writes me that "on account of no skare krows bein put up krows cum and digged fust crop up but soon got another in. Old Bisbee who was frade youd cut his sons leggs of Ses you bet go and stan up in feeld yrself with dressin gownd on & gesses krows will keep way. this made Boys in store larf. no More terday from

"Yours respectful ELI PERKINS,
"his letter."

My friend, Mr. D. T. T. Moore, of the Rural New Yorker, thinks if I "keep on," I will get in the Poor House in about two years.

If you think the honest old farmers of Barclay county want me, I will come.

Truly yours, CHARLES F. BROWNE.

THE Booksellers of Paris are about to establish in that city a book fair, similar to that of Leipsic.

THE DOCTOR'S HORSES.

BEING ANOTHER LEAF FROM MY BOOK OF REAL LIFE.

HAVING a little leisure the other afternoon, when going home from the counting house, I passed the door of the house where my old friend S. R. has his chambers. Feeling inclined to see and converse with him, I entered the door and ascended the staircase leading to his room, and, in doing so, passed a gentleman coming down the stairs, whose face was familiar to me, but, at the moment, I could not recollect his name. We bowed to each other, but did not speak, and I went into S. R.'s room. I found him in his private apartment, just recovering from a fit of laughter. He started on seeing me, and said: "Did you meet Dr. Dell, as you came up the stairs?"

I said I had passed a gentleman whom I thought I knew, but I could not recollect his name.

"It is my old friend, Dr. Dell, of New Broad street, in the city," said S. R. "I have been amused by his telling me how he has been swindled out of £150; and he has been to ask me what redress he can have."

"Why," I said, "he is a very clever man—how came to be taken in?"

"Just sit down," said S. R., "and I will tell you."

So I sat down in a chair by the side of his table.

"Dr. Dell," said he, "a few days ago, saw an advertisement in one of the morning papers for the sale of a pair of horses, said to be occasioned by the death of a gentleman whose property they had been, and his widow had no further occasion for them. The family resided about fifty miles in the country, and the horses had been sent up to town for sale in charge of the family coachman; and they were to be seen and tried at certain stables in some mews, near Guildford street, Russell Square. The Doctor seeing this, and being disposed to change his own horses, which he had had in constant use for several years, went, at the beginning of the week, to the stables mentioned in the advertisement. Here he found a very business-like man, who called himself the owner of the stables.

"On the Doctor stating his reason for coming, the other said the horses had been taken out by the old coachman for exercise, and, looking at his watch, he observed it was time he had returned; and he walked up the stable yard to the entrance of the mews, to look if the coachman was coming. 'Here they are, sir,' he cried out; and Dr. Dell went to the place where the man was standing, and, looking down the street, he saw, just turning the corner from Landsdowne Place, Brunswick Square, by the side of the Foundling Hospital, an elderly country looking man, in plain black livery, driving very steadily a pair of fine-looking bright bay horses.

"'Ah, these country chaps don't understand London driving, sir,' the man observed to the Doctor; 'he does not show them off as a gentleman likes to see them.'

"The horses now approached. Dr. Dell took notice of them and the driver. He was an elderly man, dressed as a regular country family coachman would be, in a plain black mourning suit, with long leather gaiters, a sort of Welsh wig, a country-made hat, and altogether very well made up for what he was said to be. The horses were fine-looking animals—such as would be found in the possession of a country gentleman of good fortune: wide nostrils, bright eyes, good color, well-matched in size and color, carefully groomed, and quite superior in appearance to the old horses the Doctor had in his own carriage, which was standing near by in the street.

"The Doctor's wife was in his carriage, and he desired the old coachman just to drive the horses up slowly past the carriage and back, that she might see them. Feeling pretty well satisfied, he talked with the stableman about the price, which he said was rather higher than he had intended to give when he should change his old horses, admitting that the horses seemed a very superior pair, and were well suited for London. The man replied the horses were great favorites in the family, having been bred by the father of the widow lady, and she did not intend to take a less price. The coachman came up at the time this conversation was going on, and, touching his hat respectfully to the Doctor, he, in answer to the observation of the stableman, reiterated the assertion that the horses were great favorites, and Missus was not particularly anxious of parting with them, but, as they were to be sold, she would wish them to get into the hands of a gentleman where they would be well cared for. To urge the Doctor on, the stableman remarked that a gentleman living in Grosvenor Square, a colonel in the army, had seen the horses the day before, and was to send his groom next day for the answer whether he could have them. The Doctor asked if he could try them, and being told he might, he got up on to the brake carriage to which they were harnessed; accompanied by the old coachman, they drove round Brunswick Square, and returned to the stables. During the drive, the Doctor spoke to the old coachman and questioned him on several things, and got much the same sort information from him as had been given by the man at the stables. On his return, he told the stable proprietor he would be with him by nine o'clock the next morning, and if, in the meantime, he decided on taking the horses, he would give him his cheque in the morning, for he very much approved of the appearance of the horses and their action.

"The Doctor got into his carriage to go to the city. His wife, who, as I told you, was inside the carriage, and had seen the horses, expressed herself much pleased with their look, quite putting the Doctor's old horses in the shade. Having talked together in their passage to the city, the Doctor made up his mind to have the horses. So, next morning, he was at the stables, punctual to the time he had appointed. He proposed to the stableman that he would give him one hundred guineas and his own pair of horses for the others. The man demurred at first, but, after some little disputation, he yielded. 'But,' he said to the Doctor, 'to show you it is a great favor I am granting you, we will go to the stables, and you will find what I told you yesterday is correct, for the gentleman in Grosvenor Square has sent his groom down with orders to return with the horses; but, as you said you would be here this morning, I would not let them go until I had seen you.'

"On the Doctor going with him to the stable, where the horses had been placed, he there saw a young man dressed in a very smart livery, with a cockade in his hat, implying that he was a servant to some military officer—top boots and spurs and leather breeches, as a first rate groom would appear—and on his left arm a saddle; for the purpose of riding one of the horses and leading the other, to his master. The Doctor, seeing all this, felt a little more reconciled with his bargain. So bidding his own coachman unharness his old horses from his carriage, and put in the others, he went with the stableman into a little room at the side of the stables, and wrote him a cheque for one hundred guineas, taking the man's receipt for the same, and what at the moment he thought was a warranty of the soundness of the horses. He then got into his carriage and drove off to his house in the city.

"When he had got about two-thirds of the way, his coachman drove slowly, and, being asked by the Doctor why he had slackened his pace, the man replied that one of the horses limped, and he was afraid to force him. However, the Doctor got to his house. Getting out of his carriage, he looked at the horse's legs and feet, and then told his man to do what he ought to have done at the first—to take the horses, with his compliments, to Mr. Field of the Veterinary College, in Camden Town, for his opinion of their soundness. This was about ten in the morning. At about two in the afternoon, the coachman returned with the horses. The Doctor asked him if he had seen Mr. Field, and what he said.

"'Ah, sir, said the man,' I was afraid it would be so, for I had some difficulty to get the poor things there; and when Mr. Field saw them, he laughed out and said, Here come my old friends again. So I told him I came from you for his opinion of the horses, and asked him what he meant by calling them his old friends. 'Why, my man,' said he, 'I have had those horses sent to me four times already this year. They are fine-looking creatures, and it is a pity, but they are thoroughly lame, and worth little or nothing as carriage horses for a gentleman,' and he asked me the particulars about them. I told him all I knew. He said he knew you very well, and wished you had sent them to him before you paid the money, and that it was a regular swindle.'

"Dr. Dell felt very vexed that he had been so cheated, and told his coachman to take a cab and drive to his banker and stop the cheque if it had not been paid; and to put the horses in the stable for the present, and he would consider what he would do. So after he had seen a few patients, he took a cab and came up to me.

"I have been amused at his description of the old coachman of the family, so well made up with his Welsh wig, and his appearance altogether just such as you would find in an old family mansion in the country; and then the groom in a stylish uniform, so well got up, standing, booted and spurred, in a sort of theatrical attitude, with whip and saddle, ready to carry off the horses. I was amused, for the scenery was very well arranged. I told Dr. Dell it was a regular loss. Had he proposed at first to have had Mr. Field's certificate before he paid his money, the fellow would not have agreed to it, and the bargain would have been broken off. 'Yes,' said the Doctor, 'I see it now—it is too late. But I liked the appearance of the horses; and my wife was much pleased with them them, and she, being a Dorsetshire lass, always felt an interest in our having good horses. This, with the old family coachman, and the stylish groom, waiting apparently to take them away, quite put me off my guard. So you must pardon my indiscretion. It is now too late.' I suppose I must lose all—money and horses, too.'

"I told him I would get an active skilful police officer to inquire into it, and see if we can frighten the fellow out of some of the money, for the cheque has been paid; and that is all the consolation I could give him, and he has just left me as you came in."

"What shall you do?" I said; "the money is gone, and Dr. Dell will never get a farthing back?"

"I expect so," said S. R. "I shall speak to Inspector Beresford, who lives up by Russell Square, and get him to call at the stables and see and frighten the fellow, if possible, by threatening an indictment for the fraud; but I expect he is too old a hand to care about what Beresford may say, although Beresford will tell him he belongs to the police force. However, Dr. Dell is a rich man, and it will be a lesson to him at the cost of a few of his fees."

"Well," I said, "I will not take up more of your time now, but I will call at the end of the week, at about this hour, to learn the finish of the Doctor's mishap."

And we then parted.

At the end of the week, I called on friend S. R., according to promise. I found him in his office, busy writing a letter. I sat down and waited until he had finished, and given it to his clerk to be copied and posted.

"Well, my friend, I have come, as agreed, to hear the finish of Dr. Dell's affair."

He laughed, and said:

"It is all over. I have seen the Doctor this morning. He sent the horses to the sale-stables in Barbican, and they were sold yesterday, Friday being their sale day; and I fancy Gower, the auctioneer, like Mr. Field, recognized the horses as old acquaintances. However, the Doctor got £20 for the two, out of which he has to pay expenses. And Beresford has been with me. He went to the stables, but no person was there. An old woman living in the mews told him the stables had only been engaged by the man for three or four days, and she knew nothing of him; and several people had been there, making inquiries after him, but all the men had gone away and taken some horses with them. So the worthy Doctor has paid a little smart money for his experience. He has lost his own old horses, which were sound, and would have served him a few years longer. He has lost his one hundred guineas, and he must lay out fifty or one hundred more to get another pair of good working horses, although not so showy in their appearance. And this is what is known among the police as Horse-chanting."

My curiosity regarding Dr. Dell, who is a very worthy and benevolent man, much respected by all who knew him, being satisfied, after a little more general conversation, I took my leave of my old friend, on promise to see him again shortly, when he would be able to tell me a little more of his scenes in real life.

INDOOR GARDENING.

THERE are two general ways of enjoying flowers. Some people delight in having them merely for their beauty; others for the real love of them, liking to take care of them, and delighting to see them grow. The first taste is soon satisfied by buying a few plants now and then. The second is still more inexpensive, but here we give time and pains to them, and by noting as we learn to do, the plants that accord together, those that are easily grown, and those that we mostly care for, our enjoyment becomes vastly greater. The poorest and darkest room can thus find some plants to lighten it, and the gayest and gaudiest drawing-room can find some to tone it down and touch it with their refinement.

In Miss Nightingale's Notes on Nursing, there is abundant testimony against the popular prejudice which regards growing plants as unwholesome. Remarking on the folly of this ignorant and injurious, but far too prevalent notion, Dr. Lindley wrote in the following terms: "Until the prejudice is entirely removed, the fact cannot be too often repeated, that instead of plants vitiating the air, they do a great deal of good by producing a large quantity of fixed air, and thus play a most important part in the economy of Nature, by purifying and rendering wholesome the deleterious air breathed by animals."

The principal objection against having plants in a sitting-room can only apply to those which have strong-scented flowers—such as the night-scented stock, the Tuberose, the Narcissus, and the deliciously fragrant Hyacinth, if a large number of them are crowded together in a small apartment. When this is rightly understood, there is every probability that, with the increasing taste for flowers, indoor gardening will become a far more popular and fashionable amusement than it is at present.

Now, what can people want more? To determine what is good for people, they have Miss Nightingale's testimony, and that of many doctors. And here they have heard the verdict on the side of the plants' own nature, limiting exceedingly their powers of doing harm. The flowers too, to be beautiful, need by no means be numerous, and the more delicate scents are by far the most delightful. A single stand all covered with large, green, heart-shaped leaves, mingled with the drooping bells of the pink and white Ipomea, or Morning Glory flower—a rustic bark-like frame, filled with Red Hyacinths, mixed with the white waxen snowberry—a single Camellia outspreading its beautiful foliage and waxen flowers—any of these will enliven a room. But I do not want to induce my readers to stop short with any of these. Their sitting and drawing-rooms may become brilliant and overflow with flowers. Why do we not see our windows and balconies filled with plants as they are in England and on the Continent? There are quantities of plants which, with a slight protection of this kind, would produce a charm about our houses that is now wanting. It would be a difficult matter to sum up all the social qualities of plants and flowers. Do we not always feel welcome when, on entering a room, we find a display of flowers on the table and the windows? Where there are flowers about, does not the hostess appear glad, the children pleased, the very parrot is garrulous at our arrival, the whole scene and all the personages more hearty, homely, and beautiful, because of those bewitching roses, fuchsias, heliotropes, and mignonette? Assuredly of all simple domestic ornaments, flowers must have the first place.

"Better hang a wild rose over the toilette than nothing," says Leigh Hunt; "the eye that looks in the glass will see there something besides itself, and acquire something of a religious right to respect itself in thinking by how many objects in the creation the bloom of beauty is shared."

Speaking of breakfast in summer, the same prince of essayists says: "Set flowers on your table, a whole nosegay if you can get it, or but two or three, or a single flower—a rose, a pink, even a daisy. Bring a few daisies and buttercups from your last field walk, and keep them alive in water, and preserve but a bunch of clover or a handful of flowering grass—one of the most elegant as well as cheap of Nature's productions—and you have something on your table that reminds you of the beauty of God's creation, and gives you a link with the poets and sages that have done it most honor. Put but a rose or a lily, or a violet on your table, and you and Lord Bacon have a custom in common, for that great and wise man was in the habit of having the flowers in season set upon his table, morning, and we believe noon and night, that is to say, at all his meals; for dinner, in his time, was taken at noon, and why should he not have flowers at all his meals, seeing that they were growing all day? Now, here is a fashion that shall last you forever if you please, never changing with silks and velvets, nor dependent upon the caprice of some fine gentleman or lady. The fashion of the garments of heaven and earth endures forever, and you may adorn your table with specimens of their drapery, with flowers out of the fields, and golden beams out of the blue ether." Those who have gardens may multiply their enjoyments of them a hundredfold by keeping in mind the genial suggestion of Leigh Hunt. "Make the most of every ray of light that falls out of heaven to bless you at the window; there you may woo beauty and have it nod to you in a hundred forms; with a pair of scissors you may, every morning, cull a posy for the breakfast table, you may make the tables, and the mantel-pieces, and the quiet recesses of your room gay at all times, and the whole atmosphere of the house as odorous of flowers, as it is already morally sweet with the interchange of love's language and the expressions of high emotions of the heart."

"In princely halls and courts of kings,
Its lustrous ray the diamond flings;
Yet few of those who see its beams
Amid the torchlight's dazzling gleams—
As bright as though a meteor shone—
Can call the costly prize their own;
But gems of every form and hue
Are glittering here in morning dew;
Jewels that all alike may share
As freely as the common air."

IRIS.

McARONE.

I USED, in a recent one of these papers, the expression "halcyon days."

It is pretty well understood that the phrase signifies days of happiness, pure and unmitigated. Days of youth, and love, and plenty; of past hopes realized and future hopes strong; days without rheumatism, or biliousness.

Why "halcyon?"

The halcyon is, I believe, the kingfisher; a morose and distraught bird, that sits on a stake, over a swamp, when he can find one, silently looking out for kertoodle-bugs and skipjacks. From time to time he makes a sort of bound from his perch, uttering a very unpleasant shriek, catches his wings, pursues, overtakes, and devours a raw insect, and returns to squat upon his stake, staring creation blankly out of countenance, and giving his mind to skipjacks and kertoodle-bugs once more. Now what, I should like to know, has this dreadful creature to do with happiness? In what way are his dreary "days" connected with youth, and love, and plenty, and hopes realized?

As I have above stated, I am not guiltless of employing the expression "halcyon days," but I used it as I do many other things I know nothing about: patent medicines, for instance, and butcher's sausages.

Birds generally, are a good deal overrated. Lovers liken their mistresses to doves, not infrequently, and fond mothers address their offspring by the well-meant title of "my birdie."

It is not complimentary.

The room where I am writing is a second-floor front in the Riverside Hotel; a charming hostelry that stands on the bank of the charming Navesink river, near the charming village of Red Bank. This in the (shall I say charming?) State of New Jersey. It is my wateriug-place, where I have come for the balance of "the season." My windows overlook a piazza-roof, a narrow grassy plateau, and the blue bend of the river between its warm red ochre-colored bluffs."

On the piazza-roof, three sparrows assemble. They cock their heads about in a variety of positions . . . probably they're cock sparrows . . . stand on the edge of the cornice where the wind ruffles their throat-down all the wrong way; and, when opportunity presents itself, pursue their precarious means of procuring a livelihood.

Just now, a gray miller, driven by adverse breezes, fluttered feebly around the corner, and was cast upon the roof.

The sparrow nearest to this unfortunate insect gave a little hop . . . not at all like the little hops the proprietors of the Riverside used to give . . . and drove his beak quite through the miller's body. This done, he made a swallow of it. Now, this is by no means the least innocent, cunning, or interesting bird in the American fauna.

But what would you think of a human creature who should act in such a barbarous and nasty way? How if a gentleman who had a fancy to breakfast on veal, should pounce upon a live calf and run his nose through it, first?

On the plateau of green grass that fronts the hotel, a small party of late bluebirds are displaying precisely the same degraded tastes. And it is not only the humble sparrow or bluebird that does this thing.

The most mellifluous nightingale that ever drew tears from an Eastern princess' almond eyes, had a natural but depraved hankering after fat little white worms with black shiny heads.

On moral questions, too, birds are extremely obtuse, as a rule. The greater part of them indulge in what are sometimes called "liberal ideas," in matrimonial matters. In fact, the number of kinds that choose and retain a permanent mate, is very small. The great majority make a new match every spring.

I am not informed what the principles of the kingfisher are, regarding this subject. I have never seen him except solitary and alone. If he has a mate, he makes her pass her halcyon days somewhere away from him.

One would no more think of seeing two kingfishers together, than two Sundays . . . which, heaven forbid!

The bird business, then, like many another poetic tradition, has a good deal of nonsense in it.

You say Madame X. is a splendid woman . . . graceful, and "swanlike." The swan is a great splay-footed thing that eats live frogs and newts, and soils the margin of lakes. Perhaps "Chickabiddy" is as inoffensive an ornithological endearment as can be applied to woman.

The domestic hen, though not precisely graceful, and liable to be tempted occasionally by a dead mouse or a bit of raw meat, is, after all, quite as well-behaved as any of her more pretentious sisters.

"Ducky," however, is inadmissible and unpardonable. "Piggy" would be just as flattering.

The idea of comparing your loved one to a creature whose head is all mouth, whose walk is a deformed waddle, whose sweetest note sounds like driving carpet-tacks, and whose food is offal! . . . It is a little too much.

It were far better to call her a cow. The cow has dignity; the duck has none. The cow has strong maternal instincts, and may have beauty: the duck has, and can have, neither.

(But, between you and me, I would like to hear you call your beloved a cow, once, just to try it. I think it would entertain me.)

In some cases, for all that I know, husbands may endow their wives with the sobriquet of "ducky," etc., meaningly; having, as it were, a sardonic belief that the vulgar and porcine instincts of the bird could be also found developed in the woman. Such covert sarcasm reminds me of my old derivation of the word "Hippodrome," from two Greek nouns, hippos, a hum, and dromos, a bug. It is far more true than correct.

It may be that some person possessed of more than the average share of temerity may ask me, with a supercilious air, how it affects me to hear a man call his chosen one a cabbage. It is true that chou, in French, is cabbage in English. But does that indicate that Chou-chou means cabbage, too? I guess not: Otherwise, there must be no difference between a bull and a bul-bul!

(O, fetch on your linguists! I haven't read the Astor Library through and committed it to memory for nothing.)

Then again, there's nothing bad about a cabbage. It would have been a rose if it had been red. It is very wholesome food. It is a clean and well-behaved vegetable, in whose sturdy petals the clearest, purest, morning dew loves to linger. Its broad outer leaves have hold Mr. Hall's waxy strawberries, raspberries, blackberries, mulberries, barberries, bilberries, and huckleberries, ever since those things were first put upon a good-natured public.

Nothing shall be said against the cabbage, then; and in case it be decided that two choux are only equivalent to one, little harm will be done, after all.

There is, indeed, no mundane production to which I can compare Aimée Chou-chou. Fish, flesh, fowl, and vegetables . . . all are but cold and unsympathetic, to reflect her loveliness.

When I see that dear child, I try to call her some caressing name, but she only suggests to me, in a vague and glittering way, a confusion of cream caramels, half opened roses and Heaven, for which there is neither nomenclature nor rationality.—New York Weekly Review.

MUSICAL ITEMS.

AT HOME.

THE New Nation says: Verdi's music is well suited to Victor Hugo's dramas, as they have many points in common. Both are sensational and exaggerated. "Ernani" belongs to Verdi's earlier manner, when he composed almost entirely in the blood-and-thunder style, and is of his best works at that period. His faults of orchestration and accompaniment, his way of massing brass and wind instruments against violins, and playing them off against each other, are very visible here. There is, however, great power of vocalization shown, and considerable wealth of melody. It is full of brief airs, with short rhythms, which are pleasing to the public because they are vigorous and ardent. The music is better in character than Petrella's, but comes far short of perfection. "Ernani" is not as good an opera as "Trovatore," "Traviata," or "Il Ballo in Maschera," but is much less hackneyed and worn out by repetition, and so we hope that it will be given oftener this winter. If we must hear Verdi, and we are always doomed to half a season of him, let us have something that is a little fresher than what we are accustomed to. It is natural that his music should be popular, for it is suited to our unrest, as it was to Italian political excitement, and those who go to hear operas are too immersed in business and pleasure to consider whether they are getting the best kind of enjoyment, or to ask themselves if the effect of the music on them is the best, as long as they enjoy the hours while they hear it.

THE Round Table remarks: Adelaide Phillips reappears before a New York audience this season, after an absence of four years passed in Europe and California. During that time she has not improved. Her noble, rich voice, it is true, is in most points as noble and rich as ever; but there is an effort in her singing—an audible respiration—that is very annoying to the listener. Whenever the accomplished contralto overcomes this, she is as acceptable as when she sang with La Grange and Brignoli.

THE New York Review has the following: The effect of the Orphan schools has proved beneficial in many ways. Pupils from them have been engaged as choir-boys in Trinity Church, New York, Holy Trinity, Brooklyn, Lawrence Street Church, Brooklyn, and even in concert troupes. Such an opportunity as offers here should not be allowed to pass by unimproved by the public. Mr. Morgan, the organist, who has returned from his tour through the West, will probably make the "great organ" in Boston resound on the occasion of some of the Parepa concerts. Theodore Formes, the celebrated tenor of Berlin, is among us, and will probably appear in opera. We have not heard the gentleman for about eight years, but are sure that his triumph will be brilliant if he is in possession of at least a part of his former voice. We are assured that Mr. Formes is now better in voice than ever. He is an accomplished artist and dramatic actor, and highly cultivated in art.

FOREIGN.

THE New York Review gives the following items: In the Grand Opera L'Africaine is continued with laudable energy, and the opera Masaniello has made also an ephemeral appearance. Of the very often mentioned new prima donna, Mdlle. Mauduit, much is expected in Robert. For the latter part of the season La Forza del Destino is expected, all Parisians praying already: "Holy Verdi, give us our yearly opera!"

MISS BATEMAN is fulfilling a successful engagement at the Theatre Royal, Liverpool.

LETTERS from Vienna announce that L'Africaine will shortly be produced in that city.

WE hear that Crispino e la Comare will be the opening piece this year for M. Bagier's troupe in Paris.

MR. BENEDICT is at work on a grand opera for the German stage, founded on the exquisite psychological story by Schiller, the Ghost-Seer. Pauline Lucca, the personable, the wayward, is kept in eye—or, rather, in ear—for the heroine's role.

THE new opera by M. Cherouvrier, in rehearsal at the Theatre Lyrique, is entitled Les Rois des Mines.

Two nocturnes, just written by Gounod for pianoforte, will be shortly published.

PROFESSOR NOHL, of Munich, is reported to have discovered a hitherto unknown pianoforte composition by Beethoven. It is a piece in A minor, written in the composer's own hand, and is inscribed "Pour Elisa, April 27."

PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S favorite poem, entitled "Mortality," by William Knox, a young Scotch poet who died at Edinburgh in 1825, has been printed in sheet form by Thomas W. Hartley, Philadelphia. It is also to be found, together with some of the poet's other productions, in Scotia's Bards, a fine work published by Carter & Brothers, New York, in 1856.

THE FAIRY TUTOR.

"IN days of yore there lived alone in her castle, a maiden named Swanhilda. She was the only child of a proud father, lately deceased. Her mother she had lost when she was but a child, so that the education of the daughter had fallen wholly into the hands of the father.

"During the lifetime even of the old knight, many suitors had offered themselves for Swanhilda; but she seemed to be insensible to every tender emotion, and dismissed with disdainful haughtiness the whole body of wooers. Meanwhile she hunted the stag and the boar, and performed squire's service for her gradually declining parent. This manner of life was so entirely to the taste of the maiden, notwithstanding that in delicacy of frame, and in bewitching gracefulness of figure, she gave place to none of her sex, that when at length her father died, she took upon herself the management of the castle, and lived aloof in pride and independence, in the very fashion of an Amazon. Mangre the many refusals which Swanhilda had already distributed on every side, there still flocked to her loving knights, eager to wed: but, like their predecessors, they were all sent drooping home again. The young nobility could at last bear this treatment no longer; and they, one and all, resolved either to constrain the supercilious damsel to wedlock, or to make her smart for a refusal. An embassy was dispatched, charged with notifying this resolution to the mistress of the castle. Swanhilda heard the speakers quietly to the end: but her answer was tuned as before, or, indeed, rang harsher and more offensive than ever. Turning her back upon the embassy, she left them to depart, scorned and ashamed.

"In the night following the day upon which this happened, Swanhilda was disturbed out of her sleep by a noise which seemed to her to ascend from her chamber floor; but let her strain her eyes as she might, she could for a long while discern nothing. At length she observed, in the middle of the room, a straggling sparkle of light, that threw itself over and over like a tumbler, tittering, at the same time like a human being. Swanhilda for a while kept herself quiet; but as the luminous antic ceased not practising his harlequinade, she peevishly exclaimed: 'What buffoon is carrying on his fooleries here? I desire to be left in peace.' The light vanished instantly, and Swanhilda already had congratulated herself upon gaining her point, when suddenly a loud shrilly sound was heard—the floor of the apartment gave way, and from the gap there arose a table set out with the choicest viands. It rested upon a lucid body of air, upon which the tiny attendants skipped with great agility to and fro, waiting upon seated guests. At first Swanhilda was so amazed that her breath forsook her; but, becoming by degrees somewhat collected, she observed, to her extreme astonishment, that an effigy of herself sat at the strange table, in the midst of the numerous train of suitors, whom she had so haughtily dismissed. The attendants presented to the young knights the daintiest dishes, the savor of which came sweetly-smelling enough to the nostrils of the proud damsel. As often, however, as the knights were helped to meat and drink, the figure of Swanhilda at the board was presented by an ill-favored Dwarf, who stood as her servant behind her, with an empty basket, whereat the suitors broke out into wild laughter. She also soon became aware, that as many courses were served up to the guests as she had heretofore dispensed refusals, and the amount of these was certainly not small.

"Swanhilda, weary of the absurd phantasmagoria, was going to speak again; but, to her horror, she discovered that the power of speech had left her. She had for some time been struck with a kind of whispering and tittering about her. In order to make out whence this proceeded, she leaned out of her bed, and, peering between the silk curtains, perceived two smart diminutive cupbearers, in garments of blue, with green aprons, and small yellow caps. She had scarcely got sight of the little gentleman when their whispering took the character of audible words; and the dumb Swanhilda was enabled to overhear the following discourse:

"'But, I pri'thee, tell me, Sweetflower, how this show shall end?' said one of the two cupbearers—'thou art, we know, the confidant of our queen, and, certes, canst disclose to me somewhat of her plans?'

"'That can I, my small-witted Monsieur Silverfine,' answered Sweetflower. 'Know, therefore, that this sweet and lovely to behold brute of a girl is now beginning to suffer the castigation due to her innumerable offences. Swanhilda has sinned against all maidenly modesty, has borne herself proud and overbearing towards honorable gentlemen, and, besides, has most seriously offended our queen.'

"'How so?' inquired Silverfine.

"'By storming on her Barbary steed, like the devil himself, through the thick of our States' Assembly, pounding the arms and legs of I don't know how many of our sapient representatives. What makes the matter worse is, that this happened at the very opening of the diet, and whilst the grand prelusive symphony of the whole hidden people was in full burst. We were sitting by hundreds of thousands upon blades, stalks, and leaves; some of us still actively busied arranging comfortable seats for the older people in the blue harebells. For this we had stripped the skins of sixty thousand red field spiders, and wrought them into canopies and hangings. All our talented performers had tuned their instruments, scraped, fluted, twanged, jingled and shawmed to their hearts' content, and had resined their fiddlesticks upon the freshet of dewdrops. All at once, tearing out of the wood, with your leave, or without your leave, comes this monster of a girl, plump upon upper house and lower house together. Ah, lack-a-daisy! what a massacre it was! The first hoof struck a thousand of our prime orators dead upon the spot, the other three hoofs scattered the Imperial Diet in all directions, and, what is worse than all, tore to pieces a number of our exquisite caps. Our queen was almost frantic at the breach of the peace—she stamped with her foot, and cried out, "LIGHTNING!" and what that means we all pretty well know. Just at this time, too, she received information of the maiden's arrogant behavior towards her suitors, and on the instant she determined to put the sinner to her prayers. We began by devouring everything clean up, giving her the pleasure of looking on.'

"'Silly, absurd creatures!' thought Swanhilda, as the little butler advanced to the table to put on some fresh wine. During his absence she had time to note how perhaps a dozen other Fairies drew up through the floor whole pailfuls of wine and smoking meats, which were conveyed immediately to the table, and there consumed as if by the wind. She was heartily longing for the day to dawn, that the sun might dissipate her dream, when the sprightly little speaker came to his place again.

"'Now we can gossip a little longer,' said Sweetflower 'My guests are provided for, and between this and cock-crow—when house and cellar will be emptied—there's some time yet.'

"Swanhilda uttered (mentally) a prodigious imprecation, and turned herself so violently in the bed, that the little gentlemen were absolutely terrified.

"'I verily believe we are going to have an earthquake!' said Silverfine.

"'No such thing!' answered Sweetflower. "The amiable young lady in bed there has seen the sport perhaps, and is very likely not altogether pleased with it.'

"'Don't you think she would speak, if she saw all this wastefulness going on?' asked Silverfine.

"'Yes, if she could!' chuckled Sweetflower. 'But our queen has been cruel enough to strike her dumb, whilst she looks upon this heartbreaking spectacle. If she once wakes, she won't be troubled again with sleep before cock-crow."

"'A pretty business!' thought Swanhilda, once more tossing herself about passionately in her bed.

"'Quite right!' said Sweetflower triumphantly. 'The imp of a girl has waked up.'

"'Insolent wretches!' said Swanhilda (internally) 'Brute and imp to me? Oh, if I could only speak!'

"'Why, the whole fun of the thing is,' said Sweetflower, almost bursting with laughter, 'just that that wish won't be gratified. Does the fool of a woman think that she is to trample down our orchestra with impunity, to put our States' Assembly to flight, and to crush our very selves into a jelly?

"'And the unbidden guests divine my very thoughts!' thought Swanhilda. 'Upon my life, it looks as if a spice of omniscience had really crept under their caps!'

"'Why, of course!' answered Sweetflower.

"'Then will I think no more!' resolved Swanhilda.

"'And there, my prudent damsel, you show a good discretion,' returned Sweetflower, saluting her with an ironical bow.

"'How will it be, then, with our caps?' inquired Silverfine, 'Are they to be repaired?'

"'Oh, certainly,' returned Sweetflower; 'and that will cost our Amazon here more than all. Indeed, the conditions of her punishment are to make good the caps, to pledge her troth to one of her despised suitors, to compensate the rest with magnificent gifts, and, for the future, never to mount hunter more, but to amble upon a gentle palfrey, as a lady should. And, till then, am I to have the teaching of her.'

"'Pretty conditions, truly!' thought Swanhilda. 'I would rather die than keep them.'

"'Just as you please, most worthy madam,' answered Sweetflower; 'but you'll think better of it yet, perhaps.'

"'It will fall heavy enough upon her,' said Silverfine, 'seeing that we have it in command to seize upon all the lady's treasures.'

"'Capital, capital!' shouted Sweetflower. 'That's peppering the punishment truly! For now must this haughty manhating creature go about begging, catching, and carrying fish to market, and so submitting herself to the scorn and laughter of all her former lovers, till her trade makes her rich again. Nothing but lack in fishing will our queen vouchsafe the audacious madam. Three years are allowed her. But, in the interim, she must starve and famish like a white mouse learning to dance.'

"At this moment a monstrous burst of laughter roared from the table. The guests sang aloud:

> "The last flagon we end,
> Swanhilda shall mend;
> Huzza, knights, and drink
> To the last dollar's chink!

"As the song ceased, the table descended, the floor closed up, and stillness was in the room again, as when the lady had first retired to her couch. The cock crowed, and Swanhilda fell into a deep sleep.

"When it left her, the sun already shone high and bright, and played on her silken bed-curtains. She rubbed her eyes, and seeing everything about her in its usual state, she concluded that what had happened was nothing worse than a feverish dream. She now arose, began dressing herself, and would have allayed her waking thirst, but she could find neither glass nor water-pitcher. Angrily she called to her waiting-woman:

"'How came you to forget water, blockhead?' she exclaimed; 'get some quickly, and then—Breakfast!'

"The attendant departed, shaking her head; for she knew well enough that everything had been put in order as usual on the evening before. Very quickly she returned, frightened out of her wits, and hardly able to speak.

"'Oh my lady! my lady! my lady!' she stammered out.

"'Well, where is the water?'

"'Gone! all drained and dried up; Tub, brook, well—all empty and dry!'

"'Is it possible?' said Swanhilda. 'Your eyes have surely deceived you! But never mind—bring up my breakfast. A ham and two Pomeranian geese-breasts.'

"'Alack! gracious lady!' answered the girl, sobbing, 'everything in the house is gone too! The wine-casks lie in pieces on the cellar floor; the stalls are empty; your favorite horse is away—hay and corn rotted through. It is shocking!'

"Swanhilda dismissed her, and broke out at first into words wild and vehement: she checked them; but tears of disappointment and bitter rage forced their way in spite of her. A visit to her cellar, store-rooms, and granaries, convinced her of the horrible transformation which a night had effected in everything that belonged to her. She found nothing everywhere but mould and sickly-smelling mildew; and was too soon aware that the hideous images of the night were nothing less than frightful realities. Her hardened heart stood proof; and since the whole region for leagues around was turned into a blighted brown heath, she at once resolved to die of hunger. Ere noon her few servants had deserted the castle, and Swanhilda herself hungered till her bowels growled again.

"This laudable self-castigation she persevered in for three days long, when her hunger had increased to such a pitch that she could no longer remain quiet in the castle. In a state of half consciousness, she staggered down to the lake, known far and wide by the name of the Castle mere. Here, on the glassy surface, basked the liveliest fishes. Swanhilda for a while watched in silence the disport of the happy creatures, then snatched up a hazel wand lying at her feet, round the end of which a worm had coiled, and half maddened by the joyance of the finny tribe, struck with it into the water. A greedy fish snapped at the switch. The famishing Swanhilda clutched hungeringly at it, but found in her hand a piece of offensive carrion, and nothing more; whilst around, from every side, there rang such a clatter of commingled mockery and laughter, that Swanhilda vented a terrible imprecation, and shed once more—a scorching tear.

"'Oh, we shall soon have you tame enough!" said a voice straight before her, and she recognized it at once for the speaker of that miserable night. Looking about her, she perceived a moss-rose that luxuriated upon the rock. In one of the expanded buds sat a little kicking fellow, with green apron, sky-blue vest, and yellow bonnet. He was laughing right into the face of the angry miss; and, quaffing off one little flower-cup after another, filled them bravely again, and jingled with his tiny bunch of keys, as if he had been grand butler to the universe.

"'A flavor like a nosegay!' said the malicious rogue. 'Wilt hob-nob with me, maiden? What do you say? Are we adepts at sacking a house? 'Twill give thee trouble to fill thy cellars again as we found them. Take heart, girl. If you come to, and take kindly to your angling, and do the thing that's handsome by your wooers, you shall have an eatable dinner yet up at the castle.'

"'Infamous pigmy!' exclaimed Swanhilda, lashing with her rod, as she spoke, at the little rose. The small bufferteer meanwhile had leaped down, and in the turning of a hand, had perched himself upon the lady's nose, where he drummed an animating march with his heels.

"'Thy nose, I do protest, is excellently soft, thou wicked witch!' said the rascal. 'If thou wilt now try thy hand at fishing for the town market, thou shalt be entertained the while with the finest band of music in the world. Be good and pretty, and take up thy angling rod. Trumpets and drums, flutes and clarionets, shall all strike up together.'

"Swanhilda tried hard to shake the jocular tormentor off, but he kept his place on the bridge as if he had grown to it. She made a snatch at him, and he bit her finger.

"'Hark'e, my damsel!' quoth Sweetflower; 'if you are so unmannerly, 'tis time for a lesson. You smarted too little when you were a young one. We must make all that good now;' and forthwith he settled himself properly upon he nose, dangling a leg on either side, like a cavalier in saddle. 'Come, my pretty, be industrious,' continued he; 'get to work, and follow good counsel.' And then he whistled a blithe and gamesome tune.

"Swanhilda, not needlessly to prolong her own vexation, dipped the rod into the water, and immediately saw another gleaming fish wriggling at its end. A basket, delicately woven of flowers, stood beside her, half filled with clear water. The fish dropped into it of themselves. The wee companion beat meanwhile with his feet upon the wings of the lady's nose, played ten instruments or more at once, and extemporized a slight rambling rhyme, wherein arch gibes and playful derision of her present forlorn estate were not unmingled with auguries of a friendlier future.

"'There, you see! where's the distress?' said the urchin, laughing. 'The basket is as full as it can hold. Off with you to the town, and when your fish are once sold, you may make yourself—some water gruel.' With these words the elf leaped into the fish-basket, crept out again on the other side, plucked a king-cup, took seat in it, and gave the word—'Forwards!' The flower, on the instant, displayed its petals. There appeared sail and rudder to the small and delicate ship, which at once took motion and sailed gaily through the air.

"'A prosperous market to you, Swanhilda!' cried Sweetflower; 'behave discreetly now, and do your tutor justice!'

"Swanhilda, perforce, resigned herself to her destiny. She took her basket, and carried it home, intending to disguise herself as completely as possible before making for the town. But all her clothes lay crumbling in the dust. Needs must she then, harassed by hunger and thirst, begin her weary walk, equipped as she was, in her velvet riding-habit.

"Without fatigue, surprised at her celerity—she was in the market-place. The eyes of all naturally took the direction of the well-born fisherwoman. Still pity held the tongue of scorn in thrall, and Swanhilda speedily saw her basket emptied. Once more within her castle walls, she beheld a running spring in the courtyard, and near it an earthen pitcher. She filled—drank—and carried the remainder to the hall, where she found a small fire burning, a pipkin, and a loaf. She submissively cooked herself a meagre pottage of bread and water, appeased the cravings of nature, and fell into a sound sleep.

"Morning came, and she awoke with thirst burning afresh. She hastened to the spring, but fountain and pitcher were no longer there. In their stead a hoarse laugh greeted her; and in the next instant she perceived the tiny butler, astride upon a cork, galloping before her across the courtyard, and addressing his pupil with another snatch of his derisive song.

"The courage of Swanhilda surmounted her wrath, and she carried her fish-basket to the lake. It was soon filled, and she again on her way to market. An amazing multitude of people were already in motion there, who presently thronged about the market-woman. The basket was nearly emptied, when two of her old suitors approached. Swanhilda was confounded, and a blush of deep shame inflamed her countenance. Curiosity and the pleasure of malice spurred them to accost her; but the sometime-haughty damsel cast her eyes upon the ground, and in answer tendered her fish for sale! The knights bought; mixing, however, ungentle gibes with their good coin. Swanhilda, at the moment, caught sight of her tutor peeping from a daisy—saluting her with his little cap, and nodding approbation.

"'I would you were in the kingdom of pepper!" thought Swanhilda, and in the next instant the fairy was running upon her nose and cheeks, most unmercifully stamping, and tickling her with a little hair till she sneezed again.

"'Stay, stay, I must teach thee courtesy, if I can. What! a profound swearer, too! Wish me in the kingdom of pepper! We'll have pepper growing on thy soft cheeks here. There, there—is that pepper? Thou art rogued, my lady, ready for a ball!'

"Swanhilda turned upon her homeward way, the adhesive Elf still tripping ceaselessly about her face, and bore her infliction with a virtuous patience. In her court and hall she found, as before, the spring, the bread, and the fire. As before, she satisfied hunger, and thirst, and slept—the sweeter already for her punishment and pain.

"And so passed day after day. The tricky Elf became a less severe, still trusty shoolmaster. The profits of her trading, under fairy guardianship, were great to marvelling; and it must be owned that her aversion to angling craft did not increase in proportion. As time ran on, she had encountered all her discarded knights, now singly and now in companies. A year and a half elapsed, and left the relation between suitors and maiden as at the beginning. At length a chivalric and gentle knight, noble in person as in birth, ventured to accost her, loving and reverently as in her brighter days of yore. Abashed, overcome with shame, the maiden was at the mercy of the light-winged, blithe, and watchful god, who seized his hour to enthrone himself upon her heart. She bought the fairy caps and mantles—she made honorable satisfaction to the knights, and to him whose generous constancy had won her heart, she gave a willing and a softened hand.

Upon her wedding day, the QUIET PEOPLE did not fail to adorn the festival with their radiant presence; albeit the merry creatures played a strange cross-game on the occasion. The blissful day over, and the happy bride and bridegroom withdrawing from the banquet and the dance, the well pleased, chirping, able, little tutor hopped before them, and led them to the hymeneal bower with floral lute, and gratulatory song!"

WIT AND FOLLY.

WISE men would be the aristocrats of the world, and govern it as they pleased, if it were not that fools are often more than a match for them. "Life," says an observant writer, "would be too pleasant to men of merit, if they always encountered people who were sensible of it: they would only have to present themselves to command success. They would be almost all kings and rich men, who do and make whatever they please, except rain and fine weather. Honored of all, honored by all, they would be the aristocrats of our society, the privileged class. But Providence, to establish equality, has created fools in the world. They are destined to arrest the progress of the man of merit, and to render his talents useless; for the man most expert in striking sensibility, reason and mind, can do nothing where there is neither mind, reason, nor sensibility.

The artful schemes of the wise man are often defeated by the defects of his inferiors in intellect. For instance, three Englishmen were hunting a thief who was a native of Wiltshire. In going through Brentford, they read a sign, "Wiltshire Inn."

"Let us go in here," said one. "We shall surely find him: that is the inn for Wiltshire folks."

"Nonsense," said another; that's the very reason he won't be there."

"Take care," said the third, who was considered the wisest of the three. "It is possible that he may have chosen that that place precisely because he would be very sure that we shouldn't look for him there."

They went in, and searched from garret to cellar, but did not find the object of their search. The robber had passed the inn without entering; he could not not read, consequently the name of the inn had not influenced him at all; a supposition that had not occurred to either of his pursuers.

An intelligent man is apt to make his combinations and calculations too perfect: he sees too far, and takes too high a range of view: he attributes to others a part of his own wit and information, preparing himself an answer to all the good reasons that can be opposed to him, and is taken in default because he is met by only a bad reason. This is a fact which the experience of almost any practical man of the world will bear testimony to. For instance, a man who was compelled to pass over a certain piece of road haunted by a ferocious dog, which attacked every one that came in his way, laid all his plans for subduing his brute adversary. As soon as the dog should spring upon him, he determined to seize him by the ears, and thus he felt sure he could master him. He therefore marched on sturdily to the encounter; but he was worsted in the skirmish, because the dog's ears had been cropped close to his head.

It is said that the Athenians could not entrap the Bœotians because they spread their nets too high; the Bœotians being the most stupid people of all Greece. They had no conception of intellectual ingenuities; they would believe nothing but downright falsehood, and understood, apparently, nothing but gross absurdity. To tell a man of this sort that the earth revolves on its axis would be but to produce a smile of incredulity or pity; but tell him that the sun rises out of the water every morning, and sets behind the steadfast hills every night, and he agrees with you without a murmur.

"There are some folks, squire," said a worthy agriculturist to the learned magistrate of his town, "that say the sun don't rise, but the airth turns round: but you and I know better, squire, because we get up airly, and see it rise."

We remember very well, a few years ago, when a certain spurious mermaid was exhibited, that the showman remarked, very truthfully, that he preferred to talk upon the subject with clergymen and naturalists, because they believed him without question.

A THEATRICAL HERMANN.—An attempt, and a successful one, to mystify a young hair-dresser, was made recently by a conjurer. The latter sat down in the chair, and told the country youth to prepare his brush and comb, and while his back was turned so arranged matters that it seemed to the youth that the customer had disappeared, leaving in his stead a bleeding, grimacing head, denuded of all body, but resting still on the top of the dress which he had put on for hair-cutting. The man fled in dismay, and alarmed the house, but when he returned, in company with others, he was met by the aspect of the customer tranquilly seated, and waiting patiently, as he said, to have his hair cut by the stupid assistant, whose wits must be disordered. The name of the prestidigitateur to whom the credit of this feat is due is Nicolas, of the Grand Theatre Parisien.

POLISH BOOTS.—These boots, it is said, will be worn on the street. They are, however, very expensive, and most ladies will prefer a well-fitting laced or buttoned boot, which is quite as useful, and costs but half as much. For full dress and for home, black satin gaiters and slippers are the most elegant, white being retained for very light robes. An effort is being made to introduce walking boots of the color of the dress; but it will not succeed.—Tribune.

ANECDOTES OF NAPOLEON.

MADAME WALESKA seems to have been the general belle of Warsaw. On the night when Napoleon first saw this woman, at a ball, General Bertraud and Louis de Perigord appeared as her public admirers. "They both," said he, "kept hovering emulously round her." But Napoleon, Emperor, husband, and mature as he was, chose to play the gallant on this evening also. Finding the two Frenchmen in the way of his attentions, he played the Emperor with effect on the spot. He gave an order to Berthier, then head of his staff, instantly to send off M. Perigord "to obtain news of the Sixth Corps," which was on the Passarge. Thus one inconvenience was got rid of, but Bertrand was still present, and during supper his attentions were so marked that, as he leaned over Madame's chair, his aiguilettes danced on her shoulders. "Upon this," said Napoleon, "my impatience was roused to such a pitch that I touched him on the arm and drew him to the recess of a window, where I gave him orders to set out for the headquarters of Prince Jerome, and without losing an hour to bring me a report of the siege of Breslau." Such it is to come in the way of Emperors. "The poor fellow was scarcely gone," adds Napoleon, "when I repented of my angry impulse; and I should certainly have recalled him had I not remembered at the same minute that his presence with Jerome would have been useful to me."

Napoleon had long lived in dread of poison. "I have escaped posioning," said he, "ten times, if I have once." In St. Helena he never eat or drank anything which had not been tasted first by one of the household! Montholon, during the night, constantly tasted the drink prepared for him. On this subject, Napoleon tole the following anecdote:

He was one day leaving the dinner table with the Empress Josephine and two or three other persons, when, as he was about to put his hand in his pocket for his snuff-box, he perceived it lying on the mantel-piece, in the saloon which he was entering. He was about to open it and take a pinch, when his good star caused him to seat himself. He then felt that his snuff-box was in one of his pockets. This excited inquiry, and on sending the two boxes to be chemically tested, the snuff on the mantel-piece was discovered to be poisoned." After this, (remarks an unfriendly critic, in reviewing M. Monthelon's history,) it is somewhat absurd in the author to give his hero credit for sang froid, and say of him that no one could take fewer precautions against such dangers than the Emperor. His whole life seems to have been precautionary; still he sententiously talked the nonsense of fatalism.

"Our last hour is written above," was his frequent remark. He had some absurdities on the subject of medicine, which would very effectually have assisted the fulfillment of this prediction. He had an idea that he should cure himself of his immediate disease, and perhaps of every other, by swallowing orange-flower water, and soup a la reine.

TENNYSON AND HIS RHYMES.—Perhaps there is no poet in whom the melody of versification is more strongly marked; and in none of his poems is the melody more beautifully apparent than in "The Dying Swan," which is very music itself. The following lines paint most perfectly a fen subject:

"One willow o'er the river wept,
And shook the wave as the wind did sigh:
Above, in the wind, was the swallow,
Chasing itself at its own wild will,
And far thro' the mariah green and still,
The tangled water-courses slept,
Shot over with purple and green and yellow."

It will be observed that yellow is here made to rhyme with swallow; a rhyme that is certainly not sanctioned either by "Pronouncing Dictionaries" or delicate ears. Now, how was this? for the laureate's rhymes are as perfect as any other portion of his verse. Doubtless, it arose in this way: Tennyson was an eastern-county man, born (as his biographers tell us) "at his father's parsonage, at Somerby, in Lincolnshire, in 1809," where, most probably, he would hear yellow pronounced yallow by men of good birth and education, and would so pronounce it himself; and, what more natural, therefore, than for a Lincolnshire poet, in describing a Lincolnshire scene, to make use of a Lincolnshire rhyme? Elsewhere—as, for example, in the "Lotos-Eaters"—he rhymes yellow in the customary way, Lincolnshire fens not being in view; just in the same way that Swift, although usually obedient to the laws of Pronouncing Dictionaries, often throws off the yoke, and then, as an Irishman describing Irish scenes, makes use of Irish rhymes—for the Dean wrote with rapidity and national enthusiasm, and, when once carried away with his subject, did not pause to blot the rhyme that made music to the Irish ear. What rhymes could be more Irish than the following, which occur in Swift's brief poem called "The Journal of a Modern Lady," who was, of course, a lady of the Emerald Isle: Severe and air, severe and share, put and cut, pays and keys, stays and please, tears and forswears, rake well and sequel—which are no rhymes unless they be given with the brogue.—Cuthbert Bede.

HOUSEHOLD POETRY.

AMONG the peculiar experiences that belong to the editor's profession, is the infliction, at irregular intervals, of old scraps of newspaper poetry, which come to him through the medium of the Post Office, or are deliberately offered at the hands of some valued friend, with the hint that his paper would be benefited by their republication. A cursory examination of these articles usually discloses the fact that they are worn quite illegible, from having been carried in the vest pocket through a long series of years, or that they have acquired a mouldy and metallic flavor, from constant contact with coin in the port monnaie of the owner. A closer inspection shows that they invariably bear reference to somebody's mother, daughter, or relative, or contain an enthusiastic eulogium of a baby. Indeed, the amount of baby poetry annually cut out of newspapers, with the intention sooner or later of inflicting them upon some editor, is something that cannot be contemplated with equanimity; but even this, is actually exceeded in quantity by the sum of elegaic and obituary memorials. Most of these excerpts are taken from the columns of country papers; and their bland imbecility of thought and utter lack of application and adaptability, compel the editor to decline their publication, with thanks. It is singular, by the way, how universal is this desire to hoard newspaper poetry. The work-basket of the matron, the secret drawer of the maiden, the desk of the school girl, hold in their recesses some scraps of verse, which have long been carefully preserved and hidden. Nor is the sterner sex free from this weakness. You may chance upon one of these fragments in the pigeon-hole of the banker's desk, or between the leaves of a dusty law book. Every one has, at some time in his or her life, carefully embalmed some one of these poetical effusions. You are conversing with the stern father of your Melissa, and in deference to your proclivities or tastes, the conversation turns upon Tennyson or Longfellow. The stern father is reminded, sir, of some verses which, when a young man—about your own age, sir—he cut from the columns of the Bungtown Independent. He does not claim to be a critic, nor does he wish to make invidious comparisons with Tennyson, but, for real sentiment and sublimity, he has never seen them surpassed. He is perhaps prejudiced, for he was acquainted with the young man who wrote them. That young person, sir, had no education—was brought up in a saw-mill, and broke both his legs at the age of seventeen—(it is remarkable how some people consider these accidents, which are usually embarrassing, to be peculiarly favorable to poetic development.) He will read them. He fumbles in an old drawer, extracts a discolored slip of newspaper, and begins. But here we pause—perhaps they are "Lines on Immortality," perhaps "Stanzas to an Only Sister," or "On Friendship." At all events, we recoil instinctively from the first line. But it is pleasant to see the water come in the old boy's eyes as he reads, to hear his voice grow tremulous and husky as he winds up each dreary stanza; and the smile which the sentiment suggested is lost in sympathy with the reader's unfeigned sincerity. If you know any young matron, dressed in mourning, avoid approaching her with a poetical quotation. You will be shown "Lines," and will be asked to recognize in some comfortless abstraction, in the mechanical formula of a hard theology—a likeness to some joyous-lived and golden-haired little fellow, whose innocent life was a symbol of flowing goodness and unconscious faith. Should you fail to appreciate the surprising likeness, you will be looked upon as hard-hearted; should you appreciate it, you have profited little by your knowledge of the original.

THANKSGIVING DAY.—In accordance with the recommendation of the President, Gov. Low has appointed Thursday, December 7th, "as a day when the people of California may unite with the people of her sister States in Public Thanksgiving to the Great Ruler of the Universe," for the manifold blessings vouchsafed us during the past year—"above all, and more than all, that peace has been restored to our beloved country."

ANA.

—Next to the real presence of the man, there is something always irresistably attractive in the hand-writing and autograph of those few distinguished literateurs who have won honorable and lasting fame. Whether or not there be any virtue in chiromancy, when we look at the rude symbols traced by the very hand of genius, we are apt to fancy ourselves in closer communion with the spirit of the writer, than when the "thoughts that breathe and words that burn" come to us second-hand, through the universal medium of type. The "Autograph Mirror," a recent acquisition of the Mercantile Library, which contains the lithographed fac similes of the pen peculiarities of the world's greatest notabilities, offers the public a pleasant opportunity for indulging in this form of hero worship. I do not know of a more felicitous way of passing a half hour than in glancing over those broad pages, which reflect the different chirography of the world's great men. I allude to these excellent imitations as a fitting introduction to a genuine epistle which it is my good fortune to have lying on the desk before me. It is written in that honest, precise and somewhat formal hand which became the historian of Queen Anne's reign, and the man who loved the English of Addison and Steele. Turn to the cover of your latest edition of Vanity Fair, and you have a fac simile of its half quaint, half precise signature. Turn over the leaves of your "Roundabout Papers," and you will find some allusion to an incident in its contents, albeit it be but a business letter:

ST. LOUIS, March 26, 1856.

MY DEAR ——: Thank you for all your kindness and trouble. I got the letters duly at New Orleans, did a very good business there (1650), and came safely up the river to Cairo on Monday. I caught the chill and fever, and the ship caught fire twice, little incidents wh. served to enliven the long voyage. We travelled with the bearded lady, the infant Esau, Mr. Copeland, the "eminent comedian, and the American giantess, Miss Julia Hayne, 'who is 8 feet high, and requires 154 yards and 3 quarters of ordinary dry goods to make her dress,' so that we were a distinguished company. I arrived yesterday and lecture to-night and to-morrow.

The West at this time is a failure. I doubt if I shall have 500 people at my lecture—all the men are busy until 10 at night and do not care a fig for the Georges. Cincinnati would be as bad, and I entered not.

As I was writing this very not comes in your friend Phillips (who has had a peck of trouble, poor young man,) and who says he has just come from Cincinnati, where they are in wrath at me for not having been to lecture there. So I am going to let fly a telegraphic, and offer for Saturday and Monday, wh. will be enough for them, I should think. This will suffice for the young gentlemen of Yale (wasn't Newhaven one of the towns wh. offered for the 4 lectures?)—to whom, if Mr. —— will write one more letter for me, perhaps he will say that he just heard from Mr. Thackeray at St. Louis, who sincerely regrets that he cannot be at N. H. time enough to lecture before the students of Yale.

And now about the old lectures. If a good, handsome bona fide requisition could be got, I am your man immediately for 4 lectures on Thursdays and Saturdays, or on Mondays and Wednesdays, twice a week. They want the same thing at Philadelphia or did, and I could devote other two days in the week to that place. O my stars! how tired I am of the whole house of Hanover! I wish I had gone to Havana, instead of peddling about the petty towns in Georgia, &c., where I did little more than pay expenses, but my friends insisted that great profits were to be made by travelling south, and duty yielded. Wednesday 23 April I must keep for the St. George's Society. Couldn't we begin at N. Y. on the 7th.

How glad I shall be to see you and it again!
With 1000 thanks for what you have done for me,
I am yours always my dear ——
W. M. THACKERAY.

—And so George Arnold is dead! The telegraph, remarkable for the practical terseness of its obituary notices, speaks of him as the author of the McArone papers, and passes on to other news. Only one hour before reading that dispatch, I had laughed over one of his latest feuilletons in the New York Review, and I now turned back again to its sparkling paragraphs with something of that feeling with which, on the death of a dear friend, we recall those signs and tokens by which we knew and loved him. Although I could claim no closer acquaintanceship than that of being one of his readers (too often, alas! the safest relation to hold to any writer,) I could not help feeling interested both in the strong personality which enlivened his articles, and in finding in his latest effort a suggestiveness both sweet and strange. A single omission of his usual weekly feuilleton, and an apologetic line from the editor, had prepared his readers for the light-hearted admission from his own pen, that illness had driven him to the country for rest and retirement. Rest and retirement! Rest that implied the necessity of pleasantly describing it; retirement that consisted in cheerfully keeping his personality fresh in the minds of his readers! What was it to them, to me—reading his graceful and genial chronicle—if the paraphanalia of a sick man surrounded the worn-out chronicler? What was it to us if phials and nauseous mixtures flanked his inkstand, so long as his light, gossipping pen was never dipped in the ugly fluid? And yet, who thinks of the heroism required to control this spasm so that it shall become a graceful salutation: to change this twinge to a pleasant smile? You and I, reader, can afford to go through our little sicknesses sincerely if our old enemy, the neuralgia, gets the upper hand of us, we can grunt at our servants, browbeat our clerks, snub our business associates, and the world pities and pardons us. But the funny scribbler, the comic actor—the two clowns of Vanity Fair, whose business it is to make jokes and faces—ah! that is quite another affair. Who ever sympathized with a sick humorist? Is not the world rather inclined to exult over them, from an ill-defined belief in Providential retribution? "Art thou, too, become like one of us?" Your sick poet sings his consumptive psalm from a pillow smoothed by soft-hearted woman's fingers; it is Jack Falstaff who babbles of green fields in a tapster's upper chamber, surrounded by Nym, Bardolph and Mrs. Quickly.... But, in my digression, I fear I have strayed too far. George Arnold was a poet as well as humorist; a poet who, if not deep and passionate, was saved from futile attempts at sublimity by his quiet good taste and keen sense of the ridiculous. His verse was tender, sparkling and graceful as his prose, and that is too well known to require commendation here. As the burlesque war correspondent of Vanity Fair, he early adopted from the French that pithy, curt, epigrammatic, paragraphic style, which Charles Henry Webb, his only successful rival, has introduced to such popularity on this coast in his "Things." A graceful tribute to the memory of his fellow-laborer, Fitz James O'Brien, in a column of personal recollections of that gifted writer, was one of Mr. Arnold's last contributions to literature; let us hope that among his brother journalists there may be found one who, with the will, possesses the ability to as gracefully embalm his memory.

—I do not wonder that intelligent actors have not a very exalted opinion of the average taste of an audience, if that opinion is based, as it well might be, on that which most provokes their applause or indifference. In one of the most affecting situations in "Arrah-na-Pogue," when the hero, condemned to a felon's death on the following day, checks his wife, lest she should violate a promise of secrecy given to another, by intimating that he will learn the secret on the morrow, this beautiful expression of homely faith, conveyed in simple and touching language, is usually received with roars of laughter. Whether that sagacious senate, the California audience, look upon this as a felicitous Irish bull, I am unable to divine: it is certainly considered as a masterly witticism. The little bit of Celtic poetry in Shaun's remark, as he takes the handkerchief, wet with his wife's tears, that "his own came out to meet them," is considered in this latitude as a mild and not offensive pleasantry, to be received with gentle, but not boisterous merriment. If, in the domain of satire, the California audience are not strong, they make it up in their appreciation of personalities, equivocal language, and local allusions. Perhaps it may be a rather strong way of putting it, but, if a comically dressed individual were to appear upon any San Francisco stage, and utter significantly, but without any relevancy or coherency whatever, the magical words, "Pixley's Mule," "Gridley's Pork," "Dr. Rowell," "Mayor Coon," there can be little doubt but that the audience would roar with laughter. I have seen a fair play saved from damnation by the saving grace of a local gag in the mouth of an actor. I lately witnessed the first representation of Mr. Webb's clever burlesque—"Arrah-na-Poke." The best scene—the court martial—extremely truthful and correct in its satire, irresistibly absurd in its exaggeration of the accessories of the original, and, as a literary effort, thorough, finished, and complete, scarcely awakened a laugh; the keenest satirical allusion fell on unsympathetic ears: the best hit in the dialogue passed unnoticed. Luckily for the author, he knew his audience well enough to introduce sufficient that was broadly farcical to make his piece a success; but how far Mr. Setchell's pantaloons, in the estimation of the sagacious audience, eclipsed that capital comedian's best acting, or how far Mr. Webb's local allusions surpassed, in their opinion, his neatest sarcasms and puns, the applause of an intelligent and refined audience can best testify. BRET.

A NEW LECTURER.—George Alfred Townsend has lately been gleaning in a new field. His pen-sketches of Washington, immediately after the assassination, and his account of the executions, have gone all over the civilized world. Friendless and a stranger, he worked his way, by individual merit, into the magazines of London. He and "Miles O'Reiley" alone do up the whole of the New York Citizen, and a sprightly paper they make of it. George Alfred has, besides, been writing for everything, in the way of journals and magazines, since his return from Europe. Yet, by some miracle of prolific energy, he has found time to prepare a lecture, entitled "Our Special Correspondent in Europe," and "The Four War-Christmases," a narrative poem. These he proposes to deliver to "Lyceum, Library and Lecture Associations," during the season of 1865-66. "Miles O'Reily" (Charles G. Halpine) has placed at Mr. Townsend's disposal another lecture, "The Marching Soldier." It is not the habit of either of these gentlemen to write anything bad, so that the entertainment promised by George Alfred cannot fail to be interesting. We can only wish him more success than he had in a venture of a like kind, so cleverly chronicled in his late article in Harpers' Magazine.

[For the Californian.]

"MARK TWAIN"

ON THE LAUNCH OF THE STEAMER "CAPITAL."

I GET MR. MUFF NICKERSON TO GO WITH ME AND ASSSIST IN REPORTING THE GREAT STEAMBOAT LAUNCH. HE RELATES THE INTERESTING HISTORY OF THE TRAVELLING PANORAMIST.

I WAS just starting off to see the launch of the great steamboat Capital, on Saturday week, when I came across Mulph, Mulff, Muff, Mumph, Murph, Mumf, Murf, Mumford, Mulford, Murphy Nickerson—(he is well known to the public by all these names, and I cannot say which is the right one)—bound on the same errand. He said that if there was one thing he took more delight in than another, it was a steamboat launch; he would walk miles to see one, any day; he had seen a hundred thousand steamboat launches in his time, and hoped he might live to see a hundred thousand more; he knew all about them; knew everything—*every*thing connected with them—said he "had it all down to a scratch;" he could explain the whole process in minute detail; to the uncultivated eye a steamboat-launch presented nothing grand, nothing startling, nothing beautiful, nothing romantic, or awe-inspiring or sublime—but to an optic like his (which saw not the dull outer coating, but the radiant gem it hid from other eyes,) it presented all these—and behold, he had power to lift the veil and display the vision even unto the uninspired. He could do this by word of mouth—by explanation and illustration. Let a man stand by his side, and to him that launch should seem arrayed in the beauty and the glory of enchantment!

This was the man I wanted. I could see that plainly enough. There would be many reporters present at the launch, and the papers would teem with the inevitable old platitudinal trash which this sort of people have compelled to do duty on every occasion like this since Noah launched his ark—but I aspired to higher things. I wanted to write a report which should astonish and delight the whole intellectual world—which should dissect, analyze, and utterly exhaust the subject—which should serve for a model in this species of literature for all time to come. I dropped alongside of Mr. M. M. M. M. M. M. M. M. M. Nickerson, and we went to the launch together.

We set out in a steamer whose decks were crowded with persons of all ages, who were happy in their nervous anxiety to behold the novelty of a steamboat launch. I tried not to pity them, but I could not help whispering to myself, "These poor devils will see nothing but some stupid boards and timbers nailed together—a mere soulless hulk—sliding into the water!"

As we approached the spot where the launch was to take place, a gentleman from Reese River, by the name of Thompson, came up, with several friends, and said he had been prospecting on the main deck, and had found an object of interest—a bar. This was all very well, and showed him to be a man of parts—but like many another man who produces a favorable impression by an introductory remark replete with wisdom, he followed it up with a vain and unnecessary question—Would we take a drink? This to me!—This to M. M. M., etc., Nickerson!

We proceeded, two-by-two, arm-in-arm, down to the bar in the nether regions, chatting pleasantly and elbowing the restless multitude. We took pure, cold, health-giving water, with some other things in it, and clinked our glasses together, and were about to drink, when Smith, of Excelsior, drew forth his handkerchief and wiped away a tear; and then, noticing that the action had excited some attention, he explained it by recounting a most affecting incident in the history of a venerated aunt of his—now deceased—and said that, although long years had passed since the touching event he had narrated, he could never take a drink without thinking of the kind-hearted old lady.

Mr. Nickerson blew his nose, and said with deep emotion that it gave him a better opinion of human nature to see a man who had had a good aunt, eternally and forever thinking about her.

This episode reminded Jones, of Mud Springs, of a circumstance which happened many years ago in the home of his childhood, and we held our glasses untouched and rested our elbows on the counter, while we listened with rapt attention to his story.

There was something in it about a good natured, stupid man, and this reminded Thompson of Reese River of a person of the same kind whom he had once fallen in with while travelling through the back-settlements of one of the Atlantic States, and we postponed drinking until he should give us the facts in the case. The hero of the tale had unintentionally created some consternation at a camp-meeting by one of his innocent asinine freaks, and this reminded Mr. M. Nickerson of a reminiscence of his temporary sojourn in the interior of Connecticut some months ago, and again our uplifted glasses were stayed on their way to our lips, and we listened attentively to

THE ENTERTAINING HISTORY OF THE SCRIPTURAL PANORAMIST.

[I give the story in Mr. Nickerson's own language.]

There was a fellow travelling around, in that country, (said Mr. Nickerson,) with a moral religious show—a sort of a scriptural panorama—and he hired a wooden-headed old slab to play the piano for him. After the first night's performance, the showman says:

"My friend, you seem to know pretty much all the tunes there are, and you worry along first rate. But then didn't you notice that sometimes last night the piece you happened to be playing was a little rough on the proprieties so to speak—didn't seem to jibe with the general gait of the picture that was passing at the time, as it were—was a little foreign to the subject, you know—as if you didn't either trump or follow suit, you understand?"

"Well, no," the fellow said; he hadn't noticed, but it might be; he had played along just as it came handy.

So they put it up that the simple old dummy was to keep his eye on the panorama after that, and as soon as a stunning picture was reeled out, he was to fit it to a dot with a piece of music that would help the audience get the idea of the subject, and warm them up like a camp-meeting revival. That sort of thing would corral their sympathies, the showman said.

There was a big audience that night—mostly middle-aged and old people who belonged to the church and took a strong interest in Bible matters, and the balance were pretty much young bucks and heifers—they always come out strong on panoramas, you know, because it gives them a chance to taste one another's mugs in the dark.

"Well, the showman began to swell himself up for his lecture, and the old mud-dobber tackled the piano and run his fingers up and down once or twice to see that she was all right, and the fellows behind the curtain commenced to grind out the panorama. The showman balanced his weight on his right foot, and propped his hands on his hips, and flung his eye over his shoulder at the scenery, and says:

"Ladies and gentlemen, the painting now before you illustrates the beautiful and touching parable of the Prodigal Son. Observe the happy expression just breaking over the features of the poor suffering youth—so worn and weary with his long march: note also the ecstasy beaming from the uplifted countenance of the aged father, and the joy that sparkles in the eyes of the excited group of youths and maidens and seems ready to burst in a welcoming chorus from their lips. The lesson, my friends, is as solemn and instructive as the story is tender and beautiful."

The mud-dobber was all ready, and the second the speech was finished he struck up:

"Oh, we'll all get blind drunk
When Johnny comes marching home!"

Some of the people giggled, and some groaned a little. The showman couldn't say a word. He looked at the piano sharp, but he was all lovely and serene—he didn't know there was anything out of gear.

The panorama moved on, and the showman drummed up his grit and started in fresh:

"Ladies and gentlemen, the fine picture now unfolding itself to your gaze exhibits one of the most notable events in Bible History—our Savior and his disciples upon the Sea of Galilee. How grand, how awe inspiring are the reflections which the subject invokes! What sublimity of faith is revealed to us in this lesson from the sacred writings! The Savior rebukes the angry waves, and walks securely upon the bosom of the deep!

All around the house they were whispering: "Oh, how lovely! how beautiful!" and the orchestra let himself out again:

"Oh, a life on the ocean wave,
And a home on the rolling deep!"

There was a good deal of honest snickering turned on this time, and considerable groaning, and one or two old deacons got up and went out. The showman gritted his teeth and cursed the piano man to himself, but the fellow sat there like a knot on a log, and seemed to think he was doing first-rate.

After things got quiet, the showman thought he would make one more stagger at it, any how, though his confidence was beginning to get mighty shaky. The supes started the panorama to grinding along again, and he says:

"Ladies and gentlemen, this exquisite painting illustrates the raising of Lazarus from the dead by our Savior. The subject has been handled with rare ability by the artist, and such touching sweetness and tenderness of expression has he thrown into it, that I have known peculiarly sensitive persons to be even affected to tears by looking at it. Observe the half-confused, half-inquiring look, upon the countenance of the awakening Lazarus. Observe, also, the attitude and expression of the Savior, who takes him gently by the sleeve of his shroud with one hand, while he points with the other toward the distant city."

Before anybody could get off an opinion in the case, the innocent old ass at the piano struck up:

"Come rise up, William Ri-l-ey,
And go along with me!"

It was rough on the audience, you bet you. All the solemn old flats got up in a huff to go, and everybody else laughed till the windows rattled.

The showman went down and grabbed the orchestra, and shook him up, and says:

"That let's you out, you know, you chowder-headed old clam! Go to the door-keeper and get your money, and cut your stick!—vamose the ranch! Ladies and gentlemen, circumstances over which I have no control compel me prematurely to dismiss—"

"By George! it was splendid!—come! all hands! let's take a drink!"

It was Phelim O'Flannigan, of San Luis Obispo, who interrupted. I had not seen him before. "What was splendid?" I inquired.

"The launch!"

Our party clinked glasses once more, and drank in respectful silence.

MARK TWAIN.

P. S.—You will excuse me from making a model report of the great launch. I was with Mulf Nickerson, who was going to "explain the whole thing to me as clear as glass," but, you see, they launched the boat with such indecent haste, that we never got a chance to see it. It was a great pity, because Mulph Nickerson understands launches as well as any man.

THE following is a short synopsis of Liszt's oratorio St Elizabeth, which we translate from the Dresdner Journal: "In the first part, the arrival of Elizabeth from Hungary is described. She, as well as her intended husband, Landgraf Ludwig, are in the beginning of their youth. The little bride is greeted by the chorus, and embraced by the father of Ludwig, Landgraf Herrmann, and is delivered to him by a Hungarian magnate. Ludwig shows her the country, which will belong to her, and both associate with a party of children, who welcome them with a merry song. In the next scene both are grown up and married. Ludwig is the regent of the country; he comes home from hunting, and sings a merry hunting song. At this moment he sees a person going down the path from the castle through the green bushes. He recognizes Elizabeth, who is frightened when he calls her. 'Why are you frightened and embarrassed?' he asks. She does not want to answer, since she knows that the Landgraf has forbidden her to do what she is just doing, to wit, to carry food to the poor. He wants to see what she carries under her cloak, when the food has been changed by a miracle into roses. At the same time a halo of glory surrounds the head of Elizabeth, and the angels sing a chorus of jubilation: 'The Lord has done a miracle!' The next scene is laid several years later. The Landgraf takes leave of his wife, because he has to go to the holy land on a crusade. The expressions of sorrow on the part of Elizabeth are drowned in the warlike songs of the warriors and knights. Then follows a scene, in which the mother of the Landgraf, a hard-hearted woman, informs his vassals that her son had fallen in the crusade, and that she is the lawful heir to the crown. She orders the 'seneschal' to drive Elizabeth and her children from the country, when in the same moment those enter crying and sobbing. She had come to find consolation, but she is ordered to leave forthwith. She prays in vain to be allowed to stay a little longer, since a thunderstorm is threatening; she is expelled. But now comes the punishment. The thunderstorm commences and rages, the castle is struck by lightning and burnt down. In the last part Elizabeth is at the end of her days. Although her children have been stolen from her, she praises God for his mercy, and lives in pious exercises in a hut. The poor come to her and pray to her as a saint. She offers them her cloak and her last piece of bread. Soon she is freed from earthly sorrows. Death approaches her, while the angels greet the ascension of her soul to heaven. The last part consists of the funeral of the saint." As the reader will see, there are many points for effect in this subject.

THE Opposition steamer days have been changed to the 15th of each month. The Moses Taylor will depart on the 15th of December, and will connect, on the Atlantic side, with the new 2,500 ton steamer Santiago.

THE "San Francisco Pocket Guide and Business Directory" for November, a neat little pamphlet whose uses are well described by its title, has been received.

NEW BOOKS.—We acknowledge the receipt of new books, per steamer, from A. Roman & Co. Our usual notice is deferred till next week.

THE publishers of the Cornhill Magazine, London, having purchased the entire copyright of all works written by W. M. Thackeray and Wilkie Collins, new and uniform editions of these authors may soon be looked for.

HOW GRANDMOTHER STOPPED A THIEF.

I AM a very old lady. I have very often told my grandchildren the story of how I stopped the thief. And now they beg me to write it down, that they may read my story themselves. When I am dead, they meau. And so I write it.

When I was a little girl, I lived alone in an old country farm-house with my father. Your grandmother died, as you have heard, when I was born, and so I was my father's only companion. Dearly I loved him, and tenderly he talked to me of all his labors and of all his pleasures. At the time I write of I was just eleven years old; a merry, boisterous girl, with big fearless eyes and a spirit of achievement that was getting me into mischief. I could fill pages witb my adventures, but I know you only now wish for one.

I must describe our house. It was built in the days of Dutch William, by some one who had learned to love the houses of Holland. The dwelling-house itself was nearly n cube; a great cube of dark red brick. The front door opened into a passage that pierced the block, and ended by another door which led into our farmyard. There were two tall, narrow windows on either side of the principal door, and five tall, narrow windows on the first story. A heavy cornice hung over this row of windows, and from it rose the steep roof, covered with curly red tiles. This roof did not rise to a point. It was surmounted by a kind of summer-house of wood, about seven or eight feet square, with a window in each of its four sides. This was mounted by a big shining vane. The interior of the lighthouse was reached through a small trap door. This trap door was in the ceiling of the great garret formed by the whole roof of the house. The garret could only be entered by one other trap door, which opened into my father's room. There was just space enough in the lighthouse for my father's writing-table. There he kept his accounts, not without some straining of his brain, with scrupulous exactness. There he wrote his letters, on those rare occasions when necessity compelled him to do so. There were bis samples of corn, his rusty pistols, and his dozen drawers of indescribable odds and ends. There he could see the half of his lands, and exercise a distant supervision over his meu.

Four times a year, my father paid the rent for his hired lands. The home-farm, as you know, was his own. On the day before the rent was to be taken to the landlord's steward, the sum was always brought in gold from the bank at the town. Such a proceeding might not be very wise, but it was hallowed by its antiquity. The money was usually kept iu a bag in my father's own room. All these arrangements were well known to me. I shut my eyes now, and I see my father in his clean gaiters and the neat bow that tied his hair. I see him ride off on his roan hack to pay his rent, and I know every crease in the little leatheru bag that carries the gold.

All the tribe of house servants and laborers, who lived on the farm, knew my father's ways as well as I did. But he was unsuspicious to a fault.

One Friday evening my father had ridden to the town, and had come back with his gold. All the maids and the men were sitting at their supper in our great kitchen, and I stood by the noisy fire waiting for my father to come down to them. He always came into their meal, said a hearty word to those who were nearest to him, and then retired with me to his own parlor, his supper, and his pipe of peace.

On the particular evening in question, he walked into the room, swinging something in his hand. It was the leathern bag that carried the money; but it was empty. I knew that its place was in the bureau in my father's room, not empty, but full.

"Father," said I, "where's the money? Why haven't you locked it up in the bag?"

Everybody in the room heard my question, for there was always a hush when the master came among his men, and everybody in the room heard his answer.

"Where's the money, missie? I mounted the lighthouse when I came in to get the keys I left there in the morning, caught tbe bag in the corner of the table, and tumbled all the coin into the drawer. There it may lie. It's safe enough."

In an hour more I had been dismissed with my usual kiss, and was shut close in my own room. I have said that I should describe the house. I have only partly done so. The great range of stables and farm-buildings, at the corner of which the actual house was built, were partly made out of the ruins of an old manor house that had fallen into decay with a fallen family. The only part of the buildings that still showed any signs of architectural beauty was one gable end, where the stables abutted on the modern house. There stood still an old room on a third floor, with great mullioned windows, each in a gable of its own, that stood out to the west; and on the south side, which adjoined the modern house, was a smaller attic window, apparently inserted since the dismantling of the buildiug, for, instead of mullions, it contained a rough sash. The base of this little window (it was some five feet in height) was on the floor of the attic, and nearly level with the projecting cornice of the house. Between the cornice and the sill of the window was a space of about a yard. The staircase of the old house led from what had been the hall (now filled with gardening tools and accumulation of out-door rubbish) into a room on the first floor, and up into the top room with the three windows. At some former time it had been proposed to use both the old and the new building for domestic purposes, and a bridge passage had been built between the first floor landing of the old staircase, and the room to the little passage had been since furnished with many stout locks and bolts, but they were all on my side. It was a special delight to me to escape through my own door and wander about the premises. I had taken possession of the great attic with the great old windows, and there I kept my treasures and did my best-loved work, as my father in his lighthouse. My father condemned my independence, and would only say, as he bade me good night:

"Mind you lock your private front door, little missie. I would uot have thee stolen."

On the night in question I lay not long awake. I heard the servants who slept in the house mount to their rooms. Then I heard my father lock the two doors of the passage and ascend in his turn, pausing a minute to listen at my room, before he retired to his own. Still I lay awake and grew restless in my bed. I began to think of all that I had done in the day and of all of all I meant to do on the morrow. I was going down to fish in the beck with Beriah, the stable-help, and Mary, the dairywoman. I had been cutting a new hazel-top to my rod, up in my sanctum in the old building. And where was my knife that I had been cutting with? My knife that my father had brought me from the town a year ago, and that I loved so very fondly? I had left it in the attic. Of course no one would go there. It was quite safe. But how silly to leave it! Could I go and fetch it? No; certainly not. My father would be very angry with me for going out in the night. I must go to sleep. But I should like to see how the attic looks in the bright moonlight that shines in my room. I cannot do any harm by going out; and I cannot sleep; I hate to lie awake. The Dutch clock on the stairs strikes eleven. The house has been quite still for an hour and a half.

I stepped gently out of my bed and stole to the window. How sharply outlined the shadows were. I remember the whole scene now. Great clouds were coursing over the sky, and presently the moon would be hid. I turned the key in the lock of my own door. It moved so silently and easily, that I could not help pulling back the bolts. In another minute I was in my attic. You may think that I was a very courageous girl and very unlike most of the children you know. Perhaps children now-a-days have more foolish ideas in their heads than those of seventy years ago. I knew nothing to be afraid of. There lay my rod, and there was my cherished knife, its blade looking very blue in the moonlight. I shut it, and vowed never to be so careless again. How strange the room looked. Everything was very black, or very bright, and the broad mullions made great stripes of shadow over the floor. I feasted my eyes at the big window, and then I turned to the little one. Opposite to me rose up the steep tiled roof, and at the top was the lighthouse, its vane shining in the clear light, and its windows looking just as though there were a candle inside.

I had turned to go down to my bed again, for I was beginning to be conscious that it was cold, when I saw the window of the lighthouse that was nearest to me slowly open. I cannot say that I was exactly afraid, even then. I was spell-bound with astonishment, and stood motionless to watch. The sash was raised and a man cautiously got out. He moved awkwardly, and seemed to have his hands tied. Then he began to descend the roof very slowly and very warily. He leaned backed against the tiles, and lodging his feet and elbows in their projections, advanced inch by inch along his perilous journey, with his hands still in front of him. I had just time to recognize him when the great cloud came over the moon, and in the sudden gloom of the comparative darkness I could see little. But I had seen enough now. The man was one James Connor, a laborer on the farm. He had come to the house some weeks ago, and though my father knew nothing of him and he looked like a mere tramp, he had been received. His fellow-servants had complained once or twice that he was a drunkard, but he had promised amendment. He was in the kitchen when my father had indiscreetly answered my indiscreet question. What he was doing was clear enough. He had passed through my father's room before the house was closed for the night, had concealed himself in the garret till all was still, and had then mounted to the lighthouse to steal the money. He could not descend through my father's room without rousing him. Nor was it needful to do so. He knew the premises well, and was aware that if he could descend the roof and gain the little window, he could at once reach the farmyard, and so make his way whithersoever he would.

All this flashed through my mind as the cloud fell over the moon. In a moment I was watching more eagerly through the night, as the dim figure crept heedfully downward. He wore his shirt, stockings, and shoes, and a pair of rough breeches. In his hands he held his spoils, perhaps because he wore no pockets; perhaps, because, as his stupid look showed, he was half drunk, and run the risk of marring his plot and maiming himself for life by his folly. This I could not explain. I only saw him coming lower, lower, with my father's gold clasped in his hands. The bottom sash alone was standing in the window, about a yard from the floor in height, and there was nothing between us but the abyss between the two buildings. I was hidden completely in the dark corner of the window. I thought the man must fall. He reached the cornice in safety and stood up for a second before he stepped across. Then he stepped from roof to roof, and in a moment was leaning over the sash, supporting himself upon it by his arms, and resting his feet on the gutter that ran round the wall outside.

All this time I had simply watched. I had not thought what to do. I could not run away for help. I was chained to the spot. I knew that if the robber was to be baffled, it must be done now. As he paused before he clambered over the sash, and as he held out his hands with their spoil within them, I struck them with all my strength. The suddenness of the shock effected what my weak form could never have done. The man was startled, his hands parted, and the gold rolled all over the floor. With a curse he clutched at my arm as I darted from the window, and caught it with a grasp that I feel to this hour. Had his power not been crippled by his dangerous position, I should have stood but a sorry chance against him. He could only use one urm, for with the other he was compelled to steady himself on the window. With that one arm he held me, and raised his knee to step into the room. I do not know why he did not let me go. He could have caught me long before I could give any serious alarm, and have silenced me effectually. He could not at the same time hold me and enter the room. All this time I did not scream; it seemed to me that the struggle was too serious to be interrupted, and I felt so intense an earnestness in the work of trying to escape, that I was prevented from uttering a sound.

At last the thief contrived to hold my little wrist in his huge hand aud grasp the sash with it at the same time. In a second he would have been in the room. He could have stunned, or perhaps murdered me, in a moment—have re-collected the gold, have descended into the court, and in those days, when as yet there were neither detectives nor telegraphs, have escaped. It was my left arm that was prisoned. In my right I held the knife. I was desperate, then; and though I was but a little, small-boned girl, all the devil in me was roused. I fear I could have slain the man with small compunction, at the instant of the deed I lifted the clasp-knife to my mouth and tore open the blade with my teeth, and then I cut at the wrist of my foe as though I would cut it through. He started back with a cry of pain and fury, lost his hold on the window and fell. I heard the dull, heavy sound of his body as it struck the ground below. My left arm was covered with the hot blood I had shed. Then I turned round to rouse the house. But my young nerves remained strung only while the work was to be done. I staggered, and fell fainting among the broad guineas I had saved. I lay senseless for some hours, and then woke with a strange feeling of having done or suffered something—I hardly knew what. Slowly I remembered what had happened. It was still dark. I went to the window to see what had become of my antagouist. There was light enough for me to see a dark mass below me, which I thought could be nothing else than Connor's body. I turned my head to the left and saw the first faint light of morning breaking through the clouds. In half an hour the whole of the farm would be astir. Slowly I returned to my deserted chamber and passed through it to my father's. It did not take long to assure him of my being whole and unhurt, in spite of my bloody nightdress. Wondering as I told him my tale, he called some of his men, and we went out to see the enemy. He was alive. I felt a thrill of pleasure at knowing that, though I could have taken his life so ruthlessly in my rage. He was alive, but so bruised and injured by his fall that he was perfectly helpless. One of his legs was broken, as we afterwards discovered, and his right arm was out of joint. The gash of my knife had done him no serious harm. It was a bad cut, but no more. He was carried off to jail as soon as he could be moved. I will not tell you the story of his trial and punishment. I remember the judge said that the little girl was more fit to carry the king's colors than many a man of twice her years. And now my story is done. It happened seventy years ago, my children; but I remember it all, and though I own to being proud of my stout heart, I have exaggerated nothing.

THE Round Table is not altogether satisfied with Artemus Ward's last volume, and asks: "Will he ever again produce a melodramatic effect like that of a canal boat's escape from pirates by the exposure of a peck of oats on the path before the pirate's horses? At least, if Artemus Ward never says another good thing, let us remember the remarkable genius which could utter that matchless absurdity, in which the fancy drifts round and round under a spell of perfectly delicious unreason: 'It 'ud been more 'n ten dollars in Jeff. Davis's pocket if he'd never been born.'"

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and Amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

THEATRICAL TALK.

AT Maguire's Opera House on Monday, Mr. Bandmann essayed the character of "Richelieu." Mr. Bandmann is unfortunate in his attempts to present the characteristics of old age. Daniel E. Bandmann was continually breaking through the transparent disguise of the aged "Cardinal," on Monday evening last. His manifestations of power lost their effect, from the fact that they did not appear to come from an old man roused into animation, and nerving himself for an effort; it rather appeared as if "Cardinal Richelieu" underwent a transformation like that of "Faust;" hey presto! Old "Richelieu" vanishes, and young Mr. Bandmann stands before the audience. Mr. Bandmann failed to sustain the dignity of the character; in one instance he made the "Cardinal" do a little low comedy gesticulating, which was very absurd. If Mr. Bandmann's "conception" of the character of "Cardinal Richelieu" is that he was a low, cunning old man, with a strong will and a bad temper, one who, to regain the lost favor of his king, will, bending low, "and in a bondsman's key, with bated breath and whispering humbleness," beg a favor of him whom he was wont to govern, I confess Mr. Bandmann fully carried out his conception; yet that does not debar me from the right to say that this conception is false. How many more characters which have been treated with at least some small show of reverence and respect by his predecessors, are to be placed upon the rack? Mrs. Harry Jackson read and acted the part of "Julie de Mortimer" with admirable fidelity, displaying much power where the text called for it. Mr. C. R. Thorne, Jr., presented the character of "De Mauprat" with the ease and polish which has of late characterized every part he has undertaken. Mr. Louis Aldrich appeared to great advantage as "Baradas," and played the part evenly and well. Mr. Walter Leman made a capital "Joseph," and the play, which was repeated last night, went off well. The ensuing evening Othello was performed, Mr. Bandmann as "Othello," Mr. Boniface as "Iago," and Mrs. Harry Jackson as "Desdemona:" as I had witnessed Mr. Bandmann's performance of "Othello," I did not attend on this occasion. On Wednesday, Mr. Harry Jackson made his first appearance as "Isaac Abram Bokes," in The Creole. Mr. Jackson impersonated the low Whitechapel Jew to the life: some actors, perhaps, would attempt to turn "Bokes" into an aristocratic usurer; Mr. Jackson played as he found him, and presented to the audience a most perfect specimen of a beast of prey, hundreds of specimens of which are to be found in London, and, unless Colenso succeeds in entirely subverting the authority of the Bible, it is to be believed that the breed will never become extinct. As "Bellona St. Mars," Mrs. Jackson was charmingly vivacious, and proved that, in addition to her talent for such characters as "Pauline" in the Lady of Lyons, she possesses much versatility. I cannot describe Mrs. Jackson more fitly than by saying she is a thorough actress. In the afterpiece A Day After the Fair, Mr. Harry Jackson displayed his powers of mimicry, which are great, by his imitations of Charles Kean, George Coppin, John Gregg, and Joe Jefferson; the imitation of George Coppin was the best; Kean was good, but any one can imitate Kean. Mr. Harry Jackson is a valuable addition to the Opera House company, being a very clever low-comedian, and excellent in character parts. The next sensation at the Opera House is the production of The Sea of Ice, which will be played this afternoon and eveuing. This drama is to be produced with novel scenic effects; the stage will be made to represent a sea of ice, with icebergs floating in it.

At the Metropolitan, Mr. Wheatleigh, in spite of the rain, had a crowded house on the occasion of his benefit on Monday, when Arrah-na Pogue was played for the fiftieth and last time. On Tuesday, Savannah was produced. This piece was put on the stage in magnificent style; a succession of beautifully painted scenes and stage effects, lime lights, red lights, etc., form the attractive features of this play. Why Mr. Wheatleigh should have chosen such a weak production to expend so much money on is a mystery; he had far better have saved his gold and silver leaf, and put it all on A Midsummer Night's Dream. However, this latter play, which is shortly to be produced, is not to suffer, as Mr. Wheatleigh has realized enough gold and silver out of Arrah-na-Pogue spend a large amount on Savannah and leave enough for a Midsummer Night's Dream, which I hope will prove another fifty-night reality. When Charles Kean produced it at the Princess' Theatre, London, it ran one hundred and eighty nights. Though Savannah is, as a literary production, trash, as a spectacle it is a thing of beauty and a joy for a little while. The water-fall scene is very beautiful, but that is eclipsed by the splendors of the scene in the savannah, with its tropical trees, fruits and flowers, a handsome stuffed serpent, which looks even more deadly than the sand-club which the daily newspapers have manufactured for the What Cheer House burglars, and other wonders of the animal and vegetable kingdom. I have come to the conclusion that Mrs. Sedley Brown played "Arrah-na-Pogue" about as well as she can play anything. She attempts to be far too playful and overacts her part in the comedy of Ladies Beware, which precedes Savannah; in this latter play she has little required of her save to look interesting under the reflection of a lime light, and sing a song; both of which feats she accomplishes satisfactorily. Mr. George Pauncefort h s the best character in the piece, and consequently comes in for the largest share of applause: he plays a light comedy lawyer, "Nick Lively," capitally. Mr. Wheatleigh's part does not suit him, but he makes all that can be made of it. Mr. Leach comes out quite brilliantly as a funny Yorkshireman. There is scarcely a good part in the piece. Miss Sallie Hinckley, Mr. H. D. Thompson, Mr. J. H. Warwick and all the company do what is set down for them well. This afternoon Savannah will be played for the accommodation of ladies and children; a prettier sight for the little ones cannot be imagined. After to-night it will be withdrawn. The Colleen Bawn will be played on Monday, with new scenery and a strong cast.

On Wednesday the long promised burlesque, Arrah-na-Poke, was produced to a densely crowded house at the Academy. There is lots of fun in the piece, and the audience thoroughly appreciated it. Many of the scenes are full of keen satire on the representation of "Ireland a la Boucicault," in Arrah-na-Pogue. The court-martial scene affords ample opportunity for this; the burlesque "Michael Feeny" deliberately places himself within reach of the mob, who continually belabor him with deadly stuffed-clubs: when he is told to move out of reach of these weapons, with stern conscientiousness he replies that he cannot, he has seen the original play and knows how he ought to sit; another neat point is made by "Colonel O'Gravy," on "Shun the Post's" addressing some particularly insulting remark to "Majority Coughin," rushing up to him and expressing his admiration of his behavior, by shaking him warmly by the hand. Mr. Dan Setchell made the most of the character of "Shun the Post," and kept the audience in a continual roar of laughter during the time he was on the stage. His make-up was infinitely comic and refreshingly new. Mr. Woodhull's "Michael Feeny" was accurately studied from the original at the Metropolitan, and exaggerated to a point of irrisistible absurdity. The Worrell Sisters acquitted themselves well in their respective parts, Little Jennie distinguishing herself by her execution of a barn-door jig, and the burlesque was quite a success. To-night the performance will commence with Margot, the Poultry Dealer, and conclude with the burlesque. This afternoon the amusing little farce of California Diamonds, and the burlesque will constitute the entertainment.

TOUCHSTONE.

LITERARY NOTES.

FOREIGN.

THE New Nation says: "Mr. Richard Grant White's Memoirs of Shakspeare's Life meets with a carping notice in the Athenæum, written apparently more to ventilate certain crotchets of the writer's than to convey an accurate idea of the book reviewed. While complaining absurdly of "want of originality," (originality on such a well-worn topic!) the critic admits that "the author's enthusiasm for Shakspeare is great, his style crisp and pleasant, and his intention good.' We believe Mr. White has not mentioned in his book a trifling fact that came to light a few years since, when Shakspeare's house at Stratford was being repaired on its coming into possession of the present trustees. In restoring the fireplace to its old position in the birth room of the poet, the beam of the chimney-piece proved to be hollow, and in a carefully concealed cavity a cross and some apparently Catholic relics were found. Unimportant in itself, this incident may have some relation to the religious tendencies of the family of the great dramatist, who has himself been remarked to speak with unvarying respect of the priestly character and attributes. Criticism is so far from being exhausted on these themes that a new work by Mr. Gerald Massey is only just announced. It is entitled 'Shakspeare's Sonnets, never before Interpreted; with a Retouched Portrait of the man Shakspeare.' It contains a new theory of the sonnets, according to which the greater portion of them—personal or dramatic—were written for the Earl of Southampton; the rest for William Herbert; and the story of Shakspeare's keeping a mistress, of whom he was robbed by his friend, vanishes into thin air. This analysis of the work is by no means clear of comprehension, but we must be satisfied with it till the book itself appears."

AT a recent sale, in London, of the splendid library of the late Earl of Charlemont, an Irish peer whose name became celebrated in the struggle for Irish Independence in 1783, some of Shakspeare's works brought high prices. The editio princeps of Shakspeare, being the folio of 1623, printed in London by Isaac Jaggard and Ed. Blount, in the old red morocco binding with tooled borders, brought $1,820. It is one of the purest and finest copies known, measuring 12¼ by 8¼ inches. Hamlet, "printed for W. S. by John Smethwicke," 4to, no date, $51 50. Love's Labor Lost, published in 1598, first edition, three leaves reprinted, sold for $245; Mr. Geo. Daniel's complete copy sold for $1433. The Merchant of Venice, 4to., printed by I. Roberts, 1600, went for $115. Midsummer Night's Dream, same date, size, and publisher, $115. Much Ado About Nothing, first edition, 4to., first edition, 1600, brought $775. but Mr. Daniel's copy realized $1,339. King Lear, 1608, quarto, $60. Titus Andronicus, 1611, quarto, $205. Richard the Third, 1612, quarto, $56. Merry Wives of Windsor, 1619, quarto, $167.

THE Italians are about to establish a magazine in the style of the Revue des Deux Mondes, which, it is hoped, will equally represent the intelligence and culture of the country. It will be a revival of the Anthologie Italienne, to which Vieussenx, Giordiani, Tommasco, Capponi, etc., used to contribute, and which was suppressed thirty-three years ago by the Tuscan government at the instigation of the Russian minister. The Anthologie, in its new form, will be edited by Cino Capponi, one of the survivors of the original staff, and a large sum has been subscribed to give the undertaking a fair start.

THE New York Weekly Review thinks it must be rather an easy, if a somewhat dishonest labor, to achieve a reputation as a lecturer, in England. Note, for example, the following significant advertisement, clipped from a late London paper: "To Lecturers and Others—Original MS. Lectures, on Topics of General Interest, Literary, Scientific, Historical and Social, written in a popular style, and combining Instruction with Amusement, for disposal. Prices from four shillings to one guinea. Lectures written to order."

TENNYSON is on the banks of the Moselle, very much to the disgust of the many tourists prying about Farringford in the Isle of Wight. Victor Hugo is still on the Rhine. Robert Browning is in Brittany. George H. Lewes, the editor of the Fortnightly Review, is travelling in Brittany, and contributing to the London Pall Mall Gazette, a series of very pleasing papers, entitled, "The Runaway Contributor."

THE famous African traveller, Dr. Barth, has, according to the Triester Zeitung, been treated in a very offensive manner by the Voievode of Montenegro, Mellan. The doctor had attempted to penetrate the mountains of Wassewitch from Albania, and was stopped by the Voievode with a body of armed men, who, after handling him very roughly, sent him back again.

THE Russian government has agreed to exempt from postal charges all statistical publications sent from other countries to the scientific societies of the empire, if transmitted through the Ministry of Public Instruction.

J. S. LE FANU, the author of Uncle Silas and Wylder's Hand, has just published another novel, entitled Guy Deverell. This is good news for novel readers.

HERR MORITZ GEROLD, the head of the firm at Vienna which published the Austrian edition of the Life of Cæsar, has been presented with the ribbon of the Legion of Honor. In the official letter, sent to him on this occasion, it is stated that the honor has been conferred upon him "comme un gage de l'intérêt pour votre personne, et comme une marque de la juste et particulière estime que sa Majesté fait de l'état des arts en Autriche."

THE continuation of M. Renan's Life of Jesus is in the press. It is to appear in two volumes, one of which will be entitled Les Apotres and the other St. Paul. It is said that this work is much less calculated to provoke criticism than its predecessor, the opinions expressed in it being more in conformity with the generally received views on the subject.

DR. COLENSO, says the Athenæum—in closing a review of the fifth part of that writer's work on the Pentateuch, just published in London—is now on his way to the Cape.

IT is an indisputable fact that more disease and suffering is entailed upon children by impure blood in parents than from any other cause. Heads of families owe it their posterity to see to it that their blood is kept free from all poisonous matter that would have a tendency to produce disease, suffering and perhaps death to their offspring. Adams' Blood Purifier, prepared by Samuel Adams, San Francisco, is a strictly vegetable preparation, and is scientifically prepared from the choicest and most efficacious blood purifying remedies known to the vegetable world, and if used according to directions will restore the blood to its proper condition in a very short time.

NEW GOODS.—By the arrival of the last steamer from the East, J. R. Mead & Co., of Montgomery street, corner of Bush, and Washington street, corner of Sansome, are in receipt of the latest Eastern Winter Fashions for Gentlemen's Fine Clothing, in great variety. Their new style of French Walking Coats are tasty in the extreme, and are now first introduced in this city. A large assortment of Gents Underclothing also on hand, from all which the most fastidious can pick to suit, both in style and price, as they are determined to be undersold by none.—Morning Call.

THE divine Shakespeare has said of Mercy that "it is twice blessed; blessing him who gives and him who takes." The same is true of Newell's Pulmonary Syrup, that most successful of all remedies for cough and consumption—as one trial will most undeniably prove. For sale by all Druggists: Redington & Co., Sole Agents, 416 and 418 Front street, San Francisco.

A CARD—TO LADIES.—The pearl of beauty, Davidson's Circassian Bloom, is a charming enamel wash for the complexion. As fragrant as it is innocent, when once used, it will prove itself superior in all qualities for the complexion and skin. Sold by all Druggists.

Mosgrove & Blakely's new Dry Goods Store s in Colton's building, 222 Third street, between Howard and Tehama. Their stock consists in part of the following goods, all of which will be found to be of the very best materials, and at prices which must command the notice of purchasers:

Dress Goods—A large assortment tastefully selected. Their Empress Cloths, Poplins, Melanges, Chenes, and particularly that rich new fabric, "Moonlight on the Lake," cannot be surpassed for Ladies' Fall and Winter Suits.

Hoyle's genuine English Cadiceos.

Irish Linen Goods—All from the celebrated manufacturers, Richardson Sons & Owden, Belfast.

Mission and Eastern Blankets and Flannels.

Ladies and Gents' Furnishing Goods; and a large assortment of all goods usually kept by a first class Dry Goods Store.

AN INTERESTING LETTER.

Very few persons, even among physicians, would have been willing upon any terms to have been in the condition of the writer of the following letter on the 14th of February last. I will anticipate somewhat his report of the facts, by saying that on the 15th August, 1865, he made me a visit, "the very picture of health." Time, which tries and proves all things, has sufficiently tested this case, and shown that neither relapse or collapse having followed, the cure is perfect, and can be cited among the scores of similar cases, the result of my improved mode of treating disease without medicine.

G. M. BOURNE,
Water Cure Physician,
No. 10, Masonic Temple, Post street.

August 27, 1865.

Sacramento, April 30, 1865.

Dr. G. M. Bourne—Dear Sir: It is with pleasure and satisfaction that I now let you know of my good health. Looking back on what I have passed through, it seems as if I was lifted from the grave, and I think it my duty to acknowledge to you and the world the benefit I derived from water treatment as administered by you in your celebrated baths. It was in August, 1864, when disease developed itself with a severe cough. I then took medicines, getting worse, with chills, fevers, loss of strength, and was pronounced consumptive. This set me to thinking, and finally I determined to leave my business and go to the Sandwich Islands, having been informed that I could not be cured here. I went to San Francisco, and while waiting for a ship, called upon Dr. Bourne, who stated that a trip to the Sandwich Islands would probably result disastrously, was wholly unnecessary, as I could then be speedily cured at his establishment. I placed myself under his treatment, and in one week was so much improved that I thought I could risk returning home and to my duty as Engineer on the Central Pacific Railroad. The doctor objected; but I thought I knew better, and returned to my duty. In about two weeks my cough returned, and I kept getting worse, and, contrary to Dr. Bourne's injunction never to take medicine again, committed that folly, and soon was so completely run down that I could scarcely walk; so, as a last resort, I concluded once more to try the Water Cure. I went to San Francisco—few of my friends expected me to return; in fact, I thought my return doubtful. On arriving at Dr. Bourne's establishment (February 14, 1865,) I was not able to get into the bath without assistance, but in a few days I began to gain. I remained with him only six weeks, when I left, "a wiser and a better man," without the aid of medicine. I have now been at work several weeks, and find that I am gaining every day, and at present bid fair to be stouter than ever before. Persons visiting the Doctor's establishment will find it just what it should be, in both Ladies' and Gentlemen's Departments, and I cannot say too much in praise of the Doctor's kind attention to his patients.

This letter I write for the benefit of the afflicted, to be used as the Doctor decides, and should it be the means of directing any one to his care and treatment who (as they assuredly will) find relief, I will be paid for my trouble. Your obedient servant,

JAMES CAMPBELL,
Engineer Central Pacific Railroad.

San Francisco, August 25, 1865.

Advised by the undersigned, Mr. James Campbell, of the Central Pacific Railroad (who was then in a most deplorable state of ill health,) placed himself under the care of Dr. Bourne, the Water Cure Physician. Some six months or more afterward he visited this city, when I accidentally met him at Dr. Bourne's establishment, and, I am happy to say, restored to the enjoyment of good health and in fine spirits. JOHN SULLIVAN.

☞ Dr. Bourne treats all diseases of the throat, chest, and lungs—which includes diptheria, bronchitis, incipient consumption, pleurisy, croup, etc.—with the greatest success. Great relief is afforded in advanced stages of consumption. Rheumatism, paralysis, neuralgia, fever and ague, dropsy, etc., etc., are also cured quickly, pleasantly, and economically. No medicine whatever.

Store fronts on Market and Sutter streets, below the Market House. Open every evening until seven o'clock, and on Saturdays until ten P. M

Dentist Work.—Messrs. Knowles & Clark have an improved method of combining their gold and vulcanite material in the manufacture of dentistry, which renders the work superior in finish and durability. The samples of their handiwork on exhibition at the late Fair were much admired, and we observe that they were awarded a special premium silver medal.—Mining and Scientific Press.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

Dr. Wm. K. Doherty's Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

A TRUE STORY.

DEDICATED TO THE SICK.

There dwelt in Sacramento a pale, bilious mechanic,
His muscles were strengthless, his blood it was chill;
And the wife of his bosom believed, in her panic,
The husband she worshipped was hopelessly ill.
Seeking daily for help, in her wifely devotion,
All vainly she tried pill, powder and potion—
Till at last, when a prey to grief's wildest emotion,
Of HOSTETTER'S BITTERS she heard from a friend.

She purchased the cordial, half hoping, half fearing,
A prayer on her lip and a tear in her eye;
And taking his hand, with words kindly and cheering,
Besought him the tonic for her sake to try.
As he drank, a new life through his system seemed stealing,
Each following draft did its mission of healing,
Until, strong in health and most grateful in feeling,
He told the "true story" here twined into song.

It is also proper to state that the Bitters are sold exclusively in glass, and never, under any circumstances, by the gallon or barrel. Imposters and imitators are abroad, and the only safeguard the public have against them is to see that the Bitters they buy have the engraved label and note of hand of Messrs. Hostetter & Smith, and their proprietary stamp over the cork of the bottle.

A Dainty Branch of Art.—A high reputation awaits Mrs. Read for the exquisite workmanship and general adaptability to their purpose of the Ladies' Skirt Supporters and Chest Expanders, of which she made such fine display at the late Fair. Her "Lady's Bust" is another aid to feminine beauty, which confers perfection on the wearer. Mrs. Read's establishment, 109 Montgomery street, is richly worth a visit.—San Francisco Sunday Mercury.

Many of the Diseases which hitherto baffled and defied the highest medical skill, are now speedily cured by Dr. H. A. Benton, whose processes of applying electricity receive the approbation of all prominent physicians. The nerves are directly reached, and patients suffering from chronic complaints find almost immediate relief, and rapidly recover their former healthy condition. Dr. Benton is a physician of excellent reputation, and as a Medical Electrician occupies the front rank in his profession.—Golden Era.

Trimmings.—Mrs. Norcross, No. 5 Masonic Temple, Montgomery street, is prepared to fill orders for civic and military at the shortest notice; also, invites the ladies to call and examine trimmings for Opera Cloaks received per steamer from New York. Mrs. Norcross has a Show Case on exhibition at the Fair, containing goods which for elegance and taste are not surpassed by any other establishment on the Pacific coast.—San Francisco Leader, Sept. 16th.

Toys.—Toys can be purchased of Feldhush & Co., 307 California street, at 25 per cent. below the usual rates. Call and examine stock and prices.

Dr. C. W. Moore's Medical and Surgical Institute.—In speaking of this Institution, the Sunday Mercury says: "Aside from the most skilful treatment and nursing, the large, airy and elegantly-furnished rooms, will enable the patients to enjoy all the comforts and luxuries of a home. All in all, we regard Dr. Moore and his Institute a most valuable acquisition to the Pacific Coast—the need of which we have long since felt." See advertisement.

MONEY TO LOAN.—$5,000 to loan, in small sums, on City Property, for a term of years; repayments received in monthly instalments. Deposits received at 1 per cent per month from month to month. Apply to the California Building and Loan Society, 406 Montgomery street, opposite Wells, Fargo & Co's.

IN THE PROBATE COURT OF THE CITY AND County of San Francisco, State of California.

In the matter of the estate of RICHARD GRAHAM, deceased. Order to show cause why order of distribution should not be made.

On reading and filing the petition of ELIZABETH GRAHAM, executrix of the last will and testament of Richard Graham, deceased, setting forth that she has filed her final account of her administration of the estate of said deceased, in this Court, and that the same has been duly settled and allowed; that all the debts and expenses of administration have been duly paid; and that a portion of said estate remains to be divided among the legatees and devisees of said deceased, and praying among other things for an order of distribution of the residue of said estate among the persons entitled thereto:

IT IS ORDERED, That all persons interested in the estate of the said Richard Graham, deceased, be and appear before the Probate Court of the city and county of San Francisco, at the court room of said Court, in the City Hall in said city and county, on Monday, the eleventh day of December, A. D. 1865, at eleven o'clock A. M., then and there to show cause why an order of distribution should not be made of the residue of said estate among the legatees and devisees of the said Richard Graham, deceased, according to law:

It is further ordered, That a copy of this order be published for four successive weeks, before the said eleventh day of December, A. D. 1865, in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in the said city and county.

M. C. BLAKE, Probate Judge.

Dated November 8th, 1865. GEO. B. MERRILL, Attorney for Executrix.

MACHINES SOLD IN TWO YEARS!

The almost incredible increase in the sale of the Singer Machine during the past two years is owing to the popularity of the LETTER A TRANSVERSE SHUTTLE Family Machine, which was introduced in 1860, since which time it has earned and established a reputation for family uses equal to the celebrated manufacturing machines of this firm, which are generally acknowledged even by dealers in other sewing machines, to be unequalled for such purposes.

TO THE LADIES OF CALIFORNIA.

IT IS A FACT, which all should know, that

Washing may be Done for Half the Cost,

and in half the time, required by pursuing the method now in use. An enormous waste of time and materials attends the old and ordinary process. And this is not because a better method is not known, but because housewives persist in treading in the beaten track followed by their mothers and grandmothers before them, opposing every change, and refusing even TO MAKE A FAIR TRIAL of those new inventions which scientific research has produced.

If the housekeepers of San Francisco and of the State will try the

California Washing Extract,

simply by way of experiment, they will be amazed to find how much unnecessary labor may be saved by its use. It may be obtained at all the principal Groceries of the city, or in quantities of the Agents, HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN.

The use of the EXTRACT renders "rubbing," "pounding," "washboards," and all the severe drudgery of the usual method quite unnecessary. It thoroughly cleanses, without injuring the clothes. In short, it works such wonders as no one will credit without witnessing them. All that the inventor asks of any doubting housewife is

A SINGLE TRIAL.

The following certificate from the State Assayer, furnished after an analysis of the EXTRACT, speaks for itself:

A. ENQUOIS—Dear Sir: I have examined the sample of liquid handed me, and find it free from acid or any substance that would be injurious to clothing.

Very respectfully, B. B. THAYER.

PLEIADES.

BY CHAS. G. AMES.

I.

A GENTLE Sisterhood, that nightly walk,
Handed, the shady pathway of the skies!
I hear soft murmurs of your maiden talk,
I read soft love-light in your maiden eyes.

II.

A flock of Lambs, that stroll the fields of blue,
And camp beside the silver stream of heaven!
Nor Wolf nor Bear can hurrass such as you;
To you all space for a safe fold is given.

III.

Seven Lamps, that burn before the throne of God!
Why hung out nightly to the gaze of men?
Blest stars! ye light for us the upward road;
Ye lead lost children to their home again.

THE MOUSE-TRAP.

"WE that have free souls, it touches us not."

HAMLET—Act III., Scene 2.

THE Call is perfectly miserable at the idea of 1,000 women being added to the population of the Pacific coast. It calls Mercer, the philanthropist, "Humbug Mercer," and begs Governor Andrew to advise the "deluded females" to return to New England, instead of letting them come to "a country where they are not wanted." We don't believe the cruel little Call would be at all distressed if the whole ship-load went to the bottom. It had the brutality to say that, for all practical purposes, they might as well be thrown into the Bay as landed on the Pacific coast. We expect Mercer knows what he is about. In a letter to the N. Y. Evening Post, dated October 23d, he gives the reasons which induced him to look up 1,000 women for Washington Territory. He makes out a very good case. He says that, on visiting the Territory, he found there a good climate, good soil, lumber, minerals, fish, wool, fruit, grass, grain, and lots of fine young men. His philanthropic soul bled for these young men. They were far from their sisters and mothers. It was a pitiable spectacle to see nice young men wandering about without buttons on their shirts. His great mind grasped the situation. He saw what was wanted. He determined to supply the want. He was convinced that a thousand women would go off like hot cakes among so many single young men. He proceeded East, and at infinite labor procured a cargo of ladies. He says he has a really superior article; an assorted cargo. Is the man who procures 1,000 ladies, each one of whom he can warrant as a desirable wife for a young man, to be sneered at as a humbug by a little paper which at this very day contains an advertisement setting forth that "a young man of sober, steady, and industrious habits, is desirous of forming the acquaintance of a young woman with a view to matrimony," and desires to be addressed on the subject for one week? Let that young man wait until A. S. Mercer's assorted cargo of wives arrive. Think of a thousand to choose from, every one of whom is warranted as good as another! Mercer a humbug! Does he induce these ladies to accompany him under false pretences? Not he; he says:

"Those who accompany me must not expect to occupy a flower garden or to live upon sweet perfume, but must calculate that they are going into the vineyard to labor, and that their labor will be rewarded."

Can a man speak fairer? He expressly states that they "must not expect to occupy a flower garden or to live on sweet perfume." We don't know that we should ourselves object to a wife who could live on sweet perfume, provided that a little sweet perfume would last her a long time. A bottle of eau de cologne a month would be cheap board, and a hammock slung in a flower garden would be cheaper than rooms at the Cosmopolitan. We hope the Call will desist from its endeavors to bear Mercer's stock, and cause it to depreciate in value. If he in the generosity of his nature allows us to have a first view, we ought to be grateful: we could pick out a few wives—the most desirable—and pass the rest on to our neighbors in Washington Territory. We do not believe that we can have too much of a good thing, and that female population is a good thing no one can deny. Finally, as Mr. Mercer does not intend to bring 1,000 women to San Francisco, but has procured them in the Eastern States to supply a pressing want which he honestly believes to exist in Washington Territory, it is not the Call's business, and that paper has no right to stigmatize A. S. Mercer as "Humbug Mercer," or term these ladies deluded before it knows whether they are deluded or not.

THE Bulletin ought to have more consideration for the feelings of "respectable" people than it has shown of late. It is well enough, if Ah Gee steals a chicken, or a greasy mechanic gets drunk, and is arrested for fighting, to let the public know all about it; but it ought really to conceal the little failings of rich and respectable people. In Thursday's issue, the local reporter talks of Samuel Brannan's being arrested and locked up in the station house for being drunk, just as coolly as if he was speaking of some poor devil without a cent; he hasn't enough consideration to say "Samuel Brannan, Esq.," or even Mr. Brannan. This sort of thing won't do. If this is a republican country, a newspaper reporter who, perhaps, never had more than two or three hundred dollars in his possession at one time in the whole course of his life, isn't to call a man worth hundreds of thousands of dollars "Brannan," even if he does get drunk! It is decidedly wrong to talk of a man who owns so much money being "put in the calaboose;" "placed under temporary restraint" was the term to use. That reporter will make the Bulletin unpopular. In the same issue, he gives an account of a star performer being whipped on the stage by a stock actor, and in his description he could not be more disrespectful if he were talking of a "supe," instead of an Anglo-German tragedian. He might have known that Mr. Daniel E. Bandmann wouldn't like to have that innocent little peculiarity of his—spitting at people he doesn't like—exposed in print, and it was inconsiderate, to use a very mild term, to say anything about the matter. It's all bosh to talk about the duty a journalist owes the public; no "smart" newspaper writer thinks of that. If the Bulletin reporter had suppressed those paragraphs relating to the rich man who got drunk, and the star performer who got whipped, he might have had the honor of counting Samuel Brannan, Esq., the capitalist, and Daniel E. Bandmann, Esquire, the Anglo-German tragedian, among his personal friends; and the public would not have known that he was delinquent in the duty he owed it. As it is, both the capitalist and the "star" will, no doubt, cherish a deadly hatred for the reporter, will tell the public he has a personal spite against them, and the public will believe them. If the reporter of the Bulletin wishes to make friends, he will oblige individuals, and let the public whistle for news which it will pay him better to keep from them.

"EARL RUSSELL throws himself on the mercy of the country." The above sensation "head line" appears in the telegraphic column of the Alta. The same paper makes the same statement in its editorial comments on the "singular speech" reported to have been made by Lord Russell. On referring to the dispatch, we cannot perceive anything in the report of Lord Russell's speech to warrant the statement made by the Alta. He stated that "he should abide by the principles of his life;" he requested for his colleagues time to decide upon momentous questions, and said, as every Prime Minister before him has said, and probably all his successors will say:

"The Government deemed it its duty to consult the wishes of the people, and it would be for Parliament to consider how far these wishes were based on justice."

The Alta, after this effort of genius, will next make an attempt to find "a singular and highly important statement" in a Queen's speech.

FIVE wealthy farmers, charged with being engaged in manufacturing counterfeits of United States silver coin, have been arrested near Sterling, Canada.

So says an exchange. We do not believe that these men can be punished for manufacturing sterling coin.

NEWSPAPERS publish intensely interesting intelligence. We shall probably read in a hundred papers that "A citizen of Washington named his dog Wirtz, and shot him;" also, that "A little girl in Boston asked the parson 'how much he would charge to christen her doll baby.'" This last statement is false. No little girl in Boston asked the parson how much he would charge to christen her doll baby. Punch represents a little heathen English girl as thus addressing a clergyman. Here is another wonderfully interesting paragraph:

"A man named Samuel Taylor, thirty-six years of age, residing in Finsbury, hanged himself, and at the inquest, his father, who gave evidence, attributed the act to his son's partiality for smoking, which he thought had affected his brain."

Samuel Taylor's father thought smoking had affected his son's brain, did he? The opinion of the father of Samuel Taylor, of Finsbury, on the subject of tobacco smoking, should certainly be published in every paper in the civilized world. This does not prove that smoking causes people to commit suicide; but it does prove the father of Samuel Taylor, of Finsbury, to be an idiot, who has a prejudice against tobacco. The chances are that Samuel Taylor would, had he not eased his mind by smoking, never have reached the age of thirty-six years, but would have become deranged at nineteen or twenty. The use of tobacco probably preserved that young man's sanity, and yet, because his wickedly prejudiced parent chooses to say at the inquest that he thought his son's partiality for smoking had affected his brain, to make which statement he may have been handsomely bribed by the Anti-Tobacco League, his imbecile remark is published and republished, and perhaps may put out the pipes of many weak-minded persons, who will probably commit suicide. Smoking has saved many a poor wretch from committing suicide. Many a young man, who has in a fit of despondency determined on self-destruction, has put off the commission of the impious act until his meerschaum was colored, and by the time he accomplished that, as he fondly imagined, sole remaining object of his existence, has, by the soothing influence of the heavenly weed, been brought into a healthier frame of mind, become reconciled to life, and lived to a good old age, at length dying loved and respected by all who knew him, and leaving behind him an exquisitely colored meerschaum as a costly legacy to his children.

A NEWSPAPER editor says:

"Queen Victoria is in a towering passion at an article in the London Times about her prolonged sorrow for her husband."

It is a mistake. The good Queen of England never gets into a "towering passion." There was a time when a monarch, whose conduct was as freely commented on by the editor of a newspaper as Queen Victoria's has been, would have put himself into a towering passion, and the editor in the Tower.

THE notion that departed spirits trouble themselves about what becomes of their bodies must be completely exploded. All the stories about ghosts requesting that their bodies may be decently buried, and others haunting medical students who have stolen their bones, are magnificently false. This is comforting to ladies who wear false hair; and, in these days, what lady does not? It would be very unpleasant for a lady, after honestly becoming the possessor of a magnificent waterfall, by right of purchase, to be visited by a feminine bald-headed ghost, who would demand the restoration of her hair.

THE dramatic "critic" of the Call informs the public that Mr. Boniface is "repairing rapidly many of those faults in elocution, which had to do unsurably with the lack of warmth in his first reception by the San Francisco public." Truly, it is never too late to learn. Mr. Boniface will doubtless be much flattered, after some fifteen years' experience on the stage, to be told by the "critic" of the Call that two or three weeks on the San Francisco stage has much improved his elocution! San Francisco will, if this be true, soon acquire a reputation for finishing actors

AN Eastern paper commenting on the fact that a lady who was injured by being run over received $4,000 damages, she having lost her leg through the carelessness of a Broadway stage driver, says:

"Estimating an arm to be worth one-fourth as much, we have an element of wealth beside which the National debt looks like an instalment of pin-money."

That $4,000 was only "an instalment of pin-money." The lady lost one of her pins and got paid for it.

THE telegraph tells us that President Johnson positively refuses to grant a pardon to Clement C. Clay, though Mrs. Clay has made many appeals for Clement C. The President, however, in this case, prefers justice to clemency.

[TREM.

THE SPIRIT CARAVAN.

[The descriptive power and fidelity of Arabic poetry, in setting forth both the life of the people and the scenery of the cline, are remarkable. It conjures up visions of tawny brows, flowing beards, soft eyes, picturesque turbans, pawing chargers, and patient dromedaries. We seem to be there. It is the land of the date tree and the fountain, the ostrich and the giraffe, the tent and the caravan. It is the home of the simoon and the mirage. It is the world of the desert and the stars. Hospitality waves her torch through the night to win the wanderer to be a guest. Reeking vengeance, with bloodshot eyes and dripping blade, dashes by "on a stallion shod with fire." The very picture, embodiment, breath, blaze, of all this is in the lyrics of the Bedouin bards. The richness of their language, and something of the character of the people who use it, are shown in the fact that it has eighty names for honey, five hundred for the lion, and a thousand for the sword!]

ON the desert sand bivouacked and silent lay our motley throng;
My Bedouin Arabs slumbered the unbridled steeds among;
Far away the moonlight quivered o'er old Nilus' mountain clmin,
Dromedary-bones lay bleaching, scattered o'er the sandy plain.

Wide-awake I lay: my caftan's ample folds were o'er me spread,
Covering breast and feet; my saddle formed a pillow for my head;
There I thrust my purse, together with the date-tree's fruit; and near
I had placed my naked sabre, with my musket and my spear.

All was silent, save the rustle by the dying embers made,
Save the wheeling of the vulture, from its distant eyrie strayed;
Save when an impatient charger, firmly tethered, pawed the ground,
Or a rider snatched his weapons, dreaming in his sleep profound.

Lo! the firm earth trembles! yonder, ghastly shapes are gliding by
Through the moonlight; o'er the desert savage beasts in terror fly!
Snorting rear the frightened chargers; grasps his flag our leader bold,
"Lo! the spirit caravan," he murmurs, and lets go his hold.

Ay, they come! Before the camels see the spectral drivers glide;
Seated on their stately saddles, unveiled women proudly ride;
By their side appear young maidens, bearing pitchers, like Rebecca;
Troops of phantom riders follow—on they rush with speed to Mecca.

Still they come! the train is endless—who can count the number o'er?
See, the scattered bones of camels rise, instinct with life once more;
And the whirling sand, whose masses o'er the desert darkly rolled,
Changes into dusky drivers, who the camel-bridles hold.

This the night when all the creatures, swallowed by the sandy main,
Whose storm-driven dust distressed us as we crossed the burning plain,
And whose mouldering skulls were trodden 'neath our horses' hoofs to-day,
Come to life, and in procession haste at Mecca's shrine to pray.

More, still more! not yet have passed us those who close the ghastly train;
And the first appear already, flying back with slackened rein;
From the mountains, lying yonder, whirling with the lightning's speed,
They have passed to Babelmandib, ere I could unloose my steed.

Now make ready! loose the chargers—every rider in his seat!
Tremble not as the distracted herd, when they the lion meet!
Let the spectres' flowing garments touch you as they rustle by;
Allah call! and on their camels let the phantom riders fly!

Wait until the morning breezes in your turbans wave the plumes,
Morning red and morning breezes will consign them to their tombs;
Back to dust these nightly pilgrims will return at break of day;
Lo! it glimmers, and my charger greets it with a joyous neigh."

Tricks of Travellers.—A Baden correspondent, referring to the difficulty experienced just now in getting accommodation at the hotels of the German towns, observes: "There is an artful dodge, it is true, by which you may force a landlord to take you in with the utmost sincerity against any chance of a 'take in;' but it has been tried again and again with such amazing success, that it has at last been taken up by mere bunglers, and rendered now of comparatively little avail. There was a traveller who went about clad in very commonplace attire, and with most unpretending luggage; he never gave himself the airs of a prince or affected the bustle of a queen's messenger. He simply wrote the name 'Bædeker' in large white letters on his black leather portmanteau; and, oh! the talismanic powers of that name! 'Une chamcre pour Monsieur; mais comment? Si ce n'est bien difficile, c'est fait. Si c'est impossible, celu se ferra.' Bædeker, if the stay-at-home reader knows nothing about him, is, or rather was, the name of the clever author of the Continental guide-books—a man who could pull down a hotel or build it up in three days."

Saratoga Promotions.—Opposite me, in the ball-room, to-night, sits a stout woman, in a wide-striped silk dress. She is the wife of a legal notability, and was, when young, a circus rider of great repute, renowned chiefly for leaping, unaided, upon a running horse, in the ring. Another fine-looking couple graduated from Fulton Market—the husband still sells bivalves in that famed locality.—Saratoga Letter.

MATRIMONIAL INFELICITIES.

AFTER MIDNIGHT.

"DO you hear that child cough, my dear?" I asked the mother of my children, as I raised myself on one elbow in bed, and listened.

"No," she said, awaking from her sleep, "I do not."

"Then, you must be deaf," I cried. "Hark!"

The interesting woman lifted her head from the pillow, untied the strings of her bonnet de nuit, brushed back a lock of hair from her right ear, and listened attentively.

"There," I said, as a harsh, discordant sound broke the silence, "do you hear it now?"

"I hear a singular noise," she replied, "but it is not a cough."

"Then I should like to know what it is," I exclaimed.

"I am sure I cannot tell," she replied; "but it isn't a cough, that is very certain."

"I am not so certain, however," I said.

"I can't help it," she answered; "I am a mother, and am presumed to know the sound of a child's cough when I hear one."

"Well," I said, "I am a father, I suppose, and I don't see why I can't tell a cough when I hear it. Listen!"

"My dear," and my wife grasped my arm nervously, as she spoke, "it proceeds from some one trying to get into the house. That noise comes from a file!"

"Nonsense!" I replied; "burglars wouldn't think of breaking in here."

"Hark!" she cried; "I hear some one on the stairs."

We both sat up in bed, with our eyes fixed upon the door. Again we heard the hard, harsh notes that first aroused me. There was no mistaking the sound this time, and my wife said:

"It is the little boy; he was out too much to-day, and though I tried hard to do so, I couldn't keep him in."

The door opened at this moment, and Katy entered.

"Oh, ma'am, the little boy coughs so, and I don't know what to give him. I think he has the croup, ma'am."

"Go back to the nursery immediately," my wife said, "and I will be there in a minute."

My wife rose, went to the closet, selected the proper remedies, and opened the door to depart."

"Well," she asked, turning to me, "are you not going with me?"

"What good can I do?" I replied. "I don't see why I should get up in the middle of the night, and go trotting around the house because you do. If I could be of any possible service, I would go, of course."

"Well, it would only look fatherly in you to do it," she answered. "Will you go?"

"My dear," I said, "if there be anything I dislike more another, it is to get up in the middle of the night. I'll go if it be necessary; but don't wait for me, for it will take me some time to dress, and the little fellow needs you there at once."

My wife departed.

I laid down, deciding to remain where I was, rather than go where I knew I should be in the way. Ten minutes passed, during which time the little boy coughed occasionally, but each time it was looser and more natural. Then, satisfied that he was improving under his mother's treatment, I resolved to go asleep. Scarcely were my eyes closed, when Katy tapped at the door.

"Come in," I cried.

"The mistress would like to have you come to the nursery to see the little boy."

"How is he?" I asked. "Is he awake or asleep?"

"Oh, he is just sleeping nicely, and he looks so purty, the mistress thought you'd like to see him."

"Not to-night, Katy. Tell your mistress I'll see him in the morning."

Then I turned over and closed my eyes again. I had gone a little distance into the land of Nod, when my wife touched me on the shoulder.

"You are a humane, affectionate father, aren't you?" she said, regarding me with a severe look.

"I don't know anything to the contrary," I replied. "Do you?"

"Yes, I do," she answered. "And I must say I think your conduct to-night was atrocious. Not only did you let me go alone to the nursery, but when I sent for you to come and see the little boy, who, for aught you knew, was dying, you refused. You men are just as cruel and hard-hearted as you can be. We women must get up in the night and attend to the children if they be sick, while you sleep as soundly as if there were no cares in the world."

"But, my dear," I answered, "I was very weary and wanted to sleep."

"So did I," she replied; "but no, I had to keep awake. If I hadn't, I don't know where that dear little boy would have been by this time. It is n't owing to you that he is now alive."

"Well, I should just like to know," I said, maliciously, "to whom it is owing, if not to me?"

"Well, I will tell you," said my wife; "it is to me and—"

"Who?" I asked, raising myself on one elbow, and regarding her closely, as she paused a moment before uttering the final name.

"Katy, to be sure," she continued. "Were n't we obliged, I should like to know, to soak the little fellow's feet, and rub sweet oil upon his chest, and put flannels, dipped into hot vinegar and pepper, around his throat, and coax him to take medicine?"

"Oh!" I exclaimed, as I sunk down among the pillows, "I thought—"

"Never mind what you thought," my wife interposed. "The truth is, you only think of your own ease and comfort, and never care whether I enjoy myself or not."

"My dear," I said, "you must excuse me, but I wish to go to sleep. I will hear the remainder of what you have to say in the morning; because if there be one thing I dislike more than another, it is to listen to a curtain lecture at night."

"For a married man of your experience," she said, "it seems to me that you are very particular. Now, it appears to me that if I wished to lecture you—which, thank fortune, I do not—that the present time would be the most appropriate, and also the least liable to interruption. You cannot say, though, that I have ever condescended to lecture you. I trust I have more respect for my husband than to utter a word to him which would have the effect of lowering him in my own estimation. I do think, however, that you sometimes deserve a reprimand, although you do not get it."

"Will you oblige me, my love," I said, tenderly, "by going to sleep?"

"Certainly," she answered.

There was a silence for three minutes and a half. I sunk into a doze. My wife startled me by exclaiming:

"I do think you treat me too badly. I am not allowed to express an opinion of my own, and when I try to speak you endeavor to stop me by telling me to go to sleep. It was not so once. I have seen the time when you were only too glad to listen to whatever I had to say, and would willingly sit up all night, to hear me talk, if I would only let you. I don't understand why you men change so after marriage. I'm certain I have not altered in the least. What I was, in disposition and feelings, when a girl, I am now; but no one would recognize you for the amiable, smooth-spoken young man of — how many years ago were we married?"

"I am sure I don't know, and, what is more, I don't care," I replied. "Now, will you be quiet, and let me go to sleep or not?"

"Oh, yes, go to sleep if you want to," she answered; and another brief silence ensued, broken by my wife's sobbingly exclaiming:

"Only fifteen years next June since we were married, and to hear you say now that you don't know nor care when it took place, is perfectly horrible, and something I never expected to hear from your lips."

"Well, now that you have heard it," I exclaimed, "I trust you will be able to go to sleep, for I tell you positively, that if there be one thing I dislike more than another, it is to hear you talk after midnight."

Having uttered this, I drew the bedclothes closer about me, shut my eyes firmly, and went to sleep—almost.

"Husband!" somebody said close by me.

"Well, wife, what is it?" I inquired.

"I didn't mean everything I said to you to-night," she continued.

"Nor I," I added, "everything I said to you. Good night!"

"Are you sleepy?" she inquired.

"Yes; good night!" I replied.

"Good night!" she answered.—Barry Gray.

Letters Brought to Grief.—Her Majesty's mail came to grief at Wigan on the 9th ult., in strange fashion. The letters are all dropped and taken up—during the full career of train—by mechanical appliances; but the defect of these, or of the manual labor necessary to guard them, produced a singular accident. The bags from Wigan for the north had been slung in their accustomed position, prior to the mail coming up, and the post-office officials were in waiting to receive those from the south intended for Wigan, when by some defect in the mechanism, or default of those in the train, the long leathern envelope containing half-a-dozen different bags of letters for distribution in the district, missed the catch, fell on the line, was caught by the wheels of the carriage, and was cut, ripped and slashed in a thousand directions. As may be expected, the letters forming the freight were sadly-mutilated and dispersed, tattered envelopes, newspapers, note-sheets, invoices, funeral cards, etc., being strewn along the line for a distance of a mile or two. Many hundred letters were recovered intact, but a vast quantity are so totally defaced and torn as to render their contents or address totally undecipherable.

LORD NELSON AND LADY HAMILTON.

SIR WILLIAM HAMILTON returning to England from his embassy at the Court of Naples, determined to visit his large estate on the bank of Milford Haven, and to see the new town which had grown up so suddenly under the good management of his nephew, the Hon. Charles Greville. Lady Hamilton chose to accompany her husband. On hearing this Lord Nelson became very desirous of examining the celebrated harbor of Milford: so a party was formed for a tour in Wales. Lady Nelson was left behind, and her faithless husband devoted himself to the notorious Lady Hamilton, as if he had been her affianced lover.

Lady Hamilton began her career as a poor girl, selling matches in the streets of London. Happening to pass under the window of Sir Joshua Reynolds, he was so struck with her beauty that he called her in, and engaged her to sit for her likeness the next day. Having made a charming picture of her in that character, he found her form so faultless that he made her his model for other pictures, and at last exhibited her to his fellow artists, and even to amateurs and patrons of art, in chosen attitudes of his arranging, and great was the admiration she excited. One of the spectators fell in love with her beauty and made her his mistress. Intoxicated by the change from poverty to luxury, she became very extravagant, and the income of her lover would not suffice for her expensive pleasures. He was therefore well pleased when she left him for Sir William Hamilton, then Minister to Naples.

The beautiful match girl now became a very fine lady, and was delighted with the idea of going to Naples and living with a titled embassador. She had not been long there, when she persuaded her infatuated lover to make her his lawful wife. After this she was presented at the corrupt court and became the intimate friend of the licentious Queen of Naples. During her residence there Lord Nelson came with the English fleet into that bay, so famous for its beauty. The naval hero soon became violently enamored of the charming Lady Hamilton; she too was in love, and for the first time.

* * * * * *

Her amiable old husband had neither eyes nor ears for her intrigues, and always behaved as if he considered her intimacy with Lord Nelson as an affair of pure friendship, in which he participated. He certainly did share in the love-letters written to Lady Hamilton by Lord Nelson, when he was fighting the French, for he read some of them to my father, and I well remember his repeating the first sentence in one of them, written the day after a sea-fight. It ran thus: "My dearest, dearest, dearest Emma! last night we sent five hundred Frenchmen's souls to hell." I am not certain of the number specified, but every other word I am sure of. Such was the style of correspondence between the match-girl and the sailor.

When Sir William Hamilton and his party arrived in Milford, accompanied by the great naval commander, the nobility and gentry for miles round flocked to see him, and pay their respects to the hero of the Nile.

A public dinner was given Nelson, at which Lady Hamilton chose to be present; she sat next to him, cut up his meat, which the loss of an arm prevented him from doing, and fed him with tit-bits from her own plate. She had a fine voice and would sing sailor's songs and verses written in praise of the great admiral, at public dinners, whilst her doting old husband sat by admiring her. When I saw her in 1802, her face was still beautiful; but she had grown fat and her figure was spoiled. Short waists and narrow skirts were then in fashion. The French had introduced the custom of wearing as little clothing as possible, and making that little look like the drapery of an ancient Greek statue. The weather was very warm when Lady Hamilton was in Milford, and she walked about the town in two garments only, showing her shape most indecently.

My mother had resolved to take no notice of Lady Hamilton, and, being on the eve of her confinement, she excused herself from calling on her. But that bold woman was resolved that it should not be said that Mrs. Rotch would not receive her; so, one very warm day, when all our doors and windows stood open, she walked into our drawing-room, where my mother and I were sitting, and greeted us very familiarly. Though I was but a child, I was struck with the coldness of my mother's reception, and wondered that she was not more cordial to such a lovely and fascinating guest.

Lord Nelson was very ordinary in his appearance; lean and sallow, his face much wrinkled and his hair very thin. He was proud of the loss of his arm, and always wore his coat sleeve empty. When I was one day standing by him, at our house, with my eyes fixed on that empty sleeve, he said, "Look at it well, and then you will always remember me by my one arm."

Sir William's estates all descended to his nephews, whether by entail or his own choice I do not know; but he left very little to his widow, and Nelson did not add to her income, but made himself ridiculous by a request in his will that the government would grant her a pension. The public could see no reason why the mistress of Lord Nelson should be so provided for, but the friends of the admiral said she deserved it for having obtained, through her intimacy with the Queen of Naples, some valuable political information for Lord Nelson when he was commanding a fleet in the Mediterranean. Whether this was true or not, her services were never recognized, and she died in great poverty in France.—From Mrs. Farrar's "Recollections."

SLIPS OF THE PEN.

WHEN Mrs. Caxton innocently made her wiser-half the father of an anachronism, that worthy scholar was much troubled in consequence. His anachronism was a living one, or he might have comforted himself by reflecting that greater authors than he had stood in the same paternal predicament. Our old English dramatists took tremendous liberties this way, never allowing considerations of time and place to stand in the way of any allusion likely to tell with their audience. Shakspeare would have been slow to appreciate a modern manager's anxiety for archæological fidelity. His Greeks and Romans talk about cannons and pistols, and his Italian clowns are thorough cockneys, familiar with every nook and corner of London. And so it is with other caterers for the stage. Nat Lee talks about cards in his tragedy of Hannibal; Otway makes Spartan notables carouse and drink deep; Mrs. Cowley's Lacedæmonian king speaks of the night's still sabbath; D'Urfey's ancient Britons are familiar with Puritans and packet-boats; and Rymer (though he set himself up for a critic) supplies a stage direction for the representative of his Saxon heroine to pull off her patches, when her lover desires her to lay aside her ornaments.

When Coleman read "Inkle and Yarico" to Dr. Moseley, the latter exclaimed: "It won't do. Stuff! Nonsense!" "Why?" asked the alarmed dramatist. "Why, you say in the finale:

> Come, let us dance and sing,
> While all Barbadoes' bells shall ring!

It won't do; there is but one bell in the island!" This mistake was excusable enough; but when Milton described

> A green mantling vine,
> That crawls along the side of you small hill,

he must certainly have forgotten he had laid the scene of "Comus" in North Wales. Ernest Jones, describing a battle in his poem, "The Lost Army," says:

> Delay and doubt did more that hour
> Than bayonet charge or carnage shower;

and some lines further on pictures his hero

> All worn with wounds, when day was low,
> With severed sword and shattered shield;

thus making his battle rather a trial of the respective powers of ancient and modern weapons than a conflict between equally armed foes. Mr. Thackeray perpetrates a nice little anachronism in The Newcomes, when he makes Clive, in a letter dated 183—, quoting an Academy Exhibition critique, ask: "Why have we no picture of the sovereign and her august consort from Smee's brush?"—the author, in his anxiety to compliment the artist, forgetting that there was no consort till 1840.

A bull in a china-shop is scarcely more out of place than a bull in a serious poem, but accidents will happen to the most regular of writers. Thus, Milton's pen slipped when he wrote:

> The sea-girt isles
> That like to rich and various gems inlay
> The unadorned bosom of the deep;

a quotation reminding us that the favorite citation,

> Beauty when unadorned, 's adorned the most,

is but a splendid bull, beautiful for its boldness. Thomas was an adept at making pretty bulls; here is another:

> He saw her charming, but he saw not half
> The charms her downcast modesty concealed;

as if it were possible to see some of them, although they were concealed. Pope, correct Pope, actually tells us:

> Young Mars in his boundless mind,
> A work t' outlast immortal Rome designed,

The author of The Spanish Rogue makes "a silent noise" invade the ear of his hero. General Taylor immortalized himself by perpetrating one of the grandest bulls on record, in which he attained what a certain literary professor calls "a perfection hardly to be surpassed." In his Presidential address, he announced to the American Congress that the United States were at peace with all the world, and continued to cherish relations of amity with the rest of mankind. Much simpler was the blunder of an English officer, during the Indian Mutiny, who informed the public, through the Times, that thanks to the prompt measures of Colonel Edwardes, the sepoys at Fort Machison "were all unarmed and taken aback, and being called upon, laid down their arms." There was nothing very astonishing in an Irish newspaper stating that Robespierre "left no children behind him, except a brother, who was killed at the same time;" but it was startling to have an English journal assure us, that Her Majesty Queen Victoria was "the last person to wear another man's crown."

A single ill-chosen word often suffices, by the suggestion of incongruous ideas, to render what should be sublime, utterly ridiculous. One can hardly believe that a poet like Dryden could write:

> My soul is packing up, and just on wing.

Such a line would have come with better grace from the author of The Courageous Turk, a play containing the following curious passage:

> How now, ye Heavens! grow you
> So proud, that you must needs put on curled locks,
> And clothe yourselves in periwigs of fire?

Nearly equalled in absurdity by this from Nat Lee's Œdipus:

> Each trembling ghost shall rise,
> And leave their grizly king without a waiter.

When the news of Captain Cook's death at Owyhee came to England, the poetasters, of course, hastened to improvo the occasion, and one of the results of their enthusiasm was a Monody commencing:

> Minerva in heaven disconsolate mourned
> The loss of her Cook;

an opening sufficient to upset the gravity of the great navigator's dearest friend.

Addison lays it down as a maxim, that when a nation abounds in physicians, it grows thin of people. Fillibuster Henningsen seems to have agreed with the essayist, or he would hardly have informed General Walker in one of his dispatches, that "Doctors Rice and Wolfe died of the cholera, and Dr. Lindley sickened, after which the health of the camp visibly improved. Intentionally or not, the stout-hearted soldier suggests that the best way of getting rid of the cholera is to make short work of the doctors. Among the obituary notices in a weekly paper, not many months ago, there appeared the name of a certain publican, with the following eulogium appended to it: "He was greatly esteemed for his strict probity and steady conduct through life, he having been a subscriber to the Sunday Times from its first number." This is a worthy pendent to Miss Hawkins's story of the undertaker writing to the Corporation of London, "I am desired to inform the Court of Aldermen, Mr. Alderman Gill died last night, by order of Mrs. Gill;" and not far short, in point of absurdity, is Madame Tussaud's announcement of the exhibition of the effigy of the notorious Palmer, "who was executed at Stafford with two hundred other celebrities." The modern fashion of naming "florists" flowers, must be held responsible for the very dubious paragraph we extract from a gardening paper: "Mrs. Legge will be looked after; she may not be so certain as some, but she was nevertheless very fine in the early part of the season. Lady Popham is useful, one of the old fashioned build, not quite round in the outline, but makes up well."

Thackeray seems to have had an intense dislike to the trouble of revision, for his popular works, especially those published periodically, abound in trivial mistakes, arising from haste, forgetfulness, and want of care. The novelist mortally wounds an old lady with a candle instead of candlestick, and afterwards attributes her death to a stone staircase. Newcome senior is colonel and major at one and the same time; Jack Belsize is Jack on one page, and Charles on another; Mrs. Raymond Gray, introduced as Emily, is suddenly rechristened Fanny; and Philip Fermor on one occasion becomes transformed into the author's old hero, Clive. With respect to the last-mentioned gentleman, author and artist seem to have differed, for while Mr. Thackeray jests about Clive's beautiful whiskers and handsome moustaches, Mr. Doyle persists to the end in denying young Newcome's possession of those tokens of manhood.

It is not often that an author is satirical upon his own productions; but Charles Dickens has contrived to be so. Describing the old inns of the Borough, in his Pickwick Papers, he says they are queer places, with galleries, passages, and staircases wide enough and antiquated enough "to furnish materials for a hundred ghost stories, supposing we should ever be reduced to the lamentable necessity of inventing any." How little could "Boz" have anticipated certain charming Christmas books witching the world a few years later! So also American Notes, Mr. Jefferson Brick, and the trans-Atlantic Eden lay unsuspected in the future, when he made Old Weller suggest Mr. Pickwick's absconding to America till Dodson and Fogg were hung, and then returning to his native land and writing "a book about the 'Merrikens as 'ill pay all his expenses and more, if he blows 'em up enough!"

STREET CRIES OF CAIRO.—"The lupins of Nubali are sweeter than diamonds!" a blue captain, with a sack on his back, announces. Soon after is heard a cry of a water-carrier, "May God requite it to me!" accompanied by the clatter of cups. Almost at the same moment I heard the cries, "May God grant that I easily get rid of them, oh lemons!" and "Fragrance of Paradise," with which the leader in henna blossoms tries to induce the passer-by to purchase. "Oh, arouser of compassion, oh Lord!" a beggar grunts, and a member of the same guild, possessed of greater self-respect, shouts almost simultaneously "I am the guest of God and of the Prophet!"—Wraxall.

INDOOR GARDENING.—No. 2.

TO the true lover of flowers, it is the life displayed in them which he loves as much as the dazzing splendor of their appearance when in bloom. The feeliogs engendered by observing the tender green of the plantlet, as it raises itself above the soil and spreads into leaves, or by eontemplating the frond of the fern, as it rises like a bishop's erosier and expands into feathered being, or by noting the dicotyledonous lifting up their capsuled heads into the light, can only be excelled by those of the mother, as she watches her offspring —life of her life, almost soul of her soul—laugh, and play, and grow into manhood or womanhood : a pleasure to look at and a result to be proud of.

Flowers are like children : in order to bring them up well, we must love them. The pleasure of providing for their wants will be as agreeable as that of seeing them flower. Their bloom will be the fruit of our labor : it will have been merited by the act of cultivating them. They will have for us a hundred times the value that most beautiful plants would have which are bought in bloom, and which again, in their turn, are replaced by others, without our having assisted in their productiou.

For business, we go to the ends of the earth. We quarrel with China, we coeree Japan ; but from these distant regions we bring more than goods. China lays claim to being the mother of gardens and gardening ; and truly she had the art, now earried to perfection in Japan, of growing oak or elm, larch or beech, fir or willow, with every appearanee of age and of any size, from two feet high, with leaves and flowers and sud, to a huudred feet or more, and with shade for a regiment of soldiers. Alike the sun, life and heat, letters and religion, civilization and gardeniug, come from the east and travel westerly.

If China did not teach Babylon gardening, she was coeval with that long defunct empire. Persia taught Greece ; Greece carried the art to Rome ; and Rome brought it to England. But flower-gardeniug, properly speaking, did not commence until the Tulipomania in Holland, when the turban-headed flower in many instanees fetehed its weight in diamonds. For, flower-gardening is not merely transplantation : it is the production of rarity and the development of bloom under every possibility of form and untoward circumstances.

Years ago, to maintain that ferns would grow in air-tight cases, or to attempt to cultivate plauts in close rooms, would bave been laughed at by gardeners ; but observation and experiment have made both plans triumph, and suffieient laws have been discovered and rules laid down to lead to success by any one who will spare a little time for the essay. But there is much to resolve—those who begin as learners may end as discoverers.

Nor is the cultivation of plants in close rooms injurious to health, for, by the law of compensation, plauts imbibe what animals reject (carbonic acid,) giving out iu return what is the soul of life to the latter (oxygen.) Only under certaiu circumstances are they injurious, such as when in ill health and decay, and to some extent during the hours of darkuess, but they do not equal gas burners, lamps and candles, which take away the oxygeu, and give nothing in return but soot, carbonic acid and sulphuretted hydrogen. The folly and ignorance which reign too often supreme over the sick room cannot be better exemplified than by this : while the nurse will leave the patient stewing in a corrupting atmosphere, the best ingredient of which is carbonic acid, she will deny him, on the plea of unhealthiuess, a glass of cut-flowers or a growing plant. Now, no one ever saw "overcrowding" by plants in a room or ward ; and the carbonic acid they give off at night would not poison a fly. Nay, in overcrowded rooms, they actually absorb carbouic acid, and give off oxygeu. Cut flowers also decompose water and produce oxygen gas. (Florence Nightingale in Notes on Nursing, page 84.)

Perhaps there is no pleasanter way of beginning indoor gardening than settiug up a range of Hyacinth bulbs in glasses. The time of year for beginniug—just iu the closing autumu—the easy and cleanly work, the absence of blight and iusects, and the really magnificent flowers, which are by all attainable, combine to make it really attractive, so that perhaps more than half of those who praetice it, become thenceforth 'plant-fanciers.'

Few flowers have become more popular, and deservedly so, than this. Its easy culture, its adaptability to the dwelling room, its graceful habit,its fragrance, and its variety of color, are traits we can scarcely hope to find equalled in any other favorito. Several modes of cultivation offer themselves, all valuable, according to situation aud circumstances.

When cultivated in glasses and water, the single-flowered varieties are to be pr ferred. Fill the glass with rain or soft water to about the eighth of an inch from the bowl of the glass, and plaee in it a small piece of charcoal, which has beeu previously soaked in water, and which, in consequence of having imbibed moisture, will be sufficiently heavy to sink to the bottom. Then carefully wipe away all moisture which may have been deposited on the glass in pouring the water in; then plaee the bulb earefully in the bowl so as to nearly touch the water. They should be placed in a dark closet for a month, when they will have nearly filled the glasses with their roots ; they ean then be brought out and placed on the window, where they will soon throw up their bloom stems, and reward the possessor for the care and attention bestowed upon them, by their beauty of color and sweet perfume. The hyacinth, so celebrated in the songs of the poets, from the time of Homer to the present day, is made emblamatical of games or play, in allusion to the fabulous origin of this flower, which, aceording to mythologists, sprung from the blood of Hyacinthus. who was killed by a quoit, through the agency of Zephyr, who blew it from its course as it passed from the hand of Apollo, and smote the unfortunate youth on the head.

Hurd mentions

> "The melancholy hyacinth that weeps
> All night, and never lifts an eye all day," probably in allusion to the melancholy fate of Hyacinthus.

The following lines were sent to Tait's Magazine in allusion to the above :

> "Oh! mournful, graceful, sapphire-colored flower,
> That keep'st thine eye forever fix'd on earth!
> Gentle and sad, a foe thou seem'st to mirth—
> What secret sorrow makes thee thus to lower?
> "Perhaps 'tis that the place thou canst not change,
> And thou art pining at thy prison'd lot;
> But oh! where couldst thou find a sweeter spot,
> Wert thou permitted earth's wide bounds to range?
>
> "In pensive grove, meet temple for thy form,
> Where, with her silvery music, doth intrude
> The lucid stream, where nought unkind or rude
> Durst break of harmony the hallow'd charm."

SWEETHEART.

OH, this love of mine!
Never artist's dream
Was as fair as she;
Jetty locks that seem
Glossy as can be
Night, before the day
Hath streaked it through with gray.

Oh, this love of mine!
Brow as white as sands
On a tropic shore;
Eyes as deep as seas,
And darker than before
Dawn hath turned them blue;
Cheeks of richest hue,
Pink as pinkest shell
That ever mermaid bore
From enchanted lands,
Home where she did dwell.
Sometimes if I please
That she blossom more—
Her beauty is so fine—
Rosy as red wine.

Oh, this love of mine!
Mouth a ripened fruit,
If the maid is mute
Tempting me to sin.
In delicious greed,
If a smile I win,
Then with charming speed
It is cleft indeed,
Showing pearly seed.

Oh, this love of mine!
Such a witching curl,
Such a cunning chin,
Like a single pearl
With a dimple in.
Parian carved throat,
All of curved lines,
Such as Psyché shows
When she sad reclines
In some isle remote,
Mourning Cupid's boat
Fading out of view:
Is the picture true?
Then her bosoms' snows
In twin drifts—but hush!
All that I have shown
Could not bid her blush—
The rest's for me alone.
If you are a maid
Quite too much is said,
Unless you are as fair;
If you are a man,
Mate her if you can:
Never was a pair
Of such beauties known.

CHARLES WARREN STODDARD.

"MASSA," said a black steward to his captain, as they fell in with a homeward-bound vessel, "I wish you would write a few lines for me to the ole woman, 'cause I can't write." The good-natured skipper complied, and wrote all that Pompey dictated. As the captain was about to seal up the letter, Pompey reminded him that he omitted to say, "Please 'scuse de bad writin' and spellin'."

THE HAUNTED CASTLE.

I WAS travelling in France, and one night was overtaken by a storm, and I could find no place of refuge excepting a deserted chateau that had the reputation of being haunted. I cared nothing for ghosts, so into the chateau I went, stabled my horse in the parlor, and then, with the help of a box of matches and a newspaper I happened to have in my pocket, set to work at the half burned logs on the hearth, got up a feeble fire, lit my pipe, and drawing one of the chairs up in front of the fireplace, under the combined soothing influences of the fire and the "bacey," fell into a reverie, and finally, I suspect, a sleep. How long it lasted I don't the least know, but I suddenly became aware that the fire had died out, and that thick darkness was all around me. The thunder and rain appeared to have ceased, for not a sound broke the complete silence, which came to feel so oppressive that at last I got up and groped my way into the passage to look out on the night. Feeling my way by the wall, I slowly progressed along till I reached the hall door, but it was shut. Shut? How odd. I had certainly left it open. Perhaps I was at the wrong door. But soon I convinced myself that this was not the case by striking a match—my last, I was sorry to perceive.

"Very odd," I said to myself ; "the door was so firmly driven back by the passage of the horse, it couldn't have been shut without considerable force and noise. I wonder I didn't hear it clap, but at all events I'll go out a bit."

That was easier said than done. I put out my right hand, as a matter of course, but it was very strange, I couldn't grasp the handle. I saw well enough where it was, by the match, yet, somehow, my fingers couldn't take hold of it.

"What nonsense," I said to myself, as I perforce dropped the burning end of the match on the floor ; "what can have come over me?" and I put out my left hand. A strange twinge ran through it the moment it touched the handle, and it dropped numb and powerless by my side ; I felt I couldn't raise it, couldn't move a muscle of it.

A slight mocking laugh sounded suddenly behind me, and I am afraid I lost my temper.

"Confound you!" I involuntarily burst out ; "what do you mean by that idiotic titter? Open the door."

Dead silence—perfect unbroken silence. Had the darkness wrapped round me, and enveloped me in a thick fog? There was an oppression, a weight in the atmosphere, and I felt an indescribable something that seemed to make it an impossibility either to speak or move. Yet my senses seemed at the same time strained to an unnatural degree of expectation ; I felt as if my hearing, for example, was become unnaturally acute ; and yet I knew there was nothing to hear. Utter, complete silence—silence, indeed, that "could be felt."

With a strong effort I raised myself from the wall against which I had been leaning, and determined to make my way back to the sofa. Instantly I felt I had gained power over my arms, and made a dash at the door. Quite in vain. Again my hands trembled and fell powerless to my side ; and again that aggravating laugh was heard as if mocking my puny efforts. Restraining my anger, I got up a laugh myself, not to be out of the fashion, but I could not help knowing that it sounded forced and strange.

"How charmingly hospitable you are!" I exclaimed in French. "Really, your affection for my company is quite touching ; what a pity I can't reciprocate it!"

I thought involuntarily, as a gibbering titter again sounded close to my ear, "If I had but a light!"

The thought had hardly crossed my mind before I felt a curious conviction that there was a light in the room I had not long since left. By some irresistible impulse I felt myself attracted thither. I turned round. Why, I could see a light shining through the doorway from where I stood—there was no doubt about that.

I strode rapidly down the hall, and rushed into the room. No wonder I had seen a light, for an immense wood fire burned brightly on the hearth. I could hardly believe my senses. Where had the great pile of wood come from? How was it I heard no signs of fire-kindling through the open door? It was certainly very strange—decidedly comfortable, though, all the same, for it made the dusty old room look wonderfully cheery ; so I felt quite grateful for the attention, and mentally revoked all the abuse I had levelled at my invisible companions.

Drawing my chair again in front of the fire, I sat for some time enjoying the warmth, and gazing on the blazing logs ; then I tried the old piano, a wonderful instrument frightfully out of tune, that would have made Thalberg shiver ; and finally stretched myself on the vast sofa, which protested against my weight by many infernal groans.

Turning my face from the glare of the fire, I lay for some time in a dreamy reverie, till a slight stir made me involuntarily turn my head. What was that, a living form or a shapeless mass, that the leaping, flickering flames showed me in the arm chair opposite?

Certainly there was something there—a greyish thing—huddled up rather back in the shadow of the chimney-piece. Stay, it moves ; a head, with the long, dishevelled dark hair of a woman, emerges gradually from under the grey wrapping.

"Was this the nymph who laughed in the hall, and who noiselessly lighted the fire, I wonder?" thought I to myself, as I watched the silent surging of the drapery. "I think I ought to thank her for the fire, at all events."

So with a preliminary "Hem!" to attract the attention of my Phillis, I began a polite speech. Rapidly and noiselessly, as I spoke, the contents of the chair glided shapelessly out of sight, melted gradually and imperceptibly away, dissolving before my stupefied gaze into nothingness. There stood the empty arm chair, the firelight playing on its faded chintz cover.

I could hardly believe my eyes. Could it have been a dream? A titter seemed to come from under the sofa. I snatched one of the burning logs from the hearth and peered underneath. Of course there was nothing there except dust, and of that there was any amount. Surprised and bewildered, I stood for a moment log in hand.

"There's not much chance of finding any one, I suppose," I thought to myself; "but at any rate I'll search the house." So, taking a flaming stick in each hand, to light me as a torch on my way, I set out on my travels.

First I explored the nest of rooms opposite. They were all perfectly empty except the kitchen, where I found my old Rosinante, who had apparently betaken himself there in the vain hope that a kitchen might furnish food, and now looked more woebegone and out of sorts than ever from his disappointment.

Upstairs I tramped, looked into every room, curiously examined the turned-up bedstead in the small room, and came to the conclusion that it was a decidedly disreputable old relic; discovered an unlocked wall press, which, however, contained nothing but a horrible damp mouldy smell, and returned to my fire as I set out. No sign of a living thing was to be seen in the house, and pitching my improvised torches back on the hearth, I threw myself with disgust on the sofa, and revolved the mysterious riddle in my mind. I always was immensely worried by difficult problems, and this was one I couldn't solve, try as I would.

I leaned back on the sofa still pondering, and as I lay there I felt a consciousness creeping over me that there was something coming stealthily behind my back. Involuntarily I turned my head. Close to me, the soft brown-bearded chin leaning on the back of the sofa, was a man's head. I felt his breath on my cheek as I turned my face, and his strange, sad, grey eyes seemed to look me through and through. I started up and faced him. He was gone, gone—utterly vanished. Where had he gone to? That was the mystery; unless he had sunk down through the floor, which seemed as firm as strong boards could make it.

"Well," I thought to myself, "certainly this is a chateau of odd inmates. If the fellow had only told me his story before he disappeared in that absurd way"—and rousing up the fire, which was beginning to get low, I half expected to see him back when I had completed a scientific arrangement of the logs. But there was nothing. I went over to the window. The night was dark and cloudy, and the wind sighed a plaintive lament now and then. I tried to open the sash, but I found that it had been nailed down; so, as it was but stupid work staring out at the elements, I sauntered presently back to my sofa, determined to woo old Morpheus as the last resource of ennui.

"If it were only morning," I thought, "I would make another effort at that confounded hall-door."

"Ah, you will never leave this chateau," slowly whispered a low, sad voice in startling proximity to my ear.

"Indeed," I said, not caring at the time to take the trouble to move (you see I had got to consider the unusual quite as a matter of course.) "may I ask why?" but there was no answer.

As I lay there on the sofa, with closed eyes, I knew there was a form close to me, that if I looked I should see some shape, but I struggled against it, and forced myself to look. For an instant I got a glimpse of the bearded face and sad gray eyes I had seen leaning over me; then, I felt stifling, powerless; I knew that pitiless torso was slowly, surely, smotheringly, crushing down upon me, and that there was no escape. Closer and closer still it came stealthily on, and gasping for breath I—awoke from my dream, to find myself lying on my back on the sofa, the old brown horse snuffling at my face, and the bright May sun shining in through the opposite window.

INDIANS ATTACK THE SOLDIERS.—A correspondent writes to the Red Bluff Independent, from the head of Oak Run, that the Indians, in large force, attacked Captain Sprague's company, of the First Oregon Cavalry, in Warner's Valley, and drove him into Fort Bidwell. Captain Sprague was on his way to Camp Alvord in Stein's Valley, when the Indians surrounded him and tried to cut him off at every point, but he succeeded in saving his company and making good his escape to Fort Bidwell. The correspondent also states that Captain Starr, now stationed at Fort Bidwell, will join with Captain Sprague and take the field against these red-skins. A little "coercive persuasion" will not be lost on them.

THE VOLUNTEER COUNSEL.

JOHN TAYLOR was licensed, when a youth of twenty-one, to practice at the bar. He was poor but well educated, and possessed extraordinary genius. He married a beauty who afterward deserted him for another.

On the 9th of April, 1840, the Court House in Clarksville, Texas, was crowded to overflowing. An exciting case was about to be tried. General Hopkins, a wealthy planter, had offered a gross insult to Mary Ellison, the young and beautiful wife of his overseer. The husband threatened to chastise him for the outrage, when Hopkins went to Ellison's house and shot him in his own door. The murderer was arrested and bailed to answer the charge. This occurrence produced a great excitement; and Hopkins, in order to turn the tide of popular indignation, had circulated reports against Mrs. Ellison's character, and she had sued him for slander. Both suits were pending, for murder and slander.

The interest became deeper when it was known that Ashley and Pike, of Arkansas, and S. S. Prentiss, of New Orleans, by enormous fees, had been retained to defend Hopkins.

Hopkins was acquitted. The Texas lawyers were overwhelmed by their opponents. It was a fight of dwarfs against giants.

The slander suit was for the 19th, and the throng of spectators grew in number as well as excitement; public opinion was setting in for Hopkins; his money had produced witnesses who served as powerful advocates. When the slander case was called, Mary Ellison was left without an attorney—all had withdrawn.

"Have you no counsel?" inquired Judge Mills, looking kindly at the plaintiff.

"No, sir, they have all deserted me, and I am too poor to employ any more," replied the beautiful Mary, bursting into tears.

"In such a case, will not some chivalrous member of the bar volunteer?" said the Judge, glancing round the bar.

Thirty lawyers were silent.

"I will, your Honor," said a voice from the thickest part of the crowd behind the bar.

At the sound of that voice many started—it was so unearthly, sweet, and mournful.

The first sensation was changed into laughter, when a tall, gaunt, spectral figure elbowed his way through the crowd, and placed himself within the bar. His clothes looked so shabby that the Court hesitated to let the case proceed under his management.

"Has your name been entered on the rolls of the State?" demanded the Judge.

"It is immaterial," answered the stranger, his thin, bloodless lips curling up with a defiant sneer. "Here is my license, from the highest tribunal in America!" and he handed the Judge a broad parchment. The trial went on.

He suffered the witnesses to tell their own story, and he allowed the defence to lead off. Ashley spoke first, followed by Pike and Prentiss. The latter brought the house down with cheers, in which the jury joined.

It was now the stranger's turn; he stood before the bar, not behind it—and so near the wondering jury that he might touch the foreman with his long bony finger. He proceeded to tear to pieces the arguments of Ashley, which melted away at his touch like frosts before the sunbeam; every one looked surprised. Anon he came to the dazzling wit of the poet lawyer, Pike. Then the curl of his lips grew sharper, his smooth face began to kindle up, and his eyes to open, dim and dreary no longer; but vivid as the lightning, red as fire globes, and glaring as twin meteors. His whole soul was in the eye; and his full heart beamed out of his face. Then, without bestowing an allusion to Prentiss, he turned short round on the perjured witnesses of Hopkins, tore their testimony into shreds, and hurled into their faces such terrible invectives that all trembled like aspens, and two of them fled from the Court house. The excitement of the crowd was becoming tremendous. Their united life and soul seemed to hang on the burning tongue of the stranger; he inspired them with the power of his malignant passion; he seemed to have stolen nature's long hidden secret of attraction. But his greatest triumph was yet to come.

His eyes began to glance at the assassin Hopkins, as his lean, taper fingers assumed the same direction. He hemmed in the wretch with a wall of strong evidence and impregnable argument, cutting off all hope of escape. He dug beneath the murderer's feet ditches of dilemma, and held the slanderer up to the scorn and contempt of the populace. Having thus girt him about with a circle of fire, he stripped himself for the massacre.

Oh! then it was a vision both glorious and dreadful to behold the orator. His actions became impetuous as the motion of an oak in a hurricane. His voice became a trumpet filled with wild whirlpools, deafening the ear with the crash of power, and yet intermingled all the while with a sweet under-song of the softest cadence. His forehead glowed like a heated furnace; his countenance was haggard, like that of a maniac, and ever and anon he flung his long, bony arms on high, as if grasping after thunderbolts.

He drew a picture of murder in such appalling colors, that in comparison hell itself might be considered beautiful; he painted the slanderer so black that the sun seemed dark at noonday, when shining on such an accursed monster; and then fixing both portraits on the shrinking Hopkins, fastened them there forever. The agitation of the audience nearly amounted to madness.

At once the speaker descended from the perilous height. His voice wailed out for the murdered dead and living—the beautiful Mary, more beautiful every moment, as her tears flowed faster—till men wept and sobbed like children.

He closed a strange exhortation to the jury, and through them to the bystanders; he advised them, after they should bring in a verdict for the plaintiff, not to offer violence to the defendant, however richly he might deserve it; in other words "not to lynch the villain, but leave his punishment to God." This was the most artful trick of all, and best calculated to insure vengeance.

The jury returned a verdict of fifty thousand dollars; and the night afterward Hopkins was taken out of bed by lynchers and beaten almost to death. As the court adjourned, the stranger said: "John Taylor will preach here this evening at early candlelight." He did preach—and the house was crowded. I have listened to Clay, Webster, and Calhoun—to Dwight, Baseomb and Beecher—but never heard anything, in the form of sublime words, even remotely approximating to the eloquence of John Taylor—massive as a mountain, and wildly rushing as a cataract of fire.

[For the Californian.]

A BLOW ON THE CLIFF.

WHEN the fierce southwester of the past week was at its height, and the Oakland ferry-boat failed to make a landing at its accustomed wharf; when tall ships dragged their anchors, and umbrellas flew from the excited grasp of pedestrians; when signboards were loosed, tin roofs stripped off, and the "storm-wind Euroclydon" swept resistlessly through the deserted streets of San Francisco, two travellers in a buggy might have been seen breasting the blast on the desolate sandhills toward the ocean beach. But as at this point all resemblance to the opening chapters of a once popular novel ceased, I may as well admit that the two mysterious travellers were the present writer, and a companion, on their way to the Cliff House. The style of conveyance—whoever heard of a hero in a buggy?—the style of garment—India-rubber overcoats—were alone sufficient to unfit them for that romantic narrative which aims rather at the picturesque than the comfortable.

As we crept along, at times making scarcely any headway against the gale, which tore furiously across the road, charged with spray, that left upon our lips an ominous foretaste of the ocean, miles away, we noticed that the roar of the surf, at first quite perceptible, seemed to decrease as we approached the shore. The rain, mixed with flying particles of sand from the adjacent hills, stung our faces like the Lilliputian arrows discharged at Gulliver, and our "water-proofs"—alas! for the ingenuity of man—succumbed at last to the incessant beating of the storm. We finally sat in a douche bath, while from every angle of our garments the water poured in gentle rivulets, or from our hats dropped in a continuous "waterfall" behind. Our horse, the dauntless "Macadamizer"—albeit he had his own suspicions of the sanity of the two occupants of the buggy—butted away the storm from his broad shoulders, and, at last, "in the very tempest and whirlwind" of this elemental passion, we stood upon the balcony of the Cliff House.

Far as the eye could reach, or where the southerly trend of the beach mingled with the storm, and sky and shore line were blotted out by the driving scud, the whole vast expanse seemed to undulate with yawning caverns and toppling cliffs of water. Although the "yeasty surges" swept far up the beach, there was but little foam to seaward; the level gale sheared their white plumes almost as quickly as they heaved into sight, and drove them inland like the scattered down from some wild sea bird. The sand was covered with clinging patches of viscid spume thrown from the racing waves, as the foam is cast from the tossing bit of a thoroughbred. The lesser rocks, where the sea-lions were wont to bask in the sunlight, were scarcely ever free from the surging of tumultuous seas that boiled hissed and seethed around them. At times a wave, larger than its fellows, charging upon the single peak known as "Seal Rock," and breaking halfway up its summit, would fling half its volume in snowy foam twenty feet above the crest, to fall and fill with a leaping torrent each ravine in the rocky flanks of the lonely peak. Far out to sea, wave after wave heaved their huge leaden sides like the dull scales of some undulating monster. Nearer in shore the billows were cleanly cut, but the fierce breeze dulled their edges, and they broke unevenly upon the sand.

The view was unsurpassed in grandeur. Whether from the windows of the parlor of the Cliff House, where but a single piece of plate-glass seemed to separate the comforts and refinements of civilization and peace from the rude jarring of elemental discord, and Nature in her rudest aspect, beyond. Whether from the cliff above, where we leaned against the wind, and looked down upon the gathering surf beneath our feet and the rollers hastening with impatient strides toward the Golden Gate, or whether from the beach itself, where huge trunks of spars were rolled and tossed like straws upon the sand, and where the waves raced like ravenous wolves, and it was perilous to venture. It was with a feeling of regret that we at last turned our faces—our cheeks buffeted by the elements into a healthy glow—once more toward the city, and exchanged the rough but hearty welcome of sea and shore for the blazing "sea-coal" and close windows of the town.

BRET.

ARTEMUS WARD—HIS TRAVELS.

IN BOSTON.

A. W. TO HIS WIFE.—Dear Betsy: I write you this from Boston, "the Modern Athins," as it is denomynated, altho' I skarcely know what those air. I'll giv you a kursoory view of this city. I'll klassify the paragrafs under seprit headins, arter the stile of those Emblems of Trooth and Poority, the Washiuton correspongdents:

Copps' Hill.—The winder of my room commands a exileratin view of Copps' Hill, where Cotton Mather, the futher of the Reformers and sich, lies berrid. There is men even now who worship Cotton, and there is wimin who wear him next their harts. But I do not weep for him. He's bin ded too lengthy. I aint goin to be absurd, like old Mr. Skillins, in our naberhood, who is ninety-six years of age, and gets drunk every 'lection day and weeps Bitturly because he haint got no Parents. He's a nice Orphan, he is.

Bunker Hill.—Bunker Hill is over yonder in Charleston. In 1776 a thrillin' dramy was acted out over there, in which the "Warren Combination" played star parts.

Mr. Fanuel.—Old Mr. Fanuel is ded, but his Hall is still into full blarst. This is the Cradle in which the Goddess of Liberty was rocked, my Dear. The Goddess hasn't bin very well durin' the past few years, and the num'rus quack doctors she called in didn't help her any; but the old gal's physicians now are men who nnderstands their bisness. Major-generally speakin', and I think the day is near when she'll be able to take her three meals a day, and sleep nights as comf'bly as in the old time.

The Common.—It is here, as ushil; and the low cuss who called it a Wacant Lot, and wanted to know why they didn't ornament it with snm Bil'ins', is a onhappy Outcast in Naponsit.

The Legislatur.—The State Honse is filled with Statesmen, but snm of 'em wear qneer hats. They buy 'em, I take it, of hatters who carry on hat stores down stairs in Dock Sqnare, and whose hats is either ten years ahead of the prevalin' stile, or ten years behind it—jest as a intellectooal person sees fit to think about it. I had the pleasnre of talkin' with sevril members of the legislatur. I told 'em the Eye of 1,000 ages was onto we American peple of to-day. They seemed deeply impressed by the remark, and wantid to know if I had seen the Grate Orgin?

Harvard College.—This celebrated institootion of learnin' is pleasantly situated in the Bar-room of Parker's, in School street, and has poopils from all over the country.

I had a letter, yes'd'y, by the way, from our mootual son. Artemus, Jr., who is at Bowdoin College in Maine. He writes that he's a Bowdoin Arab. & is it cum to this? Is this Boy, as I nnrtered with a P'arent's care into his childhood's hour—is he goin' to be a Grate American humorist? Alars! I fear it is too troo. Why didn't I bind him out to the Patent Travellin' Vegetable Pill Man, as was struck with his appearance at our last County Fair, & wanted him to go with him and be a Pillist? Ar, these Boys—they little know how the old folks worrit about 'em. But my Father he never had no occasion to worrit about me. You know, Betsy, that when I fust commeuced my career as a moral exhibitor with a six-legged cat and a Bass drnm, I was only a simple peasant child—skurce 15 Summers had flow'd over my yoothful hed. But I had sum mind of my own. My father understood this. "Go," he said—"go, my son, and hog the public!" (he ment, "knock em," but the old man was allus a little given to slaug.) He put his withered han' tremblinly onto my hed, and went sadly into the house. I thonght I saw tears tricklin' down his venerable chin, hut it might hav' been tobacker jooce. He chaw'd.

Literatoor.—The Atlantic Monthly, Betsy, is a reg'lar visitor to our westnn home. I like it because it has got sense. It don't print stories with piruts and honist young men into 'em, making the piruts splendid fellers and the honist young men dis'gree'ble idiots—so that our darters very nat'rally prefer the piruts to the honist young idiots; but it gives us good square American literatoor. The chaps that write for the Atlantic, Betsy, understand their bisness. They can sling ink, they can. I went in and saw 'em. I told 'em that theirs was a high and holy mission. They seemed quite gratified, and asked me if I had seen the Grate Orgin.

Where the Fust Blud was Spilt.—I went over to Lexington yes'd'y. My Boosum hove with sollum emotions. "& this," I said to a man who was drivin' a yoke of oxen, "this is where our revolutionary forefathers asserted their independence and spilt their Blud. Classic ground!"

"Wall," the man said, "it's good for white beans and potatoes, but as regards raisin' wheat, t'ain't worth a dam. But hav' you seen the Grate Orgin?"

The Pooty Girl in Spectacles.—I returned in the Hoss Cars, part way. A pooty girl in spectacles sot near me, and was tellin' a young man how much he reminded her of a man she used to know in Waltham. Pooty soon the young man got out, and, smilin' in a seductiv' manner, I said to the girl in spectacles, "Don't I remind you of somebody you used to know?"

"Yes," she said, "you do remind me of one man, but he was sent to the penitentiary for stealin' a Bar'l of mackril—he died there, so I conclood you ain't him." I didn't pursoo the conversation. I only heard her silvery voice once more durin' the remainder of the jerney. Turnin' to a respectable lookin' female ol advanced summers, she asked her if she had seen the Grate Orgin.

We old chaps, my dear, air apt to forget that it is sum time since we was infants, and et lite food. Nothin' of lnrther int'rist took place on the cars excep' a colored gentleman, a total stranger to me, asked if I'd lend him my diamond Brestpin to wear to a funeral in Sonth Boston. I told him I wouldn't—not a purpuss.

Wild Game.—Altho' fur from the prabayries, there is abundans of wild game in Boston, such as quails, snipes, plover, and Props.

Common Skools.—A excellent skool sistim is in vogy here. John Slurk, my old pardner, has a little son who has only bin to skool two months, and yet he exhibertid his father's performin' Bear in the show all last summer. I hope they pay partic'lar 'tenlion to Spelin' in these Skools, because if a man can't Spel wel he's of no 'kount.

Summin' up.—I ment to have allooded to the Grate Orgin in this letter, but I haven't seen it. Mr. Revcer, whose tavern I stop at, informed me that it can be distinctly heard through a smoked glass in his nativ town in New Hampshire, any clear day. Bnt settin' the Grate Orgin aside (and indeed, I don't think I heard it mentioned all the time I was there.) Boston is one of the grandest, sure-footedest, clear-headedest, comfortablest cities on the globe. Onlike ev'ry other large city I was ever in, the most of the hackmen don't seem to hav' bin speshully intended by natur for the Burglery perfession, and it's about the only large city I know of where you don't enjoy a brilliant opportunity of bein' swindled in sum way, from the Risin of the sun to the goin down thereof. There4 I say, loud and continnered applaus' for Boston!

Domestic Matters.—Kiss the children for me. What you tell me 'bout the Twins greeves me sorely. When I sent 'em that Toy Enjine I had not contempyulated that they would so far forgit what was doo the dignity of our house as to squirt dish-water on the Incum Tax Collector. It is a disloyal act, and shows a prematoor leanin' tords cussedness that alarms me. I send to Amelia Ann, our oldest dawter, sum new music, viz: "I am Lonely sints My Mother-in-law Died;" "Dear Mother, What tho' the Hand that Spanked me in my Childhood's Hour is withered now?" &c. These song writers, by the way, air doin' the Mother Bisiness rather too muchly.

Your Own Troo husband, ARTEMUS WARD.

IN WASHOE.

WE reach Carson City about nine o'clock in the morning. It is the capital of the Silver-producing territory of Nevada.

They shoot folks here somewhat, and the law is rather partial than otherwise to first-class murderers.

I visit the territorial Prison, and the Warden points ont the prominent convicts to me, thus:

"This man's crime was horse-stealing. He is here for life.

"This man is in for murder. He is here for three years."

But shooting isn't as popular in Nevada as it once was. A few years since they used to have a dead man for breakfast every morning. A reformed desperado told me that he snpposed he had killed men enough to stock a grave-yard. "A feeling of remorse," he said, "sometimes comes over me! But I'm an altered man now. I hain't killed a man for over two weeks! What'll yer poison yourself with?" he added, dealing a resonant blow on the bar.

There used to live near Carson City a notorious desperado, who never visited town without killing somebody. He would call for liquor at some drinking-house, and if anybody declined joining him he would at once commence shooting. But one day he shot a man too many. Going into the St. Nicholas drinking-house he asked the company present to join him in a North American drink. One individual was rash enough to refuse. With a look of sorrow rather than of anger the desperado revealed his revolver, and said, "Good God! Must I kill a man every time I come to Carson?" and so saying he fired and killed the individual on the spot. Bnt this was the last murder the bloodthirsty miscreant ever committed, for the aroused citizens pursued him with rifles and shot him down in his own dooryard.

A SALT LAKE AUDIENCE.

THE curtain goes up, and I stand before a Salt Lake of upturned faces.

I can only say that I was never listened to more attentively and kindly in my life than I was by this audience of Mormons.

Among my receipts at the box office this night were—

20 bushels of wheat; 5 do. corn; 4 do. potatoes; 2 do. oats; 4 do. salt; 2 hams; 1 live pig (Dr. Hingston chained him in the box-office;) 1 wolf-skin; 5 pounds honey in the comb; 16 strings of sansages—2 pounds to the string; 1 cat-skin; 1 churn (two families wont in on this; it is an ingenious churn, and fetches butter in five minutes by rapid grinding;) 1 set children's under-garments, embroidered; 1 firkin of butter; 1 keg of apple-sauce.

One man undertook to pass a dog (a cross between a Scotch terrier and a Welsh rabbit) at the box-office, and another presented a German-silver coffin-plate, but the Doctor very justly repulsed them both.

AN INGENIOUS DEFENCE.

MANY years ago a gentleman, followed by a servant in livery, rode into an inn in the west of England one evening a little before dusk. He told the landlord that he should be detained by business in that part of the country for a few days, and wished to know if there were any amnsements going on in the town to fill up the intervals of time. The landlord replied that it was their assize week, and he would, therefore, be at no loss to pass away his leisure hours. On the gentleman's making answer that this was fortunate, for he was very fond of hearing trials, the other said that a very interesting case of robbery would come on the next day, the evidence being very strong against the prisoner, but the man himself persisted resolutely in declaring that he was in a distant part of the kingdom at the time the robbery was committed.

The guest manifested considerable anxiety to hear the trial, bnt as the conrt would probably be crowded, expressed some doubt of getting a place. The landlord told him there could be no difficulty in a gentleman of his appearance getting a seat, bnt that to prevent any accident, he would himself go with him and speak to one of the beagles. Accordingly they went into court next morning, and through the landlord's influence with the officers of the court, the gentleman was shown to a seat on the bench. Presently the trial began.

While the evidence was proceeding against him, the prisoner had remained with his eyes fixed on the floor, seemingly very much depressed; till being called upon for his defence, he looked up, and seeing the stranger, he snddenly fainted. This excited some surprise, and it seemed at first like a trick to gain time. As soon as he came to himself, being asked by the judge the canse of his behavior, he said:

"Oh, my lord, I see a person who can save my life; that gentleman," pointing to the stranger, "can prove I am innocent; might I only have leave to put a few questions to him?"

The eyes of the whole court were now turned upon the gentleman, who said he felt in a very awkward situation to be called upon, as he did not remember ever to have seen the man before, but that he would answer any question that was asked him."

"Well, then," said the man, "don't you recollect landing at Dover at such a time?"

To this the gentleman answered that he had landed at Dover not long before, but he could not tell whether it was on the day mentioned or not.

"Well," said the prisoner, "but don't you recollect that a person in blue jacket and trowsers carried your trunk to the inn?"

To this he answered that of course some person had carried his trunk for him, but that he did not know what dress he wore.

"But," said the prisoner, "don't you remember that the person who went with you from the boat told you a story of his being in the service, and that he showed you a scar on one side of his forehead?"

During this last question the face of the stranger underwent a considerable change. He said he certainly did recollect such a circumstance; and on the man's pushing his hair aside and showing the scar, he became quite sure that he saw the same person. A buzz of satisfaction now ran through the court; for the day on which, according to the prisoner's account, the gentleman had met him at Dover, was the same on which he was charged with the robbery in a distant part of the country. The stranger, however, could not be certain of the time, but said that he sometimes made a memorandum of dates in his pocket book, and might possibly have done so on this occasion. On turning to his pocket-book, he found a memorandum of the time he landed, which corresponded with the prisoner's assertion. This being the only circumstance necessary to prove the alibi, the prisoner was immediately acquitted, amidst the applause and congratulations of the whole court.

Within less than a month after this, the gentleman who came to the inn attended by the servant in livery, the servant who followed him, and the prisoner who had been acquitted, were all three brought back together for robbing the mail!

It turned out that this clever defence at the trial was a scheme skilfully arranged by the thief's confederates to obtain the release of their accomplice.

IT is said that the keeper of an old curiosity shop in the Rue de Grevelle, Paris, has found in the secret drawer of an old bureau seventeen inedited letters addressed to the famous Marin Delorme, by Cardinal Richelieu. So many literary treasures have lately turned up, in odd ways and places, that the public have become suspicious of every new announcement.

HOW THE DAVENPORTS WERE EXPOSED.

SPIRIDION, in a Paris letter to the Boston Saturday Gazette, says: Although the feats and failures of the Davenports are fatiguing to your ears as thrice-told tales, yet I must touch them. A correspondent must sometimes consent to be fatiguing, prepense. Their names are in everybody's mouth here; our daily papers give them one or two columns every morning. I am consequently obliged to chronicle their adventures. They came here with a great reputation, and, as they placed themselves in adroit hands the moment they reached Paris, they seemed in a fair way to make a good deal of money. Their chief patron or agent here is Mons. Bernard Derosne. He is the husband of Mlle. Judith, of the French comedy. He and she have translated a whole library of works from the English, and he has extensive relations with all the agents of publicity of Paris. Besides, Mons. Didier, our well-known publisher, is a fervent believer in mediums and all such stuff, and he aided the Davenports with all of his influence. They seemed, as I have said, to be in a fair way to make a great deal of money, when they stumbled into an unfortunate discussion with one of our sleight-of-hand men. They raised a good deal of antipathy by their bearing in this debate. The audience which assembled at their first performance was thoroughly hostile. Here let me add a curious instance of the inaccuracy of rough guesses at numbers, that while all the newspapers state the audience was composed of 800 persons, the receipts at the door showed there were but 450 present. The proceedings began with a musical prelude, which proved distasteful to the audience, and it was curtailed amid great uproar. Then Mons. Bernard Derosne appeared and attempted to state the pretension of the Davenports: they were merely passive agents, the spirits did everything. This speech, too, was cut short by the uproar of the audience, who came there determined—as one of the morning papers here stated—"to expose the Yankee humbugs." Silence, however, was restored when the Davenports appeared. They asked the audience to appoint persons to tie them. Two young men who belonged to the Davenports' orchestra volunteered their services, but the audience challenged them so unanimously and energetically, they made their retreat. Count Clary and Mons. Henri de Pesne then went on the platform (the performance took place in Salle Herz) to examine the box and watch the course of proceedings. A volunteer went on the platform with them: it was the man who conquered Rigolo, the donkey that nobody could ride; he is a dealer in stoves, a sweeper of chimneys, etc. He examined everything carefully, to the delight of the audience, and lashed the Davenports; then he turned to the audience and said: "Gentlemen, it is impossible to untie the knots I have made; they cannot be undone except with a sharp instrument," which declaration the audience lustily cheered. The doors of the box were closed and the gas on the stage lowered. No phenomenon appeared. The musical instruments remained in their places. No white hand waved at the door's aperture. The audience murmured, then screamed, next hissed. At last the doors were opened, and one of the Davenports was seen free from the gyves and manacles of hemp with which he had been bound. The rope with which he had been tied was at his feet. The conqueror of the donkey exclaimed: "'Tis impossible! Let me see the rope." It was handed him and he declared it was not the rope he had used. This declaration threw the assembly into great tumult. The doors of the box were again closed, and after a considerable interval of time (during which the greatest uproar prevailed) the second brother succeeded in getting loose. After some time, the semblance of order being restored, Mons. Bernard Derosne said: "Gentlemen, the brothers Davenport will tie themselves." This created another tumult, during which the Davenports entered the box, closed the doors, and after a brief interval of time reopened the doors and exhibited themselves tied. Thereupon the conqueror of the donkey mounted the stage, went to the box, and seizing the bar to which the Davenports were tied, exclaimed: "Gentlemen, here is the cheat; this bar is moveable;" he drew it easily out of its grooves, and the Davenports were instantly free from the ropes. Instantly sixty or eighty persons leaped on the stage; the Davenports disappeared and a scene of indescribable confusion ensued. Then the Commissary of Police appeared and restored order; he said the money would be returned at the door. Then occurred another incident which has produced a great deal of excitement here. Mons. Bernard Derosne distributed eighty free tickets among literary men here. The receipts at the door were 3700f.; the amount paid back to the audience was 4400f., consequently 70 of the 80 literary men had stolen 10f. each from the Davenports! making the Davenports' loss from this source 700f. This has raised a storm of indignation here, and Mons. Bernard Derosne has been summoned to give the public the names of the literary men who defrauded the Davenports. He is attempting to evade the question; but I think he will be obliged to tell the names of the black sheep.

The evening before the Davenports' exhibition the sleight-of-hand man named Robin, with whom they had the discussion to which I have alluded, gave a performance in which he pretended to expose the Davenports' tricks. He attracted an immense crowd. At the beginning of his performance he said: "Ladies and gentlemen, I am about to produce before you the phenomena of spiritism. I want spirits Are there any in this hall?" Immediately raps began to be heard on the stage, in the ceiling—everywhere. He added: "Very well. I see I have a good supply, and we may be sure of success. One of his attendants brought in the box and instruments of music, bell and doll, which the Davenports use. The medium next came in. Robin tied him securely with a hempen rope fourteen yards long, closed the doors of the box and immediately the doll was thrown out. music was heard, fingers, hands, a gloved hand appeared at the aperture. The doors were suddenly opened and the medium appeared calm and securely tied on his seat. The doors were again closed; the concert began; a coat, a waistcoat were thrown out and the concert was deafening. The door opened, and the medium appeared standing, and free from his bonds. Now Robin exhibited the same feats with the doors of the box open (which the Davenports have not yet done.) The medium tied himself; with his fist he threw the doll into the audience; he untied the knots with one hand, while with the other he played on all the instruments near him, took off his coat and waistcoat, and threw them among the audience: the hands appeared in one of the apertures of the box: in fine, all the tricks of the Davenports were exposed. It is an ill wind that blows nobody good—the failure of the Davenports is throwing a river of gold into Robin's purse. He turns off hundreds, nights, from his door. The Davenports have begun to give performances to which fifty people are admitted at six dollars apiece. Efforts are made to force the police to arrest them as swindlers, but I scarcely think they will prove successful.

TRAVELLING IN SWITZERLAND.

AN INCIDENT OF BRUNIG PASS.

[The following incident of mountain stage riding, sketched in the September Blackwood, will awaken a sympathetic echo in the experience of most California travellers:]

AT the top of the pass I had overheard a conversation between the conducteur and the Kutscher, or driver, as to the state of the drag—the latter functionary swearing that it was sure to give way, while the former gentleman asserted that it would do perfectly well. The dispute ended by the man in authority—who, be it observed, travelled not in the diligence, but in one of the supplementary carriages behind—saying "Probiren sie ein streich," and by his shouting out "Fort," or "away," after the vehicle had gone three or four yards in safety. "Ein streich" of that length on the almost level ground at the top of the pass, was rather an unsatisfactory proof of the soundness of the drag; and looking at the face of the conducteur and the set of the driver, I instinctively came to the conclusion that the drag would certainly give way before we got to the bottom. The only subject open for speculation was as to what particular stage of the downward progress the event would happen at. The old English mailcoachman, arguing against railways, is said to have remarked, "When a coach overturns, there you are; but when a railway accident happens, where are you?" Now, the beauty of this proposition on the Brunig was, that it combined the pleasures both of a coach and a railway accident. There you were, certainly, seated in the banquette; but where you might possibly be when the motion of the diligence ceased, was one of those problems on which the most experienced coachman in the world could throw no light whatever. It may be asked why, entertaining these views, I did not immediately stop the coach and insist on the drag being put right. However indifferent or secure I might feel as to my own fate, had I no consideration for the dozen other travellers who were in the same boat? I had, but what could be done? A pretty figure I should have cut, had I stopped the diligence and insisted on its being in danger, because I had seen the driver grind his teeth. Not being a connoisseur in rusty iron and rotten leather, it was impossible for me to advance any intelligible reason why the diligence was in danger. Anything I had said could have no effect, and probably the Kutscher, being to some extent dependent on the conducteur, would have turned round and utterly denied that he had ever felt a doubt concerning the state of the drag. Besides, one often helplessly sees much more important things going to ruin—what are a dozen people in a Swiss diligence? Having carefully diagnosed my two companions in the banquette, who were a German student and a dilapidated Frenchman, I saw they were not worthy of being intrusted with the secret, so I resolved on the only practical course open—that of watching the drag, and giving the alarm when it broke.

But it is not so easy to concentrate the mind upon a drag. The Eastern ascetic is sometimes able to do so upon his omphalos, but I am not aware that he ever succeeds with a drag, and the probability is, that if asked to do so he would reject the proposition as infra dig. So, before anything happened, the picturesque mountains on the other side of the Lake of Brienz engaged my attention. Suddenly it occurred to my mind that the diligence was going down the pass rather faster than prudence dictated. We were descending 1600 feet on a very steep corkscrew road, with sharp turnings, and so a certain moderation of progress was advisable. Instead of that, however, the diligence was advancing with a rapidity which drove the air about my face, and, on looking down, I saw a chain trailing on the ground, and perceived that, the drag had given way, the hind wheels were revolving rapidly. Immediately before was a luckily rather obtuse turn, which the diligence managed to get round with a tremendous lurch.

Then came excitement. Never before have I seen the facilus descensus Averni so finely illustrated. On the one side was a rock wall: on the other, a precipice; someway beneath there was a sharp turn, which by no possibility we could get round; and beyond that, a precipice. Down that steep road the huge vehicle went like a whirlwind. It was an immense weight, loaded with luggage, and it forced down the horses before it, so that they had to gallop at full speed in order to keep on their feet. The muscles on the haunch of one white mare stood out like twisted cables. The driver swore, but never relinquished his seat—indeed he could not to any perceivable advantage. The women inside screamed with terror. The German student placed himself in the only position where was a chance of escape. The Frenchman rose, and then stood paralysed. As for my part, I had resolved from the outset to stick by the ship so long as the ship stuck by me. Down the enormous mass went, quivering with human life, apparently to inevitable destruction.

I had great faith that if anything could be done, that driver would do it; and I thank him for not convincing me of an error of judgment. At the sharp turn to which we were hurrying there rose a bank of grass, about four feet high, which extended itself into a ledge that gradually dwindled into the side of a precipice. Keeping the horses so far as possible in hand, he drove them on and over this bank, the two leaders falling over the brink of the precipice, where they hung in the traces, and the two wheelers standing with their backs at an angle of about sixty-five degrees. The weight of the diligence, which before had been a source of danger, was what now saved us, for the wheels cut into the bank, and at the last moment their motion stopped. A foot more, and the coach, with all its living freight, would have gone over. The whole affair, as a Frenchman remarked who came up in one of the carriages behind, would have been like mashed pommes de terre. I was especially struck with the face of one man, a Swiss commercial traveller, who came out of the coupé, where he had an excellent opportunity of witnessing the danger without being able to escape. Some time afterwards I met him in the Rhone valley, and he seemed annoyed and even hurt that he was not immediately recognized; for, no doubt, the event had made an indelible impression on his mind; and I could not well explain to him that, whereas his countenance on our second meeting had a tolerably healthy, ruddy complexion, it had resembled the snows of Mount Blanc when he emerged from the coupé, which was truly a very nasty place to be in during the descent, for any one who had not a mission or two and an unfulfilled destiny in his pocket.

Of course the whole train, comprising at least half a dozen other carriages, was stopped by this accident, and many were the congratulations we received from the people who assisted in drawing back the coach and putting matters to rights. When it was ready for a new start, the conducteur invited the people to enter; but the way in which they fell back and began walking down the hill, showed how very much their faith had been shaken. In the first part of the journey, the seats beside me in the banquette had been occupied by newly-married German couple, who had afterwards exchanged with inside passengers; and I had been amused with the ingenuousness of the lady, who, on being called upon by her spouse to admire the scenery, naively remarked, "Oh ya, Liber! es wurde sehr schon sein wenn es nicht so heiss war"—It would be very beautiful if it were not so hot. When the conducteur proposed to return to his vehicle, this fraulein turned quite pale, and taking her husband's arm, walked him down the hill without uttering a word—an example which was generally followed. Perhaps she had found married life not quite the paradise which her maiden fancy had depictured; but what was this horrible spectre of a violent death that suddenly looked in at the window of her young life? Having walked as much that day as I thought beneficial, I swung myself up to my place, and lighted a cigar in case of the worst. Thinking himself challenged, the German student followed; and the Frenchman, deeming the honor of his nation at stake, came up too, muttering, "Pas possible une autre fois." This was good logic on his part; but before we got down very far it became evident that something else was wrong. One of the reins had broke; but, fortunately, it was that on the precipice side; we were not going fast; and by grinding the horses' noses against the wall, the Kutscher was able to stop them and get the rein repaired. This incident, however, was too much for the Gaul, who descended, tout tremblant, as he was bold enough to confess. The German remained, saying he would as soon die to-day as to-morrow; and we drove down triumphantly, without further mishap.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1865.

THE LATEST VIEWS OF AN HONEST MINER.

WE have permitted ourselves to indulge in the fond hope that the "Honest Miner," like the "Noble Savage" and the "Intelligent Contraband," had long since passed away. It might be humbly submitted that, at any time during the past ten years, he could have retired from public view without violence to public sentiment. In point of fact, this hard-working and conscientious sage had sat heavily and stolidly upon us. By a pleasant fiction of journalism, he had devoted those intervals of rest not preoccupied in masticating the esculent and nutritious bean, or in the festive delights of poker and "seven-up," in giving us his somewhat prolix opinions on social, political, and moral topics. In feeble imitation of Poor Richard, but without his brevity, he had paraded his honesty upon the slightest provocation. It might have been fairly questioned whether a gentleman who fried his beefsteaks and devoured saleratus bread was authority in matters of taste, whether a citizen who hanged horse-thieves and acquitted murderers was particularly sound as a politician, and whether the individual who contributed a fund of impious slang to the national vocabulary was peculiarly estimable as a moral teacher. But we never questioned the fact; we were satisfied in accepting the sentimental "Honest Miner;" in receiving the wisdom of this red-shirted and long-booted philosopher as the utterance of the ages. The constant and daily recurrence of this unwashed and irreverent sage in ballad, in drama, and literature during the last fifteen years, had, however, something of sameness—became, as it were, monotonous—that was all. As the Athenians grew tired of hearing Aristides called "The Just," we began to weary somewhat of the "Honesty" of our noble excavator.

But it seems that the Honest Miner still lives, and has turned his attention to Religion. A communication to the Evening Bulletin containing a savage onslaught on the fashionable churches, reveals his familiar signature and his equally well-known opinions. He seems to have been incensed, primarily, that handsome, well-appointed churches are built for divine worship; secondarily, that those who build them are thereby enabled to enjoy superior privileges. Here is the old, bold barbarian breadth of logic which we at once recognize as the masterly style of our ancient friend. He objects that the sexton who was engaged in showing other people to a seat, did not accord to him that immediate attention which his literary position as an Honest Miner demanded. He is severe upon two young ladies, partly because they were well dressed, chiefly because they drew their skirts away from him. He objects to the fine interior of the church, to the well-dressed congregation, to the finely-finished sermon of the preacher, "paid for by rich people." He prefaces those objections by a sentimental allusion to the memory of his mother, and the "unpretending old white frame church" of his boyhood, in a style which vividly recalls to the mind the most popular and pathetic ballads of negro minstrelsy, and renders "Dear Mother I've Come Home to Die," and the "Cottage by the Sea," feeble and ineffective by comparison. It may be generally observed that the parents of the Honest Miner are fully equal in lugubrious interest to those of the most sentimental soldier, and that the "old white cottage" of other days is a habitation quite as pathetic in its associations as any "Old Farm-House" ever erected in ballad minstrelsy.

But it is perhaps unfortunate for the Honest Miner that "the well-read and educated," who are weak enough to be tickled by a logical sermon, and who, with the wealthy, are supposed to be the natural enemies of the poor, might wickedly charge that he had advanced no argument, and that his logic was defective. That if he really was in a Christian frame of mind, he would not have spent the interval devoted to worship, in indulging in ill-concealed "envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness," as his own confession shows. That in every church there are free seats, for obvious reasons more plainly furnished than others, and that if he were really sincere in wishing that God would put it in the heart of rich men to build "a great church—as big as the Pavilion, even though the walls were unplastered, and the seats unCushioned, and the floor unearpeted—and give it to the city of San Francisco, with the proviso that clergymen of every denomination should be free to preach therein, and the poor equally with the rich should find seats without money and without price,' he would nevertheless by his own showing, be uncomfortable "on the uncarpeted floor," if some rich man should choose to fit up his pew with a carpet. That his shoes might have been in such a condition as to make contact with the white skirts of his fair neighbor anything but pleasant. That even if the "two young and pretty ladies did eye him crossly," he should have remembered that, in ancient days, the humblest Christians were subject to even greater indignities, and rather exulted over it. These, and other cruel charges might have been directed at the Honest Miner, instead of those two Christianlike and amicable replies to his article which the same paper has lately printed, and in which some honest-hearted but simple-minded respondent has offered him the freedom of sundry Bethel churches. We can appreciate the intense disgust of the "Honest Miner" at such a reply. The fact that there are churches for humble people, is of little importance so long as rich folk enjoy superior facilities in finer churches.

The peroration of the Honest Miner's article is too remarkable to omit from this hasty review:

"Do not think that I am alone in these ideas. Two young women that I know, told me they did not attend church in San Francisco, because they could not afford it. They were not like many, indifferent to those things, for I have found the Bible lying open amid their work, their constant companion."

We may be mistaken, but we think the spectacle of these two innocent and pious young females staying away from church, because they couldn't afford to dress so as to outshine their richer sisters, is one that cannot be dwelt upon without considerable emotion. We do not wonder that our Honest Miner is lashed into virtuous indignation, but, like many prejudiced and ignorant people, he seems to have mistaken the cause. But we must confess that we are a little astonished that the Bulletin should have permitted itself to be the medium of an appeal to the baser qualities of humanity as selfish and illogical as this last senile drivel of the decaying "Honest Miner."

NEW BOOKS.

IN anticipation of the holidays, our booksellers' counters are already beginning to glow with brightly-tinted and bravely-bound Christmas annuals and keepsakes. That superior taste in binding, which we have once before enlarged upon in these columns, and which is so characteristic of the latest style of bookwork, is shown nowhere as pleasantly as in these familiar household volumes. The old glaring colors and over-laden ornament which used to unpleasantly distinguish them, has given way to exquisite taste and artistic finish. Better still, their literary quality has been elevated. In glancing over Roman's counters, we notice among their gilt books choice collections of quaint and rare ballads, judicious selections from standard poets and prose writers, exquisitely embalmed in tinted and enameled sheets, between beautifully colored and chastely ornamented covers. Books of well culled excerpts, illuminated like old missals, with rare initial letters, quaint type, and broad, liberal margin; dainty editions of dainty poets; classical volumes of the classics—serenely tasteful; complete library series of standard authors; and the newest edition of the newest and most popular author, make up the assortment, from which the most critical customer may select his holiday presents.

Notwithstanding the attention given to this particular branch of the trade, Messrs. A. Roman & Co. are still enabled to meet the demand for the latest novelties and the more recent literary, critical and scientific publications. Selections from their importations by the latest steamer, lie upon our desk:

The Poetry of the Orient. By William Ronnseville Alger. Boston: Roberts Brothers.

As Professor Draper has shown us how much we are indebted to the East for our scientific knowledge, Mr. Alger, in his present volume, demonstrates how greatly the Orient has contributed to Poetry. A small edition of this work, published in 1856, being out of print, the author has added to the present edition considerable introductory matter, additional specimens, and an appendix, consisting of poems not strictly Oriental. Many of these specimens have been translated by Mr. Alger; although in gleaning over the whole field of Oriental poetry, he has been indebted to Latin, French, and German translators. "The larger proportion of the specimens," says Mr. Alger, "are faithful representations of Hindu, Persian and Arab thoughts and sentiments, which I have met with in the voluminous records of the different Asiatic societies, in prose versions from the Vedas and Puránas, and in a thousand scattered sources. Of the rest, the originating hint and impulse alone, or merely the character and style, are Oriental." "The Introduction to Oriental Poetry," an historical dissertation, occupying nearly one-third of the volume, is a most instructive and well written essay, and is in itself a most important contribution to Oriental literature. The metrical specimens are tastefully arranged, and varied in style and thought. The volume is neatly bound and plainly printed.

Artemus Ward; His Travels. Part I.—Miscellaneous. Part II.—Among the Mormons. With Comic Illustrations by Mullen. New York: Carleton.

The publication of Artemus Ward's second volume is rather an evidence of that humorist's popularity than of its intrinsic merit. It contains half a dozen articles that equal, if not surpass, the broad rollicking humor of his earlier papers, but much of the work is made up of disjecta membra facetiæ, and concludes with a dreary synopsis of the Mormon Revelations, thrown in apparently to fill up the volume. The most fervent admirer of Mr. Brown must confess that the Travels are somewhat thin, spasmodic in effort, and sketchy in detail, and lack even that ordinary literary finish necessary to the humblest publication. Possibly, this playing at book-making may be one of the eccentricities of Artemus; possibly, its production may have been simply an advertisement for his lectures in England, but we would have preferred, for the permanent reputation of this genial humorist, which must be based on his books rather than his lectures, that his volume had been less hasty and premature. Those portions which are written in the showman's irresistible dialect and manner are better than the incidents sketched in the ordinary vernacular. We are reminded of the critical analysis of "Mufti" in the California Leader, who, in speaking of this burlesque English, says: "The fact is, there is a distinct style of humor, characteristic of every class and condition in life, and the various styles cannot be expressed in the same kind of language. If Mr. Brown is in fault for the eccentric spelling of the proprietor of the 'wax figgers,' there is fault back of that, which is the real one, viz: the choosing of such a character as the showman for his hero. If he may be permitted to speak and write in the name and person at all, he must be permitted to speak consistently with the character. The orthography belongs to the man; it does not constitute the humor of the character, but is an incident of it, though a necessary one." The volume is genially dedicated to the comedian, Dan Setchell—a warm personal friend of the author.

Our Artist in Cuba. Fifty Drawings on Wood. Leaves from the Sketch-Book of a Traveller, during the Winter of 1864-5. By Geo. W. Carleton. New York: Carleton.

Many authors have been their own publishers, but the instances of publisher turning author are comparatively few, and consequently the temptation to criticize them might be irresistible to those literary reviewers who had experienced real or fancied injustice at their hands. Mr. Carleton, however, has estopped any severe judgment on his little fledgling, by appearing rather as an artist than an author, and by wresting from the most dyspeptic censor the confession that his sketches at least are graphic. The story of the volume is soon told. While recruiting his health in the island of Cuba, a year or two ago, Mr. Carleton chose to record his impressions of travel and adventure, by certain humorous drawings in his note-book, which later reflection, and the critical counsel of his friends, impelled him to preserve in the present permanent form. The illustrations are fifty in number, very funnily conceived and carefully executed, and (here the resources of the publisher-author are drawn upon) exquisitely printed on tinted paper. A modest preface explains the work. Altogether it is a charming little volume, and a pleasant advertisement (were one needed) of the publisher.

Matrimonial Infelicities. With an Occasional Felicity, by Way of Contrast. By Barry Gray. New York: Hurd & Houghton.

The author of Married Life at Hillside has portrayed in this volume a few of these lesser matrimonial infelicities, which, from the days of "Mr. and Mrs. Caudle" to "Mr. and Mrs. Naggleton," have been a favorite theme for satire. Barry Gray's humor is quiet and subdued. Through the medium of Mr. and Mrs. Gray, he has depicted with considerable skill and fidelity those mild misunderstandings, contradictions, misconstructions and trials of temper, which sometimes lend a piquancy to domestic intercourse, and keep the honey of married life from cloying. We give a characteristic extract in another column.

Mrs. Goodfellow's Cookery as it Should Be. A new Manual of the Dining Room and Kitchen. Containing Original Receipts on Every Branch of Cookery; Rules on Carving, with full Illustrations of the Same; Bills of Fare, for Every Day in the Year, etc. Philadelphia: Peterson Bros.

Match-Making, or Family Manœuvres. By the Author of "The Hen-Pecked Husband," "The Jilt," etc. Paper binding. New York: Frederick A. Brady.

Rose Douglas. A companion to "Family Pride," and "Self-Sacrifice." Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson & Brothers.

AN AUTHOR'S NIGHT.—Mr. C. H. Webb, the author of the clever burlesque now running at the Academy of Music, entitled Arrah-na-Poke, will take an author's night on Monday, the 27th instant. This is Mr. Webb's second contribution to California dramatic literature, and the propriety of encouraging home talent, as well as the merit of the piece, should give him a full house.

MR. MIDSHIPMAN BREEZY.

A NAVAL NOVEL.

BY CAPTAIN M—RRY—T, R N.

[BY "BRET," THE CALIFORNIAN'S CONDENSED NOVELIST.]

CHAPTER I.

MY father was a North-country surgeon. He had retired, a widower, from her Majesty's navy many years before, and had a small practice in his native village. When I was seven years old he employed me to carry medicines to his patients. Being of a lively disposition, I sometimes amused myself, during my daily rounds, by mixing the contents of the different phials. Although I have no reason to doubt that the general result of this practice was beneficial, yet, as the death of a consumptive curate followed the addition of a strong mercurial lotion to his expectorant, my father concluded to withdraw me from the profession and send me to school.

Grubbins, the schoolmaster, was a tyrant, and it was not long before my impetuous and self-willed nature rebelled against his authority. I soon began to form plans of revenge. In this I was assisted by Tom Snaffle—a schoolfellow. One day Tom suggested :

"Suppose we blow him up. I've got two pounds of powder!"

"No, that's too noisy," I replied.

Tom was silent for a minute, and again spoke :

"You remember how you flattened out the curate, Pills! Couldn't you give Grubbins something—something to make him leathery sick—eh?"

A flash of inspiration crossed my mind. I went to the shop of the village apothecary. He knew me ; I had often purchased vitrol, which I poured into Grubbins' inkstand to corrode his pens and burn up his coat-tail, on which he was in the habit of wiping them. I boldly asked for an ounce of chloroform. The young apothecary winked and handed me the bottle.

It was Grubbins' custom to throw his handkerchief over his head, recline in his chair and take a short nap during recess. Watching my opportunity, as he dozed, I managed to slip his handkerchief from his face and substitute my own, moistened in chloroform. In a few minutes he was insensible. Tom and I then quickly shaved his head, beard and eyebrows, blackened his face with a mixture of vitriol and burnt cork, and fled. There was a row and scandal the next day. My father always excused me by asserting that Grubbins had got drunk—but somehow found it convenient to procure me an appointment in Her Majesty's navy at an early day.

CHAPTER II.

AN official letter, with the Admiralty seal, informed me that I was expected to join H. M. ship Belcher, Captain Boltrope, at Portsmouth, without delay. In a few days I presented myself to a tall, stern-visaged man, who was slowly pacing the leeward side of the quarter-deck. As I touched my hat he eyed me sternly :

"So ho! Another young suckling. The service is going to the devil. Nothing but babes in the cockpit and grannies in the Board. Boatswain's mate, pass the word for Mr. Cheek!"

Mr. Cheek, the steward appeared and touched his hat.

"Introduce Mr. Breezy to the young gentlemen. Stop! Where's Mr. Swizzle?"

"At the masthead, sir."

"Where's Mr. Lankey?"

"At the masthead, sir.

"Mr. Briggs?"

"Mastheaded, too, sir."

"And the rest of the young gentlemen?" roared the enraged officer.

"All mastheaded, sir.

"Ah!" said Captain Boltrope, as he smiled grimly, "under the circumstances, Mr. Breezy, you had better go the mast head too."

CHAPTER III.

AT the masthead I made the acquaintance of two youngsters of about my own age, one of whom informed me that he had been there 332 days out of the year.

"In rough weather, when the old cock is out of sorts, you know, we never come down," added a young gentleman of nine years, with a dirk nearly as long as himself, who had been introduced to me as Mr. Briggs. "By the way, Pills," he continued, "how did you come to omit giving the captain a naval salute?"

"Why, I touched my hat," I said innocently.

"Yes, but that isn't enough, you know. That will do very well at other times. He expects the naval salute when you first come on board—greeny!"

I began to feel alarmed, and begged him to explain.

"Why, you see, after touching your hat, you should have touched him lightly with your forefinger in his waistcoat, so, and asked 'How's his nibs?'—you see?"

"How's his nibs?" I repeated.

"Exactly. He would have drawn back a little and then you should have repeated the salute, remarking 'How's his royal nibs,' asking cautiously after his wife and family, and requesting to be introduced to the gunner's daughter."

"The gunner's daughter?"

"The same ; you know she takes care of us young gentlemen ; now don't forget, Pillsy!"

When we were called down to the deck I thought it a good chance to profit by this instruction. I approached Captain Boltrope and repeated the salute without conscientiously omitting a single detail. He remained, for a moment, livid and speechless. At length he gasped out :

"Boatswain's mate!"

"If you please, sir," I asked, tremulously, "I should like to be introduced to the gunner's daughter!"

"O, very good, sir!" screamed Captain Boltrope, rubbing his hands and absolutely capering about the deck with rage. "O d—n you! Of course you shall! O ho! the gunner's daughter! O, h—ll! this is too much! Boatswain's mate!"

Before I well knew where I was, I was seized, borne to an eight-pounder, tied upon it and flogged!

CHAPTER IV.

As we sat together in the cockpit, picking the weevils out of our biscuit, Briggs consoled me for my late mishap, adding that the "naval salute," as a custom, seemed just then to be honored more in the breach than the observance. I joined in the hilarity occasioned by the witticism and in a few moments we were all friends. Presently Swizzle turned to me :

"We have been just planning how to confiscate a keg of claret which Nips, the purser, keeps under his bunk. The old nipcheese lies there drunk half the day, and there's no getting at it."

"Let's get beneath his stateroom and bore up through the deck, and so tap it," said Lankey.

The proposition was received with a shout of applause. A long half-inch auger and bit was procured from Chips, the carpenter's mate, and Swizzle, after a careful examination of the timbers beneath the wardroom, commenced operations. The auger at last disappeared, when suddenly there was a slight disturbance on the deck above. Swizzle withdrew the auger hurriedly ; from its point a few bright red drops trickled.

"Huzza! send her up again!" cried Lankey.

The auger was again applied. This time a shriek was heard from the purser's cabin. Instantly the light was doused, and the party retreated hurriedly to the cockpit. A sound of snoring was heard as the sentry stuck his head into the door. "All right, sir," he replied in answer to the voice of the officer of the deck.

The next morning we heard that Nips was in the surgeon's hands, with a bad wound in the fleshy part of his leg, and that the auger had not struck claret.

CHAPTER V.

"Now, Pills, you'll have a chance to smell powder," said Briggs, as he entered the cockpit and buckled around his waist an enormous cutlass. "We have just sighted a French ship."

We went on deck. Captain Boltrope grinned as we touched our hats. He hated the purser. "Come, young gentlemen, if you're boring for French claret, yonder's a good quality. Mind your cou, sir," he added, turning to the quartermaster, who was grinning.

The ship was already cleared for action. The men, in their eagerness, had started the coffee from the tubs and filled them with shot. Presently the Frenchman yawed, and a shot from a long thirty-two came skipping over the water. It killed the quartermaster and took off both of Lanky's legs. "Tell the purser our account is squared," said the dying boy, with a feeble smile.

The fight raged fiercely for two hours. I remember killing the French Admiral, as we boarded, but on looking around for Briggs, after the smoke had cleared away, I was intensely amused at witnessing the following novel sight :

Briggs had pinned the French captain against the mast with his cutlass, and was now engaged, with all the hilarity of youth, in pulling the captain's coat-tails between his legs, in imitation of a dancing-jack. As the Frenchman lifted his legs and arms, at each jerk of Briggs', I could not help participating in the general mirth.

"You young devil, what are you doing," said a stifled voice behind me. I looked up and beheld Captain Boltrope, endeavoring to calm his stern features, but the twitching around his mouth betrayed his intense enjoyment of the scene. "Go to the masthead—up with you, sir!" he repeated sternly to Briggs.

"Very good, sir," said the boy, coolly preparing to mount the shrouds. "Good-by, Johnny Crapaud. Humph!" he added, in a tone intended for my ear, "A pretty way to treat a hero—the service is going to the devil!"

I thought so too.

CHAPTER VI.

WE were ordered to the West Indies. Although Captain Boltrope's manner toward me was still severe and even harsh, I understood that my name had been favorably mentioned in the despatches.

Reader were you ever at Jamaica. If so, you remember the negresses, the oranges, Port Royal Tom—the yellow fever. After being two weeks at the station, I was taken sick of the fever. In a month I was delirious. During my paroxysms, I had a wild distempered dream of a stern face bending anxiously over my pillow, a rough hand smoothing my hair, and a kind voice saying :

"Bess his 'ittle heart! Did he have the naughty fever." This face seemed again to change to the well-known stern features of Captain Boltrope.

When I was convalescent, a packet edged in black was put into my hand. It contained the news of my father's death, and a sealed letter which he had requested to be given to me on his decease. I opened it tremblingly. It read thus :

"My dear Boy.—I regret to inform you that in all probability you are not my son. Your mother, I am grieved to say, was a highly improper person. Who your father may be, I really cannot say, but perhaps the Honorable Henry Boltrope, Captain R. N., may be able to inform you. Circumstances over which I have no control, have deterred this important disclosure. YOUR STRICKEN PARENT."

And so Captain Boltrope was my father. Heavens! Was it a dream? I recalled his stern manner, his observant eye ; his ill-concealed uneasiness when in my presence. I longed to embrace him. Staggering to my feet I rushed in my scanty apparel to the deck where Captain Boltrope was just then engaged in receiving the Governor's wife and daughter. The ladies shrieked : the youngest, a beautiful girl, blushed deeply. Heeding them not, I sank at his feet and embracing them, cried :

"My Father!"

"Chuck him overboard!" roared Captain Boltrope.

"Stay," pleaded the soft voice of Clara Maitland, the Governor's daughter.

"Shave his head! he's a wretched lunatic!" continued Captain Boltrope, while his voice trembled with excitement.

"No, let me nurse and take care of him," said the lovely girl, blushing as she spoke. "Mamma, can't we take him home?"

The daughter's pleading was not without effect. In the meantime I had fainted. When I recovered my senses I found myself in Governor Maitland's mansion.

CHAPTER VII.

THE reader will guess what followed. I fell deeply in love with Clara Maitland, to whom I confided the secret of my birth. The generous girl asserted that she had detected the superiority of my manner at once. We plighted our troth, and resolved to wait upon events.

Briggs called to see me a few days afterward. He said that the purser had insulted the whole cockpit, and all the midshipmen had called him out. But he added thoughtfully : "I don't see how we can arrange the duel. You see there are six of us to fight him."

"Very easily," I replied. "Let your fellows all stand in a row, and take his fire ; that, you see, gives him six chances to one, and he must be a bad shot if he can't hit one of you ; while, on the other hand, you see, he gets a volley from you six, and one of you'll be certain to fetch him."

"Exactly ;" and away Briggs went, but soon returned to say that the purser had declined—"like a d—d coward," he added.

But the news of the sudden and serious illness of Captain Boltrope put off the duel. I hastened to his bedside, but too late—an hour previous he had given up the ghost.

I resolved to return to England. I made known the secret of my birth, and exhibited my adopted father's letter to Lady Maitland, who at once suggested my marriage with her daughter, before I returned to claim the property. We were married, and took our departure next day.

I made no delay in posting at once, in company with my wife and my friend Briggs, to my native village. Judge of my horror and surprise when my late adopted father came out of his shop to welcome me.

"Then you are not dead!" I gasped.

"No, my dear boy."

"And this letter?"

My father—as I must still call him—glanced on the paper, and pronounced it a forgery. Briggs roared with laughter. I turned to him and demanded an explanation.

"Why, don't you see, Greeny, it's all a joke—a midshipman's joke!"

"But—" I asked.

"Don't be a fool. You've got a good wife—be satisfied."

I turned to Clara, and was satisfied. Although Mrs. Maitland never forgave me, the jolly old Governor laughed heartily over the joke, and so well used his influence that I soon became, dear reader, Admiral Breezy, K. C. B.

RUNNING-A-MUCK.

THE Javanese are naturally a very mild and timid people. Accordingly, whenever the idea of committing a crime takes possession of them, they feel the need of some stimulant to create an artificial courage, so as to be able to perpetrate their design. The stimulant to which they generally resort on such occasions is the most terrible of all—namely, opium. Once under the influence of this fatal drug, they rush, dagger in hand, upon the victim who may have excited their ire, and butcher him or her without compunction.

There are two causes which generally incite a Malay to the commission of crime—jealousy and fanaticism.

"One day," says a recent traveller in Java, "as we were on the point of taking our seats at the table at Schmidt's Hotel, we heard from without frightful cries of Amok! Amok! which made us all shiver with terror, for 'Amok' in the Malay language means 'murder,' and it has been Anglicized into 'a-muck.' We all rushed out from the dining-room, and were just in time to see a man, a native, pass by like an arrow, a naked dagger in hand, and with an expression of countenance perfectly frantic.

"'Amok! Amok!' was still the cry which reverberated through the air, but the man was gone, and out of sight. At the same moment, while many others were running after the fugitive, a woman all in tears made her appearance, with her hair cropped to the nape of her neck. I saw no more, for Schmidt hurried me into the carriage and drove off in full pursuit.

"All along the road there seemed to be the utmost terror, frightened people escaping in every direction, or entering their houses with the greatest precipitation. For, once under the influence of opium, one murder does not content these miserable creatures; they rush on wildly, killing every one they meet. It often happens that these Orientals, Hindoos, and Malays, intoxicated with opium, assassinate from fifteen to twenty persons. This is what is termed 'running-a-muck.'

"The streets consequently were instantly deserted, with the exception only of men armed with pikes and pitchforks. At a turn of the street I perceived afar off the infuriated man, half-naked, with his hair flying in every direction, running with all his might, closely followed by a troop of armed men. They all passed like a whirlwind. We were soon informed that he was captured, and returned to our hotel.

'The next day I learned the history of this Amok; the name of the unfortunate maniac; the cause of his crime; and the number of his victims.

"Aali, the cook of Schmidt's Hotel, was a good servant, whose zeal and honesty made him appreciated and esteemed by every one. Well paid, and respected both by his companions and his employer, Aali had everything he needed to be happy. But he loved Leda, his little cousin, who was as beautiful as she was indifferent. In vain he had given the most valuable presents; malachite rings and silver bracelets of exquisite workmanship. In vain he sang the charms of the cruel young girl—her black teeth, her bronzed cheeks, her coal-black eyes, and her arched eyebrows. Leda persisted in refusing to give him her dusky hand. Suddenly, Aali learnt that Leda, scorning his sincere attachment, had married Meddinn, his unworthy rival; a rival who had no other attraction than certain beautiful new rupees which he had amassed in his camphor-wood box. Outraged by such ingratitude, Aali swore to be revenged in the most bloody manner; so he 'ran-a-muck'—that is, he intoxicated himself with opium, rushed to his mistress, brandishing his kriss, the terrible Malay dagger in the shape of a flame, and attempted to cut off the head of Leda, who only escaped death by means of her thick hair, which served her for an armor to her doomed neck. Aali, perfectly frantic, rushed through the streets of Saerabaija, stabbing, more or less seriously, many of the innocent passers-by who chanced to come in his way.

"Aali was arrested by the city guards and put into prison. He was afterwards tried and condemned by a mixed tribunal, composed, according to custom, of Javanese and Dutch."

AWKWARD PREDICAMENT.—An officer on duty in Berwick-street, Sunderland, was called to a public-house, the landlady being in an awkward predicament. It appeared that the hostess and her spouse had been quarrelling in an upstairs room, and, threatening to commit suicide, she raised the window and jumped out. Her husband caught her by the dress, just as she got outside, and prevented her from falling; but the heavy weight of his better half rendered it impossible to drag her back again. The officer on the beat was summoned, but the united strength of the two men was unable to raise her up. The distance to the ground was about fifteen feet, and to let her go would probably involve a broken limb. There the landlady hung suspended, like Mohammed's coffin, betwixt heaven and earth, unable to go backward, and afraid to drop. At last, two feather-beds were brought out, and the woman was allowed to fall, alighting, without any damage, and, probably, deterred by her fright from attempting another leap of the same kind.—Newcastle Journal.

CARLYLE, according to the Fortnightly Review, proposes to write a Life of Washington. The Queen, however, denies this, on "the best authority."

A FAREWELL TO AGASSIZ.

BY OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

HOW the mountains talked together,
Looking down upon the weather,
When they heard our friend had planned his Little trip among the Andes!
How they'll bare their snowy scalps
To the climber of the Alps,
When the cry goes through their passes,
"Here comes the great Agassiz!"
"Yes, I'm told,' says Chimborazo,
"But I wait for him to say so—
That's the only thing that lacks—he Must see me, Cotopaxi!"
"Ay! ay!" the fire-peak thunders,
"And he must view my wonders!
I'm but a lonely crater,
Till I have him for spectator!"
The mountain hearts are yearning,
The lava torches burning,
The rivers bend to meet him,
The forests bow to greet him,
It thrills the spinal column
Of fossil fishes solemn,
And glaciers crawl the faster
To the feet of their old master!
Heaven keep him well and hearty,
Both him and all his party!
From the sun that broils and smites,
From the centipede that bites,
From the hail-storm and the thunder,
From the vampire and the condor,
From the gust upon the river,
From the sudden earthquake shiver,
From the trip of mule or donkey,
From the midnight howling monkey,
From the stroke of knife or dagger,
From the puma and the jaguar,
From the horrid boa-constrictor
That has scared us in the picture,
From the Indians of the Pampas,
Who would dine upon their grampus,
From every beast and vermin
That to think of sets us squirming,
From every snake that tries on
The traveller his p'ison,
From every pest of Natur',
Likewise the alligator,
And from two things left behind him,
(Be sure they'll try to find him)—
The tax-bill and assessor—
Heaven keep the great Professor!
May he find, with his apostles,
That the land is full of fossils,
That the waters swarm with fishes
Shaped according to his wishes,
That every pool is fertile
In fancy kinds of turtle,
New birds around him singing,
New insects, never stinging,
With a million data
About the articulata,
And facts that strip off all husks
From the history of mollusks.

And when, with loud Te Deum,
He returns to his Museum,
May he find the monstrous reptile
That so long the land has kept ill,
By Grant and Sherman throttled,
And by Father Abraham bottled
(All specked and streaked and mottled
With the scars of murderous battles,
Where he clashed the iron rattles
That gods and men he shook at,)
For all the world to look at!

God bless the great Professor!
And Madam, too, God bless her!
Bless him and all his band,
On the sea and on the land,
As they sail, ride, walk and stand—
Bless them head and heart and hand,
Till their glorious raid is o'er,
And they tone'h our ransomed shore!
Then the welcome of a nation,
With its shout of exultation,
Shall awake the dumb creation,
And the shapes of buried æons
Join the living creatures' pæns,
While the mighty megalosaurus
Leads the palæozoic chorus—
God bless the great Professor,
And the land his proud possessor—
Bless them now and evermore!

MAZZINI has published a circular, with the obvious purpose of stirring up the flames of sedition in Italy. He charges the Government of Victor Emmanuel with selling afresh the rights of the country, and obeying imperial orders from France; and again he peals forth the old revolutionary watchwords—"Rome for Capital," "Venice for Italy," and "War to Austria." An English writer asks: "Why does not Mazzini come out boldly from his retreat? He would be perfectly safe in England or Belgium. So long as he maintains this secrecy, he must not be surprised if the British public, for instance, look on these revolutionary manifestoes with suspicion. It looks very much as if Mazzini were the monkey, the revolutionary party the cat, and Rome and Venice the chestnuts."

MIGRATION OF SEEDS.—The lonely island of St. Helena, for example, at the time of its discovery, in 1501, produced about sixty vegetable species. Its flora now comprises seven hundred and fifty species. The faculty of spontaneous reproduction supposes a greater power of accommodation than we find in most domesticated plants. Although very wild species affect a habitat of a peculiar character, it will grow under conditions extremely unlike those of its birthplace. The seven hundred new species which have found their way to St. Helena within three centuries and a half, were probably, not in very large proportion, designedly introduced there by human art. As a general rule, it may be assumed that man has intentionally transferred fewer plants than he has accidentally into countries foreign to them. Tares follow the wheat. The weeds that grow among the cereal grains, and form the pest of the kitchen garden, are the same in America as in Europe.

Some years ago, the author made a collection of weeds in the wheat fields of Upper Egypt, and another in the gardens on the Bosphorus. Nearly all the plants were identical with those that grow under the same conditions in New England. The change from one locality to another is effected by a thousand casual circumstances. The upsetting of the wagon of an emigrant in his journey across the western plains, may scatter upon the ground the seeds he designed for his garden. The herbs which fill so important a place in the rustic materia medica of the Eastern States, spring up along the prairie paths just opened by the caravan of the settler. The hortus siccus of a botanist may accidentally sow seeds from the foot of the Himalayas on the plains that skirt the Alps. It is frequently observed that exotics, transplanted to foreign climates suited to their growth, escape from the flower garden, and neutralize themselves among the spontaneous vegetation of the pastures. The straw and grass employed in packing the sculptures of Thorwaldsen were scattered in the court-yard of the museum in Copenhagen, where they are deposited, and the next season there sprang from the seeds no less than twenty-five species of plants belonging to the Roman Campagna.

In the campaign of 1814, the Russian troops brought in the stuffing of their saddles, seeds from the Dnieper to the valley of the Rhine, and even introduced the plants of the steppes into the environs of Paris.

The Turkish armies, in their incursions into Europe, brought Eastern vegetables in their train, and left the seeds of Oriental wall plants to grow upon the ramparts of Buda and Vienna.

The Canada thistle is said to have sprung up in Europe two hundred years ago, from a seed which dropped out of the stuffed skin of a bird.

THE poisonous effect of lime upon some reptiles, and particularly upon the alligator, is a singular phenomenon. In Trifles from Ceylon the following account is given: "A moorman caught a young alligator in his fishing kraal in the Matara river, and I went to see it. Thinking that this would be a good opportunity for testing the correctness of what I had heard in the north of the island, about a remarkable effect of lime upon the alligator, I asked a man to bring me some, on which he procured from a neighboring house a lump of the chunamb, or lime prepared from shells, which the natives are in the habit of chewing along with the nut of the areca palm, and the leaves of the betel creeper. The lime had previously been moistened with water. Having opened the jaws of our unfortunate victim, we inserted, as far back as the opening into the throat, a lump of chunamb, about as large as a pigeon's egg, after which we put the animal into the water. Immediately it turned over on its sides, and then on its back, and appeared paralyzed; soon its eyes closed, and I thought it was dead. After about five minutes it revived a little. I could not remain longer to watch it, but in the evening I rode to where it had been experimented on, when I found that it was dead, and learnt that it had died within two hours of my leaving. On examining its mouth, I found that the lime had not been swallowed, but was still in the throat, just where it had been placed. I have, since making the experiment related above, been told that it is not uncommon for the Singhalese to fill the stomach of a bullock with lime, and to place it near the alligator's haunts, knowing that if he swallowed the lime, death would ensue."

NEW TRAJAN'S COLUMN.—A celebrated pork contractor for the Federal army presented himself a short time ago at a sculptor's atelier in Rome, and stated his intention of sending a durable memento of himself to adorn his native place in America. With an amiable candor he explained to the artist that he had began life as a poor boy selling matches, and by lucky speculations had attained his present gigantic greatness. "Now," he continued, "I've seen a muniment in this city as suits my views to a nicety. A kinder column with little figgers runnin' up all round it, and a chap at the top." "Trajan's column," suggest the artist. "P'r'aps it may be; an' I wish you to sculp me jes such another, a workin' out the whole o' my biagraff, beginning at the bottom with a boy a-selling matches, and then keep on winding it up till it ends with me in an easy attitood at the top!"—Exchange.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

THEATRICAL TALK.

AT Maguire's Opera House the Sea of Ice, beautifully put on the stage, with fine scenic effects, was played every evening until Thursday night, when Camilla's Husband was produced. Mrs. Jackson was very effective in the character of "Lady Camilla Hailstone," and Mr. Jackson made an excellent "Dogberry." Last night Mr. Daniel E. Bandmann took a benefit. The entertainment consisted of the third act of Hamlet, the third and fourth acts of Narcisse, and the fourth act of the Merchant of Venice. This afternoon the Sea of Ice will be produced. In the evening, Camille's Husband, and the Quiet Family.

The Metropolitan Theatre commenced the week with the Colleen Bawn, with a capital cast. On Thursday night it was played for the last time, in conjunction with the comedy of A Bull in a China Shop, for the benefit of the Ellsworth Rifles, when the house was crammed. Both plays were admirably performed. Last night the Octoroon, with Miss Sallie Hinckley in the character of "Zoe," Wheatleigh as "Salem Scudder," Mrs. Sedley Brown as "Dora Sunnyside," Mr. Pauncefort as "Wahnotee," Mr. Thompson as "Jacob McCloskey," and the other parts equally well filled was produced. It will be repeated this afternoon and evening.

At the Academy of Music the comedies of Nine Points of the Law, and How to Make Home Happy have been produced in conjunction with Arrah-na-Poke. Last night Mrs. C. R. Saunders took a benefit, on which occasion the Babes in the Wood was performed, Mrs. Saunders playing "Mrs. Beetle;" the performance concluded with the farce of A Day After the Fair, in which Mr. Harry Jackson gave his popular imitations. Monday night Mr. Webb, the author of Arrah-na-Poke, announces as "Author's Night." This burlesque has been improved since its first production, new points, business and songs have been produced, and it has, on every evening, been received with shouts of laughter. It will be played to-night.

Business has been dull during the week.

TOUCHSTONE.

INTERIOR ITEMS.

A few days ago, Victor Thurston, aged twelve years, son of Nelson Thurston, of Sutter county, was bitten by a black spider, from the effects of which he barely escaped with his life. The boy was bitten twice—under the right arm and on the stomach—and although suffering from a stinging pain, the cause was not detected until his clothes were taken off and the spider discovered. The boy was three miles from home when bitten, and by the time he arrived the venom of the spider had become pretty generally diffused through his system. Red streaks marked the course of the bite from point to point on the body; his limbs bloated, his eyes became bloodshot, and his lips turned blue. There was no time to send for a physician, and the lad's father first turned a pint of oil down him, soon following it with a quart of whisky. These heavy doses, though administered late, saved the boy's life. He remained ill two or three days, but finally recovered his health.—Appeal.

The Marysville Appeal says: "The rainy season opens promisingly. The dry diggings are likely to be well supplied with water, and we may look for a prosperous season. The farmers, too, can start their ploughs, and get in their crops early, thus securing an abundant yield." * * * "There are no apprehensions of a flood [Wednesday.] The rivers will fall before night, and we shall be left the satisfaction of a bountiful rain—beneficial both to the miner and farmer. Old citizens tell us this is the greatest rise in the rivers since 1852, from rain alone. The overflows and floods are generally from late rains, bringing down the snow from the mountains."

The Nevada Transcript states that prospecting at Summit City has been suspended in consequence of the storm, but many of the claims upon which work was commenced during the summer and fall, will be worked without interruption. Strong frame buildings have been erected on several of the mines, and rock will be taken out during the entire winter. The snow is now several feet deep at Summit City. It is thought between three and four hundred people will winter there. Tibbetts, the expressman, has made arrangements to communicate with the outside world by means of snow-shoes.

Colfax, says the Dutch Flat Enquirer, at present has a very lively business appearance. Cars running back and forth: stages arriving and departing; forwarding merchants bustling around; truckmen wheeling tremendous loads; teamsters tumbling in great bales and boxes of merchandise for "all parts of the mines and the State of Nevada;" speculators, merchants, miners and bummers running to and fro, (the latter mostly to the whisky mills,) impart to this place an air of activity, business and stability not dreamed of by the denizens of that locality ten years ago, and but little expected by the most far-seeing quidnunc six months since.

At Idaho City, lately, in the case of F. J. Patterson, indicted for killing Sumner Pinkham, late of Marysville, the jury returned a verdict of not guilty.

While Hiram Robbins and James Miller were sleeping in a house at Eagleville, in Yuba county, on the 18th inst., a large sugar pine tree fell across the cabin, killing Rollins instantly. Miller escaped uninjured, although badly scared, his feet being only two feet from where the tree struck. Several persons narrowly escaped with their lives during the wind storm on the night mentioned, from falling trees.

The San Jose Mercury says: San Jose presents a lively appearance about these days. Our farmers, lumbermen, miners, etc., are laying in their winter supply of goods. On Saturdays, our wide streets are crowded with teams, and are sometimes literally blocked up therewith.

The Placer Herald says the recent heavy rains have caused the Chinese working upon the Pacific Railroad to take something like a stampede to engage in mining in the surface diggings for the winter, in the lower part of the county.

The amount of coal oil shipped from San Buenaventura to San Francisco, now averages about two hundred and fifty barrels per month. This oil is all the natural flow from the oil springs.

The tules between the Butte and Colusa are a vast lake, from the overflow of Butte creek.

THE PIONEER BALL.

MARK TWAIN, in the Virginia Enterprise, gives the following characteristic description of "noticeable costumes" at the Pioneer Ball. It is a clever satire on Jenkins:

Mrs. W. M. was attired in an elegant pate de foigras, made expressly for her, and was greatly admired.

Miss S. had her hair done up. She was the centre of attraction for the gentlemen, and the envy of all the ladies.

Miss G. W. was tastefully dressed in a tout ensemble, and was greeted with deafening applause wherever she went.

Mrs. C. N. was superbly arrayed in white kid gloves. Her modest and engaging manner accorded well with the unpretending simplicity of her costume, and caused her to be regarded with absorbing interest by every one.

The charming Miss M. M. B. appeared in a thrilling waterfall, whose exceeding grace and volume compelled the homage of pioneers and emigrants alike. How beautiful she was!

The queenly Mrs. L. R. was attractively attired in her new and beautiful false teeth, and the bon jour effect they naturally produced was heightened by her enchanting and well sustained smile. The manner of the lady is charmingly pensive and melancholy, and her troops of admirers desired no greater happiness than to get on the scent of her sozodont sweetened sighs and track her through her sinuous course among the gay and restless multitude.

Miss R. P., with that repugnance to ostentation in dress, which is so peculiar to her, was attired in a simple white lace collar, fastened with a neat pearl-button solitaire. The fine contrast between the sparkling vivacity of her natural optic and the steadfast attentiveness of her placid glass eye was the subject of general and enthusiastic remark.

The radiant and sylph-like Mrs. T., late of your State, wore hoops. She showed to good advantage, and created a sensation wherever she appeared. She was the gayest of the gay.

Miss C. L. B. had her fine nose elegantly enameled, and the easy grace with which she blew it from time to time, marked her as a cultivated and accomplished woman of the world; its exquisitely modulated tone excited the admiration of all who had the happiness to hear it.

Being offended with Miss X., and our acquaintance having ceased permanently, I will take this opportunity of observing to her that it is of no use for her to be slopping off to every ball that takes place, and flourishing around with a brass oyster-knife skewered through her waterfall, and smiling her sickly smile through her decayed teeth, with her dismal pug nose in the air. There is no use in it—she don't fool anybody. Everybody knows she is old; everybody knows she is repaired (you might almost say built) with artificial bones and hair and muscles and things, from the ground up—put together scrap by scrap—and everybody knows, also, that all one would have to do would be to pull out her key-pin and she would go to pieces like a Chinese puzzle. There, now, my faded flower, take that paragraph home with you and amuse yourself with it; and if ever you turn your wart of a nose up at me again I will sit down and write something that will just make you rise up and howl.

The late Sir Henry Smith, long M. P. for Colchester, was one of the Tories of the old school; and among the advocates of Reform his resolute opposition to all change gave him a reputation for folly and obstinacy which was not borne out by his real character. On one occasion he was canvassing in presence of numerous friends, and on asking a heavy-looking farmer for his vote, the man replied:

"I'd vote for ye, Sir Henry, as usual, only you're such a fool."

"Fool, am I?" retorted Sir Henry; "then I'm the very man to represent you."

This shaft of wit penetrated the farmer's sconce, and with a loud guffaw he promised his vote.

"Mark Twain," in summing up the facts and theories of the What Cheer House robbery, says (correspondence Virginia Enterprise, Nov. 18th:

"The Old Thing.—As usual, the Alta reporter fastens the mysterious What Cheer robbery on the same horrible person who knocked young Myers in the head with a slung-shot a year ago and robbed his father's pawnbroker shop of some brass jewelry and crippled revolvers, in broad daylight; and he laid that exploit on the horrible wretch who robbed the Mayor's Clerk, who half-murdered detective officer Rose in a lonely spot below Santa Clara; and he proved that this same monster killed the lone woman in a secluded house up a dark alley with a carpenter's chisel, months before; and he demonstrated by inspired argument that the same villain who chiselled the woman tomahawked a couple of defenceless women in the most mysterious manner up another dark alley a few months before that. Now, the perpetrator of these veiled crimes has never been discovered, yet this wicked reporter has taken the whole batch and piled them coolly and relentlessly upon the shoulders of one imaginary scoundrel, with a comfortable, 'Here, these are yours,' and with an air that says plainly that no denial, and no argument in the case, will be entertained. And every time anything happens that is unlawful and dreadful, and has a spice of mystery about it, this reporter, without waiting to see if maybe somebody else didn't do it, goes off at once and jams it on top of the old pile, as much as to say, 'Here—here's some more of your work.' Now this isn't right, you know. It is all well enough for Mr. Smythe to divert suspicion from himself—nobody objects to that—but it is not right for him to lay every solitary thing on this mysterious stranger, whoever he is—it is not right, you know. He ought to give the poor devil a show. The idea of accusing 'The Mysterious' of the What Cheer burglary, considering who was the last boarder to bed and the first one up!

"Smythe is endeavoring to get on the detective police force. I think it will be wronging the community to give this man such a position as that—now you know that yourself, don't you? He would settle down on some particular fellow, and every time there was a rape committed, or a steamship stolen, or an oyster cellar rifled, or a church burned down, or a family massacred, or a black-and-tan pup stolen, he would march off with portentous mein and snatch that fellow and say, 'Here, you are at it again, you know,' and snake him off to the Station House."

Madame Malibran.—The Autographic Mirror, published in London, reproduces some curious relics. A late number gives the following letter of the celebrated cantatrice, Madame Malibran: "My Der Mr. Bunn,—I cannot promise to play the part of cont Belino. The music is exceedingly week, and, after the sunnambula I am not capable of singing baby's music However, I don't say positively no until I have seen both the music and the pice again, for it is about 8 years I have not even herd of the part. Therefore, be so good as to send the whole to me, and I shall give you a conscientious answer quite a la Malibran."

Mr. Bethell, an Irish barrister, when the question of the Union was in debate, like other junior barristers, published a pamphlet on the subject. He was complimented by Mr. Lysaght, with the remark: "The copy I saw contained some of the best things I have seen in any pamphlet on the subject." "I am very proud you think so," said the delighted author; "and pray what are the things that pleased you so much?" "Why," replied Lysaght, "as I passed by a pastry-cook's shop, I saw a girl come out with three mince-pies wrapped up in one of your works."

Life Insurance.—The importance of this most commendable method of Investment, by those who would secure their families a guarantee of immunity from want in case of their sudden death, is is becoming more fully recognized by our citizens, and the Life Insurance business is greatly on the increase in our city. Messrs. Bigelow & Brother, local Agents for the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company, issue a circular showing the rates of insurance for seven years, and for life, with other matters of interest, which should receive the careful attention of all persons who would make proper provision for those near and dear to them, in case death should deprive their loved ones of their protection and support.

How frightful are the annals of Consumption, and how painful the reflection that half its victims might have been saved by a timely use of that best of all family remedies, "Newell's Pulmonary Syrup." Look to your health in time. At the first manifestation of a slight cough or cold, take the "Syrup." You will find that "an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure."

AN INTERESTING LETTER.

Very few persons, even among physicians, would have been willing upon any terms to have been in the condition of the writer of the following letter on the 14th of February last. I will anticipate somewhat his report of the facts, by saying that on the 15th August, 1865, he made me a visit, "the very picture of health." Time, which tries and proves all things, has sufficiently tested this case, and shown that neither relapse or collapse having followed, the cure is perfect, and can be cited among the scores of similar cases, the result of my improved mode of treating disease without medicine.

G. M. BOURNE,
Water Cure Physician,
No. 10, Masonic Temple, Post street.
August 27, 1865.

Sacramento, April 30, 1865.

Dr. G. M. Bourne—Dear Sir: It is with pleasure and satisfaction that I now let you know of my good health. Looking back on what I have passed through, it seems as if I was lifted from the grave, and I think it my duty to acknowledge to you and the world the benefit I derived from water treatment as administered by you in your celebrated baths. It was in August, 1864, when disease developed itself with a severe cough. I then took medicines, getting worse, with chills, fevers, loss of strength, and was pronounced consumptive. This set me to thinking, and finally I determined to leave my business and go to the Sandwich Islands, having been informed that I could not be cured here. I went to San Francisco, and while waiting for a ship, called upon Dr. Bourne, who stated that a trip to the Sandwich Islands would probably result disastrously, was wholly unnecessary, as I could then be speedily cured at his establishment. I placed myself under his treatment, and in one week was so much improved that I thought I could risk returning home and to my duty as Engineer on the Central Pacific Railroad. The doctor objected; but I thought I knew better, and returned to my duty. In about two weeks my cough returned, and I kept getting worse, and, contrary to Dr. Bourne's injunction never to take medicine again, committed that folly, and soon was so completely run down that I could scarcely walk; so, as a last resort, I concluded once more to try the Water Cure. I went to San Francisco—few of my friends expected me to return; in fact, I thought my return doubtful. On arriving at Dr. Bourne's establishment (February 14, 1865,) I was not able to get into the bath without assistance, but in a few days I began to gain. I remained with him only six weeks, when I left, "a wiser and a better man," without the aid of medicine. I have now been at work several weeks, and find that I am gaining every day, and at present bid fair to be stouter than ever before. Persons visiting the Doctor's establishment will find it just what it should be, in both Ladies' and Gentlemen's Departments, and I cannot say too much in praise of the Doctor's kind attention to his patients.

This letter I write for the benefit of the afflicted, to be used as the Doctor decides, and should it be the means of directing any one to his care and treatment who (as they assuredly will) find relief, I will be paid for my trouble. Your obedient servant,

JAMES CAMPBELL,
Engineer Central Pacific Railroad.

San Francisco, August 25, 1865.

Advised by the undersigned, Mr. James Campbell, of the Central Pacific Railroad (who was then in a most deplorable state of ill health,) placed himself under the care of Dr. Bourne, the Water Cure Physician. Some six months or more afterward he visited this city, when I accidentally met him at Dr. Bourne's establishment, and, I am happy to say, restored to the enjoyment of good health and in fine spirits. JOHN SULLIVAN.

☞ Dr. Bourne treats all diseases of the throat, chest, and lungs—which includes diptheria, bronchitis, incipient consumption, pleurisy, croup, etc.—with the greatest success. Great relief is afforded in advanced stages of consumption. Rheumatism, paralysis, neuralgia, fever and ague, dropsy, etc., etc., are also cured quickly, pleasantly, and economically. No medicine whatever.

Dentist Work.—Messrs. Knowles & Clark have an improved method of combining their gold and valcanite material in the manufacture of dentistry, which renders the work superior in finish and durability. The samples of their handiwork on exhibition at the late Fair were much admired, and we observe that they were awarded a special premium silver medal.—Mining and Scientific Press.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

Dr. Wm. K. Doherty's Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

A TRUE STORY.

DEDICATED TO THE SICK.

There dwelt in Sacramento a pale, bilious mechanic,
His muscles were strengthless, his blood it was chill;
And the wife of his bosom believed, in her panic,
The husband she worshipped was hopelessly ill.
Seeking daily for help, in her wifely devotion,
All vainly she tried pill, powder and potion—
Till at last, when a prey to grief's wildest emotion,
Of HOSTETTER'S BITTERS she heard from a friend.

She purchased the cordial, half hoping, half fearing,
A prayer on her lip and a tear in her eye;
And taking his hand, with words kindly and cheering,
Besought him the tonic for her sake to try.
As he drank, a new life through his system seemed stealing,
Each following draft did its mission of healing,
Until, strong in health and most grateful in feeling,
He told the "true story" here twined into song.

It is also proper to state that the Bitters are sold exclusively in glass, and never, under any circumstances, by the gallon or barrel. Imposters and imitators are abroad, and the only safeguard the public have against them is to see that the Bitters they buy have the engraved label and note of hand of Messrs. Hostetter & Smith, and their proprietary stamp over the cork of the bottle.

A Dainty Branch of Art.—A high reputation awaits Mrs. Read for the exquisite workmanship and general adaptability to their purpose of the Ladies' Skirt Supporters and Chest Expanders, of which she made such fine display at the late Fair. Her "Lady's Bust" is another aid to feminine beauty, which confers perfection on the wearer. Mrs. Read's establishment, 109 Montgomery street, is richly worth a visit.—San Francisco Sunday Mercury.

Many of the Diseases which hitherto baffled and defied the highest medical skill, are now speedily cured by Dr. H. A. Benton, whose processes of applying electricity receive the approbation of all prominent physicians. The nerves are directly reached, and patients suffering from chronic complaints find almost immediate relief, and rapidly recover their former healthy condition. Dr. Benton is a physician of excellent reputation, and as a Medical Electrician occupies the front rank in his profession.—Golden Era.

Trimmings.—Mrs. Norcross, No. 5 Masonic Temple, Montgomery street, is prepared to fill orders for civic and military at the shortest notice; also, invites the ladies to call and examine trimmings for Opera Cloaks received per steamer from New York. Mrs. Norcross has a Show Case on exhibition at the Fair, containing goods which for elegance and taste are not surpassed by any other establishment on the Pacific coast.—San Francisco Leader, Sept. 16th.

Toys.—Toys can be purchased of Feldbush & Co., 307 California street, at 25 per cent. below the usual rates. Call and examine stock and prices.

Dr. C. W. Moore's Medical and Surgical Institute.—In speaking of this Institution, the Sunday Mercury says: "Aside from the most skilful treatment and nursing, the large, airy and elegantly-furnished rooms, will enable the patients to enjoy all the comforts and luxuries of a home. All in all, we regard Dr. Moore and his Institute a most valuable acquisition to the Pacific Coast—the need of which we have long since felt." See advertisement.

MONEY TO LOAN.—$5,000 to loan, in small sums, on City Property, for a term of years; repayments received in monthly instalments. Deposits received at 1 per cent per month from month to month. Apply to the California Building and Loan Society, 406 Montgomery street, opposite Wells, Fargo & Co's.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

KATE ROCKFORD, Plaintiff, vs. FRANCIS ROCKFORD, Defendant.—Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to FRANCIS ROCKFORD, Defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this honorable Court, dissolving the Bonds of Matrimony existing between Plaintiff and Defendant, and allowing Plaintiff to resume her maiden name of Kate Fossit, for costs of suit, and general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 23d day of June in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five.

MACHINES SOLD IN TWO YEARS!

The almost incredible increase in the sale of the Singer Machine during the past two years is owing to the popularity of the LETTER A TRANSVERSE SHUTTLE Family Machine, which was introduced in 1860, since which time it has earned and established a reputation for family uses equal to the celebrated manufacturing machines of this firm, which are generally acknowledged even by dealers in other sewing machines, to be unequalled for such purposes.

TO THE LADIES OF CALIFORNIA.

IT IS A FACT, which all should know, that

Washing may be Done for Half the Cost,

and in half the time, required by pursuing the method now in use. An enormous waste of time and materials attends the old and ordinary process. And this is not because a better method is not known, but because housewives persist in treading in the beaten track followed by their mothers and grandmothers before them, opposing every change, and refusing even TO MAKE A FAIR TRIAL of those new inventions which scientific research has produced.

If the housekeepers of San Francisco and of the State will try the

California Washing Extract,

simply by way of experiment, they will be amazed to find how much unnecessary labor may be saved by its use. It may be obtained at all the principal Groceries of the city, or in quantities of the Agents, HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN.

The use of the EXTRACT renders "rubbing," "pounding," "washboards," and all the severe drudgery of the usual method quite unnecessary. It thoroughly cleanses, without injuring the clothes. In short, it works such wonders as no one will credit without witnessing them. All that the inventor asks of any doubting housewife is

A SINGLE TRIAL.

The following certificate from the State Assayer, furnished after an analysis of the EXTRACT, speaks for itself:

A. ENQUOIS—Dear Sir: I have examined the sample of liquid handed me, and find it free from acid or any substance that would be injurious to clothing.

Very respectfully, B. B. THAYER.

FULL DIRECTIONS accompany each Bottle.

KNOW ALL MEN BY THESE PRESENTS: That I, BRIDGET STANNAH, wife of WILLIAM STANNAH, intend to make application to the Twelfth District Court of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, on the 23d day of December, A. D. 1865, at 10 o'clock A. M. of that day, or as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard, at the court room of said Court, in said city and county, for an order of said Court permitting her to carry on business in her own name and on her own account—the nature of the business to be carried on by virtue of such order being that of keeping a boarding and lodging house, and purchasing lots and houses to be used and occupied in that business, and erecting houses therefor. That for this purpose I am desirous of availing myself of the benefit of An Act to authorize married women to transact business in their own name as sole traders, approved April 12th, 1852, and of the acts amendatory thereof.

BRIDGET STANNAH.

W. C. BURNETT, Attorney for petitioner—Office, 636 Clay street. nov25-5t
